CLINTON.—Rev. J. L. Forsyth writes: The work of God is advancing in this town recently. A number of conversions and additions to the Church, and considerable stirring up among Christians. Our daily union prayer-meeting is well attended, and is a means of much grace to many.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

LOGANSPORT.—Rev. O. P. Westmoreland writes: This village is located on the Sabine River, on the line between Texas and Louisiana. It has been looked upon as a stronghold of the Devil for many long years. How happy will the old preachers be when they hear the Lord has blessed this people for whom they have prayed and labored so much and long.—Bro. Fuster (a local preacher) and myself closed a meeting after having protracted it nine days. On Sunday, God's Spirit mightily prevailed, and those who came from curiosity acknowledged the power of God, rushed to the altar, where nearly every one found pardoning mercy. Twenty-eight persons were hopefully converted, and thirty-five joined the Church. The people are kind, hospitable and intelligent. They advised me to send for a Sunday School Library, a dozen Disciplines, and Hymn Books. This promises something. I have never attended a better meeting for the season of the year.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

BLOUNT SPRINGS MISSION.—Rev. A. Dowling writes: Since the cold and chill weather has past, our meetings have been increasing in interest. At our second Quarterly Meeting we had a large attendance. On Sabbath morning we met in love-feast, which was profitable to all. The unction of heaven seemed to rest on the congregation.—Our Presiding Elder preached us an interesting and instructive sermon. The Lord's Supper was administered, to the comfort of all the communicants. There are ten preaching places on this mission. We have four Sabbath Schools in operation. We have received three members on probation, and eight by letter. It is believed that the time is not far distant when the word mission will be changed to circuit.

FOREIGN.

The Bay Islands.

The Bay Islands, Ruatan, Utilla, Bonacca, Barbarat, Helena, and Muret, heretofore constituting a British colony in Central America, have, by a recent treaty, been recognized as part of the sovereignty of Honduras. The people have held a meeting, and have demanded of Honduras the same rights and privileges, including religious liberty, as when under the British crown. There is some talk of resistance to the transfer.

Another Battle in Mexico.

The Matamoras correspondent of the Crescent writes that the recent victory of the Liberals under Uraga has been neutralized by a victory of the Miramon party, under Cazen and Ramirez, over the Liberals, under Hinojosa. He says a pitched battle will soon be fought between Miramon and Uragna, and that it is thought Miramon will win.

Garibaldi's Proclamation.

Italian Soldiers!—For some centuries the want of concord and discipline led to grievous calamities for our country. To-day nothing can be more admirable than the unanimity which breathes through the whole population, from the Alps to Sicily. Our discipline leaves yet something for us to wish, although both of discipline and valor you gave such instances as may enable the nation to recognize itself and appear in a compact unity to those who would enslave it.

Persevere in your union, Italian youths! ye glorious remnants of the battles fought for your country. Remember that in the North (Venetia) we have still enemies and enslaved brethern; and that the people in the South, when rid of the Pope and the Bourbon, will need your well organized martial example to prepare for greater conflicts.

In the name of the revolving country, I recommend, therefore, the youth whose presence fills the ranks of our brave army, not to fall away from those ranks, but rather to rally closer under their able commanders, and that Victor, whose bravery may be staggered for one moment by pusillanimous advisers, but will soon resume its ascendancy, and taking the lead once more, show the way to a certain and final victory.

GIUSEPPE GARIBALDI.

To the Sicilian People.

Sicilians!—I have brought you a body of brave men, who have hastened to respond to the heroic cry of Sicily; we, the resolute of the battle of Lombardy, are with you; all we ask is the freedom of our land; united, the work will be easy and short. To arms, then! He who does not snatch a weapon is a coward and a traitor to his country. Want of arms is no excuse. We shall get muskets, but at present any weapon will do in the hands of a brave man. The municipalities shall provide for the women, children and old men, deprived of their support. To arms, all of you! Sicily shall once more teach the world how a country can be freed from its oppressors by the powerful will of a united people.

GARIBALDI.

To the People of Naples.

Neapolitans!—It is time for you to imitate the magnanimous example of Sicily, by rising against the most inglorious of tyrants, to the perjured and blood-thirsty race that has so long tortured and trampled on you. Let the free government succeed which eleven millions of Italians now demand, and substitute for the foul Bourbonic flag the glorious tri-color of the happy symbol of national independence and unity, without which true and durable liberty is impossible. Your brethren of the North desire no more than to see you join the Italian family.

G. GARIBALDI,
G. RICARDI,
BARON STOCCO.

To the Neapolitan Army.

Soldats Compatriots—Foreign insolence reigns over Italians, growing in consequence of Italian discord; but, in the day of Sarsamitz and Marli, united with the brethren of Sicily, you shall join the Italians of the North. On that day our nation, of which you are the finest part, shall resume its place as in former times, among the nations of Europe. I, an Italian soldier, only aspire to see you drawn up side by side with those soldiers of Varez and San Martino, in order jointly to fight against the enemies of Sicily.

G. GARIBALDI.

The Expedition to China.

The Overland China Mail reports that Sir Hope Grent arrived out at Hong Kong, on the 20th of March. Active preparations were being made for the war, and the expedition would leave for the north early in April.

Russia and Turkey.

A dispatch from St. Petersburg, says the announcement that England probably would not offer opposition to an inquiry by Russia into the situation of Christians in Turkey, has given great satisfaction in that city.

General News.

The British Government had issued a proclamation against enlistment for the Pope in Ireland, but declines to interfere in the subscriptions for the Sicilian insurgents, the law officers of the Crown not regarding it as illegal.

The Paris correspondent of the London Herald says an ominous correspondence has commenced between the Cabinets of London and Paris. Respecting this he says: "Matters seldom were in a more critical aspect," and asserts that France, Russia, and Spain were leagued together.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times refers to the same subject. He says it is proposed that the two Governments set their faces against intervention, whether from Austria, Piedmont, or the Papal States, and let the Sicilians and Neapolitans fight it out. He says the relations between France and England require such gentle handling that the Government press were entitled to use no strong language against England.

The St. Petersburg Telegraph states that the principal foreign Ministers, excepting the Turkish, were recently convoked by Prince Gortschakoff, who declared that the position of the Christians in Turkey had become so intolerable that Russia was on the point of addressing representations to the Port in their favor, and hoped to obtain the support of other powers.

The London Times says that Russia is premeditating a second Menschikoff Mission, and that England, while laboring to advance the interests of Christians, cannot forget that she is pledged to advance the interests of the Ottoman State.

A Vienna telegram of the 14th states on reliable authority that part of Garibaldi's expedition disembarked at Marsala on the 11th from two vessels. The Royal ships were obliged to cease firing during two hours, being, it is asserted, prevented by English steamers. The firing could not be resumed until the English officers had returned from the shore to their vessels.—The volunteers who landed were fighting with the Royal troops at the moment of the mail's departure.

An official dispatch of the 13th, from Naples, says the firing of two Neapolitan frigates off Marsala killed several fishermen. As regards the two vessels in which they arrived, the Lombardo was sunk, and the Piedmonte has been captured. The Royal troops marched to meet those who disembarked.

Other dispatches confirm the news of the disembarkation of Garibaldi, and of the capture of the steamer Piedmonte and the destruction of the Lombardo.

A Turin paper publishes a letter of Garibaldi to M. Rubalt, excusing himself for having taken the steamers Piedmonte and Lombardo, on the ground that it was done in the interests of the National cause. These steamers were forcibly taken possession of, not chartered by Garibaldi's followers.

The Turin journals publish a proclamation of Garibaldi to the Italians. Garibaldi calls upon the inhabitants of the Marshes, Umbria and Sabina and the Neapolitans, to revolt, in order to divide the forces of the enemy.

Another proclamation, addressed to the Romans, recalls the insurrection of 1849, and urges the Romans to act like their brethren who fell in defending Rome.

Col. Medici, the friend of Garibaldi, at Meno, (Genoa?) was forwarding the preparations for a second expedition. Six thousand volunteers were already enrolled.

It was asserted that the numerous diplomatic representations made to Piedmont would decide the Government to prevent the departure of the second expedition.

Great agitation prevailed at Naples.

A Palermo dispatch of the 13th states that in five churches, at the termination of mass, shouts of "Italy forever!" "Liberty forever!" etc., were raised. In the evening the populace, to the number of ten thousand, assembled on the promenade.—The police were unable to disperse them, and troops were summoned, who fired on the people, killing four and wounding ten. Several were arrested.

A Turin dispatch states that, during the landing at Marsala, four persons were killed. The arms and ammunition were disembarked. Other arms coming from the Levant were landed several days before on the Southern coast.

The Governor of Sicily has issued a proclamation prohibiting the carrying or detention of arms.

The French Minister at Naples had asked for four ships of war, and the vessels had been sent.

Intelligence relative to Garibaldi's expedition is still meager and conflicting, but the reports generally concur in stating that he was making good progress. Some say he had captured the most important positions in Sicily, except Messina and Palermo.

After his landing at Marsala the Neapolitan war-vessels bombarded that town without a warning, and the British vessels interposed for the protection of English residents.

The important announcement was made, via Madrid, that the King of Naples had applied for foreign intervention.

Among other questionable rumors was one that a treaty, offensive and defensive, had been concluded between Naples, Rome, Austria, and the deposed Italian sovereigns.

The latest accounts from Naples represent the utmost consternation there. The troops were dispirited. Tumultuous manifestations were taking place, the Royal family packing up their jewels and valuables, and other strong indications that a great insurrection was looked for at any moment. At the latest dates Garibaldi's forces were moving on Palermo.

LONDON, May 17.—The Times has received the following important dispatch from Naples:

PARIS, May 17.—The Pays (semi-official) contains the following confirmation of Garibaldi's success:

"The accounts from Italy announce that Garibaldi's expedition developed itself with extraordinary rapidity. At present, success appears beyond question. Garibaldi was concentrating the scattered limbs of insurrection, and it was asserted that he had captured the most important positions on the Island. From other intelligence it appears that a portion of Garibaldi's expedition landed in Calabria, and that the insurrection was threatening Naples."

Garibaldi's Expedition to Sicily.

The papers published in Paris and other cities of the continent contain all sorts of rumors respecting the movements of Gen. Garibaldi and his expedition to Sicily. The statement received by the steamship City of Baltimore, that Garibaldi had been routed, is now said to be a mere fabrication. On the 15th, Garibaldi arrived at Alcamo, whence he moved forward cautiously towards Palermo. On the 16th, he met the royal troops at a small place called Poppio, near Palermo, and completely routed them. He then moved directly on to Palermo, which was in a state of siege. Bands of insurgents from all parts of the Island were marching to his assistance. It was generally believed that Palermo would be shortly evacuated by the royal troops. Garibaldi's troops were entrenched semicircularly around Palermo. The Neapolitan troops and functionaries were perfectly discouraged. The provinces of Palegmo and Trapani had been abandoned by the Neapolitan troops. The provinces of Palermo were in full insurrection, and 6000 Sicilians had joined the army of Garibaldi. It is reported that two Neapolitan columns, of 3000 men each, had been sent to pursue the insurgents.

Later from China.

The latest advices received from China state that all the Northern ports were being blockaded. Mr. Bruce, the British Minister at Hong Kong, would receive an answer from the Emperor by the 10th of April. The whole Chinese army would be ready to move on or about the 15th of April.

Duty on Paper.

The bill repealing the duty on paper has been rejected by the British House of Lords.

Defeat of the Neapolitan Army.

Gen. Garibaldi and his expedition to the Island of Sicily engross much of the public attention, and all sorts of rumors are flying about regarding his movements.

Shortly after having landed his troops at Marsala, Garibaldi was attacked by a body of the Neapolitan army, but after a desperate battle, in which the two armies exerted themselves to the utmost, the Neapolitans were completely routed and scattered in every direction.

This victory completed, Gen. Garibaldi made preparation for a march over the Island. As the latest accounts he had made his way unmolested to Palermo, and commenced a successful attack upon the city, which it was thought would be given up to him.

War with China.

The latest advices received from Pekin state that the Government of China had positively refused the ultimatum of France and England. War, therefore, as the last resort, had been determined on.

DOMESTIC.

Proceedings of Congress.

WASHINGTON, May 29.—In the House of Representatives yesterday the bill which provides for a railway to the Pacific being the special order of the day, a sharp discussion ensued, but no definite action was obtained.

In the Senate the bill providing for the geographical survey of the State of Oregon and the Territory of Washington was passed.

Mr. Davis, from the Committee on Conference, appointed to consider the disagreement on the Military Academy Bill, reported that the Senate Committee agreed to concur in the House bill. The House was informed of the action of the Senate.

May 29.—The Senate resumed sometime yesterday in considering Hatch's report of the Reciprocity Treaty, which is now in the hands of the Secretary of State. The report is evidently called for by both Houses of Congress. As it contains some very bitter terms towards the Government of Great Britain and the Provincial Government of Canada, an early action thereon is expected. The report is unfavorably received by the Administration. Mr. Tyler, of Minnesota, made a report to the Secretary of the Treasury, taking opposite grounds on the same subject.

May 30.—In the Senate yesterday the Homestead bill came up for discussion, and the amendments of the House were rejected by a vote of 29 yeas against 20 nays. All the Democrats, with the exception of Mr. Rice, voted affirmatively. Mr. Sliedl recited the facts, and refuted the charges preferred against him in reference to the Houmas land grants.

The Senate opened with the bill which provides for the construction of a railroad, by some route west of the Mississippi river, to the Pacific. The consideration of the subject occupied the greater part of the day. There was a great disagreement between the members as to what route the road should be constructed. After an animated discussion, it was resolved to refer the bill back to the Committee on Pacific Railway, which was unanimously adopted. The adoption of this resolution is considered equivalent to a postponement for the session.

The California Railway bill was taken up. Mr. Hale withdrew his substitute to the bill. Mr. Latham offered an amendment, authorizing the Postmaster General to contract for the best route between St. Joseph and Great Salt Lake City, thence to Placerville. The bill provides for a semi-weekly line, which shall go through in 20 days. The annual amount to be paid for said services is to be $162,500. The amendment also provides for the contracting with a steamship company to carry all the printed matter and franked documents—the annual appropriation therefor not to exceed $40,000.

In the House of Representatives, the bill which provides that all invalid pensions commence from the date of the disability of those who held places in the army or navy, was passed. All pensionists are thus put on an equal footing.

In the Senate, the bill providing for the acquisition of the Island of Cuba, was reported back by Mr. Slidell.

May 31.—In the Senate, Mr. Slidell presented the report of the committee appointed to investigate the alleged abuses in the management of the public printing. The report wholly exonerates President Buchanan from any complicity in the transactions which are admitted as having taken place in connection with the award of the Government printing contracts. The report, however, censures most unjustly the present printing system, and recommends the adoption of some other at as early a day as may be possible. The report also reflects very severely upon the testimony of Cornelius Wendell and others, who had been examined as witnesses during the course of the investigation. Senator King also presented a report in behalf of a majority of the same committee. He takes the ground that it is clearly proven by the testimony that large sums of money have been paid to the public printer for election purposes, and to further the interests of newspapers devoted to partisan support. The report further goes on to say that the President was not only cognizant of, but that he assented to the payments referred to. A majority of the Committee agreed to the resolution of the Senate instructing the Committee to inquire into and report upon the expediency of having Government printing done by contract or otherwise.

In the House of Representatives to-day, Mr. Reynolds, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back the bill, lately introduced in the Senate, which provides for the return of the negroes, captured by the steamer Mohawk on board the bark Windfire, to the colony of Liberia.

At a late hour during the evening the bill having for its object the establishment of a Government printing office, came up for discussion. A spirited debate ensued, which consumed the greater portion of the evening. The vote taken on this bill was as follows: ayes, 120; nays, 56.

June 1.—In the House of Representatives, yesterday, the committee appointed to make investigation into the expenses for public printing continued to report till a late hour in the evening. It appears from the testimony that it is not disputed that the President had told a certain gentleman who executed the painting of public blanks, "There are $30,000 for your services as Public Printer, and in addition to this amount I will give you $20,000 to be equally distributed between the Pennsylvania Argus, published in the city of Philadelphia, and Sam Medary's paper, edited in Ohio."

Mr. Burnett has thereby obtained the floor and spoken at some length on the testimony, said he hoped Mr. Pryor would be better informed on facts when he next charged corruption. Mr. Pryor, on hearing this, arose and said: "Let the House order a committee and appoint me the chairman; then I will be able to prove that what I have heretofore said, so far as regard the testimony, is true and correct." He also stated that in 1850 he was solicited to apply for a portion of the surplus fund, but had indignantly refused the proposition.

In the Senate, yesterday, the Post Office deficiency bill was called up, discussed at considerable length, and was not passed, as was at first reported. The bill was amended to-day, and a vote taken upon it announced its final passage.

June 2.—In the House of Representatives, yesterday, a sharp-wording rencontre took place Messrs. Train, of Massachusetts, and Houston of Alabama. The House was thrown into a state of confusion and cries of order were to be heard throughout the hall. The Speaker was successful in restoring order, after which Mr. Houston made an apology to the House.

In the Senate Mr. Hale's resolution, which provides for the instruction of the Committee on Naval Affairs to inquire into the expediency of purchasing a naval depot at Brunswick, Geo., by the United States Government, was taken up. After a brief discussion therein, it was unanimously adopted.

A bill having for its object the settlement of private land claims in the State of California, was taken up and passed.

The Post Office deficiency bill was taken up. A sharp and long debate, in which several of the most prominent members were participants, resulted in the defeat of the bill.

In the House of Representatives, a bill recently introduced by the committee on the Judiciary, for fining and imprisoning U. S. Marshals allowing the escape of criminals in their custody, was taken up and passed.

Japanese Misgivings.

WASHINGTON, May 29.—The members of the Japanese Embassy are much troubled about the accident to the frigate Niagara. They do not believe that such is in reality the case. They think it has an artifice gotten up by our Government to detain them longer than they expected to remain in the United States. The United States Naval Commissioners have unsuccessfully endeavored to remove this prejudice. The difficulty will probably interfere with further carrying out the projected arrange, ments.

Affairs with Peru.

WASHINGTON, May 29.—The Navy Department has issued orders for the immediate dispatch of the United States steamer of war Wyoming to Callao. Our Government desires that the American Minister in Peru should enforce the demands on that Government in the case of ship Lizzie Thompson and Georgiana. The Wyoming is sent to Callao for the purpose of aiding our Minister in accomplishing the object.

Mexican Treaty.

WASHINGTON, May 29.—The Washington special correspondent of the New York Herald says that General Miramon and the Church party in Mexico have been completely routed by the Liberal forces. The Liberal party were in full possession of the city of Mexico. The correspondent states that authentic dispatches received by the State Department, say that the Liberal party of Mexico manifest the utmost anxiety for the ratification of the McLane-Ocampo treaty. These dispatches promise such succession to the Liberal victories as will end the long pending struggle in that unfortunate Republic.

The Coolie Trade.

WASHINGTON, May 30.—The United States Minister to China has asked Congress to pass a law to prevent Americans from engaging in the Coolie trade. He states that the Coolie traffic at present carried on by Americans, is seriously endangering our Chinese treaty stipulations, as other nations have prohibited their subjects from engaging therein.

Presbyterian Convention at Rochester.

ROCHESTER, May 30.—A general assembly of the leaders of the Presbyterian Church was held in this city yesterday. Temperance and slavery were unanimously voted. Rev. Dr. Palmer, of New Orleans, was elected to the chair of practical theology at Princetown.

Methodist Episcopal Conference.

BUFFALO, May 30.—The Methodist Episcopal Conference has refused to change the rule in discipline on slavery, by ten votes short of two-thirds of the whole number of votes cast.

Capture of Another Slaver.

WASHINGTON, May 30.—The Navy department has received intelligence of the capture, off the coast, of a vessel, having on board a cargo of Africans, by the United States steamer-of-war Crusader. John N. Maffit, lieutenant commanding of the Crusader, had the negroes, amounting in all to 450, sent to Key West.

Hatche's Report.

WASHINGTON, May 30.—The Secretary of State refused to send a copy of Mr. Hatche's report to the House of Representatives, because it is incompatible with the public interest.

Mass Meeting in New York.

NEW YORK, May 30.—The friends of Sam Houston, of Texas, held a mass meeting last night, on Union Square, in this city. The meeting was attended by several thousand citizens. Dr. Stephen Hasbrouck was called to the chair, and presided over the meeting. After several eloquent speeches, delivered by some of the most prominent politicians of the State, the meeting adjourned amid cheers for Sam Houston. Everything passed off quietly.

A Slaver in Court.

NEW YORK, May 30.—The steamship City of Norfolk, which was advertised to sail for St. Thomas, is the E. T. Fort. She was bound for that port during her late passage, but was seized on suspicion of being engaged in the slave trade. The case was brought before the United States Circuit Court to-day.

Mississippi Democratic Convention.

JACKSON, Miss., May 30.—The Mississippi Democratic State Convention met in this city to-day. The assemblage was one of the largest that ever was seen in this State. There were great enthusiasm and unanimity in favor of the course of the Mississippi delegates at Charleston. The delegates will be fully accredited to Richmond and Baltimore.

BOSTON, Mass., May 31, 11 P. M.—A great ratification meeting of the friends and supporters of the Constitutional Union nominations at Baltimore came off to-night. A great deal of enthusiasm was manifested, and a number of distinguished speakers addressed the assemblage. A letter was read from the Hon. Edward Everett, in which he gracefully signifies his willingness to accept the honor tendered to him in the nomination for the Vice Presidency of the United States. Resolutions were passed cordially endorsing the platform and the nominations, and the meeting adjourned.

Capture of Another Slaver—The Negroes Accumulating at Key West.

PENSACOLA, May 31.—The United States mail steamship Galveston, from Havana, via Key West, arrived here this morning. The Galveston touched at Key West on the morning of the 26th inst., and brings the following interesting intelligence from that point: The bark recently captured as a slaver off the coast of Cuba, by the United States war steamer Crusader, was believed to be a French vessel. The Crusader brought her to Key West, and placed her cargo, numbering nearly 150 negroes, in charge of the United States Marshal at that place. This addition swells the total number of the negroes captured this season off the coast of Cuba by American war vessels to more than fifteen hundred. After their arrival at Key West, the Captain and crew of the slave bark William were put in custody, there to remain till the month of November of the present year. The captain of the slaver Wildfire, had been released on his bonds.

COLUMBIA, S. C., June 1.—The Democratic State Convention of South Carolina met here yesterday, in pursuance of the call of the Democratic State Central Committee. There was a large attendance, every portion of the State being fully represented. The Convention, immediately after organization, proceeded to the business of choosing delegates to represent the State at the National Democratic Convention, which is to meet at Richmond, on the 11th instant.

The Convention proceeded to ballot for delegates from the State at large, and the following gentlemen, having received a large majority of the votes cast, were declared duly elected: Hon. R. B. Rhett, Hon. A. C. Garlington, Hon. J. J. Middleton, Hon. A. Burt.

The politics of the delegation is State Rights or Conservative. They will go to Richmond solely with the view of nominating and doing all in their power to select sound candidates, upon a sound national and explicit platform of principles.

Hon. R. B. Rhett, ex-Senator from the State, addressed the Convention previous to its adjournment. He said that he had worked long and hard to preserve the Union of the States upon the basis of our equal Constitution, and declared himself still, as heretofore, ready and anxious in good faith to exhaust all efforts to accomplish this great end.

The prevailing sentiment was one of cordial approval of the withdrawal of the Southern delegations and of uncompromising hostility to the dogmas of Squatter Sovereignty.

Extensive Failure in Norfolk.

NORFOLK, June 2.—Messrs. S. Cherry & Co., of this city, extensive merchants, are reported as having failed. The amount of their liabilities is estimated at $100,000.

Death of Judge Daniels.

RICHMOND, Va., June 2.—Judge Daniels, of the United States Supreme Court, died at his residence in this city on the 31st ult. At Washington it is generally thought that the vacancy occasioned by this death will be filled by Judge Robertson, of the Virginia Court of Appeals.

Methodist Episcopal Conference.

BUFFALO, June 2.—At a meeting of the Methodist Episcopal Conference the chapter on slavery was adopted by a vote taken upon it, of which the following is the result: Ayes 154; nays 59.

Memphis Cotton Statement.

MEMPHIS, June 2.—The amount of cotton received at this place since the first day of September, 1859, to the present time, adds up 392,000 bales, against 324,000 corresponding period last year. The quantity shipped from this point foots up 332,000 bales, against 321,000 corresponding time last year. The amount of cotton now in the city of Memphis makes up a total of 9500 bales.

Constitutional Union Convention in Missouri.

JEFFERSON CITY, Mo., June 2.—A Convention assembled in this city yesterday for the purpose of approving the platform adopted at Baltimore by the Union opposition convention. This meeting proved to be a most complete failure, as there were present only a dozen or less persons.

Nominations by the President.

WASHINGTON, June 2.—The President has nominated Mr. Wm. M. Churchill, of Tennessee, as United States Minister to Honduras and Guatemala. He has also nominated Mr. Wm. Trescott Assistant Secretary of State for the United States.—Their nomination has not as yet been confirmed by the U. S. Senate.

Later from California—Bloody Fight with Indians.

ST. LOUIS, June 2.—The central overland Puny Express, with the missing California mails and dispatches from the previous express, has arrived safely at St. Joseph. It brings intelligence of a bloody fight which took place near Bend Truckee river, on the 12th ult., between a body of Indians and the U.S. troops. Major Ormsby, at the head of 105 volunteers, left Virginia City, pursuing the Indians supposed to have murdered several Americans while asleep at Miller's station, Carson river. On the 12th ult. the volunteers reached Bend Truckee river, and there met 500 Indians, who had just arrived, well provided with ammunition. The Indians opened fire upon our troops, who being short of ammunition, &c., suffered heavily. A large number were killed on the spot and the remainder chased for a distance of thirty miles. Major Ormsby and Mr. Henry Meredith a distinguished California lawyer, were among the slain. The whole number of men known to have been killed is 21, the wounded 3, fate unknown 43, returned 33, total 105. The accounts of this fight were immediately telegraphed to California and volunteers were coming from various points eastward. The victorious Indians were at the latest accounts reported to be marching on the Washoe mines. Gen. Clark has ordered all available Pacific troops to the Carson Valley. At Denver City the inhabitants were arming themselves against the Indians encamped in that vicinity.

WASHINGTON, June 2.—The War Department has received information from the troops stationed in various parts of the Territories, that the Indians had again commenced their depredations upon emigrants travelling. In a westerly direction, and had on several occasions attacked and murdered the whites without cause or provocation. On receipt of this information, the War Department sent a telegraphic dispatch to the commander at Camp Floyd, directing adequate protection for emigrants, mails and the Pony Express from Great Salt Lake City to Carson Valley. As soon as the message Camp Floyd, which will be in the course of eight days, the United States troops will commence to move towards the Carson Valley. Mr. Russell, President of the Central Overland Express Company, does not believe that the missing California mails are lost.

The Japanese Embassy.

The Japanese Embassy have decided not to leave Washington until Government provides for their speedy return to Japan. The new programme prepared for the embassy is as follows: The Ambassadors are to visit Baltimore on the 5th, Philadelphia on the 7th, Niagara Falls on the 8th, Albany on the 14th, and Boston on the 16th inst. On their arrival in New York, which is to be on or about the 20th, it is supposed they will remain in that city a week or more. The steam frigate Niagara is at present in the Brooklyn yard undergoing repairs, and will not be ready to leave for Japan before the 7th of July.

ESCALANTE.

Martin Escalante, the Bible colporteur, is still detained by the Spanish authorities. He is living at a hotel in Cadiz, guarded by a policeman, whose expenses, as well as his own, he or his friends are compelled to pay. The free pardon which Lord John Russell gave the public reason to expect two months ago, is still withheld. It is pretended that one reason of this is because, at the British Consul's instance, Escalante of appealed to the Court Seville.—The real cause, however, is the hostility of the Romish priests, who have at present greater influence than ever. It is shrewdly suspected, moreover, that the authorities have no wish to give up a victim who is a British subject, and who pays so well, and has the British and Foreign Bible Society at his back. At the recent meeting of the Belfast Presbytery of the Irish Presbyterian Church, Professor Gibson said that Escalante was going on most successfully, and doing better than ever in the circulation of the Bible. The only difficulty he had to contend against was that he was nominally under surveillance, and that he was obliged to pay the guards that were placed over him.

MARRIAGES.

"It is not good for man to be alone."

COMMERCIAL.

Our general market has not exhibited much animation during the week just closed, operations to some of the leading articles being restricted by the limited nature of the supplies and the full prices claimed. In Cotton, Sugar and Molasses we notice a further falling off in the receipts and the qualities most in request being scarce the transactions have been quite moderate. In Tobacco the market has been inactive and heavy. In Western Produce we have noticed continued dullness in Flour and a considerable decline in the rates for Corn, while Provisions of most descriptions have brought full prices, though with a limited business doing

COTTON.—With respect to prices, we have to remark that buyers have still had the advantage in most of the transactions, and we now reduce our quotations about ¼ cent for the lower qualities, while, however, are still very irregular and in a great measure nominal. In the better grades the decline has been less marked, and Middling to Strict Middling, free from dust, may be quoted at 11¼ to 11¾ and 12c per pound.

The receipts at this port since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 2,034,058 bales, against 1,582,447 bales to same date last year, and the incre

ALLINE ELWIN: A TALE OF ALABAMA

BY FANNY SHELDON.

Chapter III.

"Think gently of the erring!
You know not of the power
With which the dark temptation came
In some unguarded hour."

Soon after their marriage Mr. Elwin removed his young wife from the home of her youth and placed her amid his own relatives and friends, in a small village in the interior of the State; and this was really a relief to Cecilia as well as to himself; for the coldness and indifference of those who should have loved, cherished, and never forsaken her, was hard for her to bear.

Her husband was kind and affectionate to her, and his sisters received her warmly and were very attentive to her. They really loved the beautiful, sad-looking creature who had been cast among them so much a stranger, and strove to interest her and make her happy. Mr. Elwin did well in business for some time; but he was an unskilful manager, and through misfortune and going security for friends—or those who pretended to be such—he soon became involved and lost everything; his wife's property all went to pay the liabilities of others, and six years after their marriage saw her destitute and suffering, with two small children. She endeavored to cheer and stimulate her husband to energy and perseverance; but without effect. He became more and more depressed every day. About this time there was a lottery drawn, and he determined to try in this way to retrieve his broken fortune. If he drew a prize he would be able to begin again in the world with every advantage with which he had at first commenced. He bought tickets; and what was his surprise and joy when he drew a capital prize! How many good resolutions he formed, how many earnest protestations of being more careful, attentive, and letting other men pay their own debts!

Cecilia's home was once more not only comfortable, but luxurious, for Mr. Elwin was by no means a close or mercenary man. Her home was ever bountifully supplied, and if wealth could have rendered her happy, she would have been so. But how incompetent is this to satisfy the human heart! She yearned for the affection and love of her relatives. Visions of her childhood's home, and of the pale, mournful face and dark expressive eyes of her mother, came up from the shadowy depths of memory, and she

Low on the gentle breast that lulled her first to sleep."

As years sped on, her eldest child, a pale, fragile bud, increased in health and strength, and now the lights and shadows which speak the woman, were to be seen on her placid brow, the lights and shades that time was yet to prove more bright in prosperity, or more dark in woe.—Again had Mr. Elwin become involved, and was daily expecting to fail; it was evident that he could not much longer sustain himself. He grew restless, and his brow became sterner and more lowering every day. Mrs. Elwin's health had been failing rapidly for some time, and as she viewed the suffering of her husband through the day, and watched his disturbed slumbers, she needed not to be told that his business was in a precarious condition. She grieved much that this should be the case, for she felt confident that her life was fast drawing to a close; and she thought, with unutterable anguish, on the helpless, destitute condition in which her children would be left.—But as spring approached she rallied, and was even able to leave her couch and take gentle exercise in the open air. Alline, her eldest child, was now her constant companion. They had been obliged to remove from their home in town to one in the outskirts of the village; this was a small tenement which could boast of nothing more than comfort and a cheerful appearance. The yard was well filled with shade trees and shrubbery, and though humble the abode, the hand of woman, natural taste and a devoted love of flowers, soon gave to it a cool, refreshing, if not happy look; situated too, as it was, among many others utterly devoid of outward improvements. An old fence enclosed the yard; a well of good water, a dairy, and an old barn completed the outward appearance of Mrs. Elwin's lowly but not quite desolate home.

Alline was just entering on womanhood—a time when should begin joyous anticipations, bright hopes and sunny hours; but which more often enters with care and anxiety, trouble and sorrow. Just entering on womanhood! Ah no! Young as she was trouble had done a work which it would have taken years to have wrought under different circumstances. She was already a woman. She had suffered much care, anxiety and sorrow, much loss of heart, and could scarce remember when she was not a woman. For long weary months, which had gradually lengthened into years, she had been the companion, child, and friend; yes, the comforter, soother, and blessing of her pale, suffering mother; and to her had been committed the care of her dark-eyed loving little sister. Many were the hours of care and fatigue she experienced, with nothing to lighten her burdens but the tears she shed, and the prayers for strength which were offered up from her sad heart. From dark thoughts and weary household duties, she often turned to wipe the tear of sorrow from the pale cheek of her mother, and to speak words of comfort to her wearied father. Watching beside her mother's painful bed she would shake off her own sadness and by her cheerful conversation seek to sustain the drooping hearts of those beloved ones, but her efforts were not blessed as she hoped they might be, for Mrs. Elwin's health failed rapidly after her removal to her humble abode.

It was a bright, beautiful Spring morning that dawned on this little home of suffering, and Alline, with her young heart, though tried sorely, could not repress the yearning after that happiness which all around seemed so much to enjoy. The flowers were fresh and fair, the dewy grass shone with its thousand crystal drops, the birds sang merrily as if in praise and devotion to the Dispenser of so much joy and beauty. And could her heart be sad when all else was gay? No; she strove to forget her weariness and trouble, to lighten her own bosom by encouraging hopes, which, though fleeting and visionary, served for a time to divert her mind and shed a bright though transient beam into the desolate chambers of her heart.—She had, on this morning, after attending to her father's breakfast, dressing little Mary and soothing her childish irritableness, turned with fond devotion to her mother, who, from the painful cough and restless slumber which always characterized the first portion of the night, had sunk into a sound, and Alline hoped, a refreshing sleep. She moved carefully about the room that she might not disturb her, and after she had seen to the wants of all, and placed every thing in order about the little room, she drew her chair near the couch to await the awakening of her mother. She watched the calm brow and sunken cheek till the delicate hue of carmine deepened into the bright color of perfect health. And oh, how she exulted in the hope that this sudden improvement might not pass away. While she thus watched, Mrs. Elwin's heavy sleep of exhaustion terminated in a low moan, which was succeeded by a convulsive fit of coughing. Alline gently raised the emaciated form and placed the pillows comfortably about her that she might recline in a sitting position; after the cough subsided and rest had been obtained. Alline wiped the damp dew from the pale forehead, and combing out the long tresses of dark hair, turned them over her fingers, letting them fall from her skilful hands in long, bright curls. She loved thus to look on the beauty which sorrow and sickness had failed to destroy.

"Dear mother! how beautiful you must have been in youth," she exclaimed with enthusiasm. A slight tinge of red deepened the glow already kindled upon Mrs. Elwin's cheek by the fires of consumption, and her lustrous eyes filled with tears, for Alline's words had called up many fond bright memories of the spring-time of her youth, and her lips quivered as she looked upon her child and thought of the sad privation and fatigue to which her youth was subjected, and what farther trials awaited her in the future. "Come, my child," she said, "bind up this heavy hair, and sit down and read to me. I have no time to spend in useless regrets, or waste in foolish vanity."

Alline hastened to obey; gently she fastened up the shining curls and laid the tired head upon the snowy pillow. As evening approached Mrs. Elwin appeared better; but it was only the delusive precursor of death, which is so characteristic of consumption.

This disease, while it lends beauty and etherialness to its victims, is sipping its very life springs up. Yes, it awoke but the confirmed belief, the blissful hope, that the loved one will be soon restored to health, to love and happiness, when it drawn near and clasps it in its delusive embrace and lays it low in the ground. But this evanescent strength and sudden improvement of her mother gave hope to all of her recovery to Alline.

A LEAF FOR LITTLE LADIES.

THE RUBY AND THE CORN-SEED.

"I was found in the bed of a river at the Island of Ceylon," said the Ruby to the little grain of Corn. "Ganem the slave found me, and his eyes sparkled with joy when he beheld me; for I was to all the other rubies in the bed as the morn is to the stars. The slave-owner gave each year a large reward to him who found the finest ruby, and I was the largest and reddest ever known. It took me three hundred years to grow! Ganem took me up carefully and held me to the sun—which in my native place is brighter in winter than in this cold country at the hight of summer. I glistened like a red star. He carried me off in triumph to his master, who shouted for joy when he beheld me; then he gave Ganem a large reward, set a great price upon me, and packed me up, in an ivory casket, with soft feathers and down for me to rest on, and all alone—not like the common rubies, that were piled up on top of one another. He took me to the captain of a large ship, and said: "This is a fine ruby, fit for a princess!"

"He thought I did not hear him, but I did and sparkled all the while; and as soon as the captain was instructed what to do with me, we sailed away. When we were well over the sea, he took me from the case and showed me to some beautiful ladies, who immediately fell longing to possess me; but I was too costly for them; and great honors awaited me in this country you call England. So I came over the broad sea, and on the first day of our arrival the captain took me to the lapidary's, that I might be put in gold, and otherwise fitted for the service of a princess.

"Every body who saw me wondered at my size and brilliancy, and I was given to the most skillful workman to be carved and polished."

"That must have hurt you very much," said the Corn-seed modestly, "to be carved and polished into all those squares!"

"Not at all," said the Ruby: "it only shows me off the better. It took the man three weeks to carve me; and the merchant to whom I was sold came every day to see how I was going on. When every thing was finished, he took me to a place full of gold and silver and bright stones—but I was the brightest of all; and all the people in the street stopped to look at me, exclaiming: 'What a beautiful Ruby!'

"One day there came a young lady the fairest I had ever seen—perhaps you never saw a lady!" said the Ruby, interrogatively, to the Corn-seed.

"No," replied the Corn-seed; "only the village girls that came gleaning."

"Well," answered Ruby, in the tone of one who prides himself on knowing a thing or two; "well, a young lady is the most beautiful thing in the world—except a ruby; and this was the most beautiful of all the ladies, and a real princess. They bought diamonds and emeralds, the best of all there were, and then my lord—they all called him lord—took the princess back to her carriage; but as he went out I caught his eye, and he came back and looked at me, taking a little gold band out of a case he had to measure me by, then he purchased me for a large sum in gold, and put me in the case with the plain gold band—this was called the wedding-ring—and we soon became friends.

"I was taken home to a grand palace, and my lord put a little scrap of paper by my side, and told a lady to lay me on her pillow: so at night, when all were asleep, I was taken into her room and laid down beside her. All this while she slept, and I could feel her soft warm breath. Once she laid her hand so that it touched me; and I blushed redder than ever! It was summer, and the sun stole through the curtains very early, and its beams lighted me up like a red fire, when she woke and found me lying there.

"I never can tell you," continued the pompous Ruby, "the delight she showed on beholding me! She kissed me over and over again, holding me now in the sun, now in the shade, and trying me by turns on every finger. She read the note that had lain by my side over and over again. Ladies came to dress her, and I all the while lay on her table. They robed her in silk, and put orange-blossoms in her hair; and when every thing was finished, she put me on her dainty finger. There was a long train of ladies, but none were half so beautiful as she. We all went in carriages to a beautiful church, where my lord was waiting for us, and they began to be married. When she took off her glove, I sparkled so that nobody could help looking at me; and when the lord saw me, he blushed, and raised his eyes to hers, quite full of joy: then he said some words, and put the gold band on the next finger to me, and all the people looked at me the while.

"Were you much grander," said the Seed, "than all the beautiful ladies!"

"Oh! yes," saye Ruby: "I was brighter and fairer than all. We went over the sea to lands where every thing is more beautiful than here; and wherever her grabe went, I went too. We never parted even while she slept, till I was taken off her finger to be set and polished again, when the young lord stole me for a plaything and let me drop here. But I know she can not live without me, and to-morrow they will fetch me back again."

The Ruby and the Seed were lying close together, in one of those verdant green lanes that make the country so beautiful. All through spring and summer it was full of sweet flowers. The May was there, in "taste of rosy-tinted snow." Primroses grew in clusters on the banks among the moss; and fox-gloves and blue-bells, and all the sweet wild-flowers were there. How many of us, dear reader, remember such a scene, associated with the dearest recollections of our lives!

It was autumn: the little grain of seed had fallen from the bundle of a village-gleaner as she passed home, laughing with her companions, through the lane, with the shock upon her head. The ruby had been dropped by the children from the Abbey, while they played there in the morning.

So they came to lie side by side in the still green lane, when the Ruby told its grand history to the Seed. But with all its fine airs, that little seed didn't envy it—no; though it looked at its bright color out in so many squares, and the gold chased round with flowers. It looked at its own plain brown coat, with the white seam running down it, and thought of its quiet life and the mission it had to fill on earth.

"Pray tell me," said the Ruby, "how you live here: it must be wearisome to drone away one's life in these dull fields. I never was in the country here before."

"Oh! I have not seen much; and it will not interest you, who came from so fine a country," said the Seed. "My parent was a seed just like myself, and early last spring was put in a field not far from here, with hundreds of other seeds, and the rain fell, and the sun brought it into life: so its roots spread out in the earth; then it unfolded a tiny leaf, that shot up towards the sun, and one by one, another and another leaf, as green as emeralds; then there came a stem from among the blades, and folded in this was a tiny ear, that held a hundred homes, and each home had its baby grain, and the ear grew till, one sunny day, it burst out of the leaves, and stood straight on the stem; and each little grain was folded in a leaf; so nothing could hurt it. The field looked beautiful! All the long ears waved at once, and rose again when the breeze had passed away. There was a lark's-nest on the ground where I grew, and they used to fly up into heaven and fill all the fields with music. The little grains grew larger every day, and silver bell-like flowers came out on every grain and trembled all day long in the sunlight. When they fell off, all the ears caught the color of the sun, and changed from green to gold, and ripened: so the farmer came and cut us all down, and frightened away the larks, setting us in large shocks about the field. All but a few ears were carried away in a large wagon far out of the field. I fell out of the bundle, and the gleaners picked me up; but I was shaken from the rest as they carried them home—so we came to lie together."

"What were those birds like?" said the Ruby, very patronizingly, for it had compared the Seed's history with its own experiences, and was disposed to assert its superiority.

"Covered all over with white spots," replied the Seed; "brown and white, with black bars on their wings, and long, slender legs, that took them all over the field to find food for their young ones."

"Ha!" said Ruby, "you should see the birds in my country: they are all purple and gold—some nearly as bright as myself!"

"And do they sing sweetly!" asked the Seed.

"All day and night, and all through the year, for we have no winter there. The corn grows as high as your trees, and every house is a palace."

It was dark, and the laborers were coming home through this lane, talking, and the Ruby said to itself: "They will see me, and I shall be taken to the Abbey; but they must not find me talking with this poor Seed."

So it stopped boasting about its own country, and the Seed lay still, thinking how grand it must be: for it didn't know the Ruby was false and deceitful, despising all the things around, that it might seem the grander itself.

One of the men set his heavy heel on the Ruby, and beat the gold out of form, crushing it into the earth almost out of sight; and his heel went on the Seed too, and pressed that into the ground; but it was elastic, and gave way to the pressure; so when the foot was gone it resumed its proper form: but there lay the Ruby, dirty and hidden; so there was no chance of its being found.—The Seed was quite lost, so it spent the night in discontented regret as its hard fortune.

Winter came snow and rain; the fields were white with frost. There were no leaves and no flowers in the lane now, but the Seed and Ruby were still there. They never spoke now: the Seed was getting ready for the spring, and quite tired of the pompous histories about the Ruby country.

The snow melted, and the white blossom came out on the leafless black thorn; the violets came, and the primroses peeped out of the moss on the banks. A little green blade came up by the side of the Ruby, which lay there blacker than ever; for the snow, which warmed the Seed, had tarnished its coat.

The sun shone; the birds sang; the rain fell, and the blade became a stem, and the stem grew into an ear, just as the Seed described. It didn't heed the Ruby now; it was busy being useful. The silver-bells came out, and fell away; the ear grew gold and ripe, and a little child plucked it. Now it happened that she who plucked the ear had a garden by her cottage, and when spring came again, she scattered the grains of corn from that ear upon the ground, and they came up and multiplied as the Seed from which they sprang had done in the lane; and when the autumn came they were garnered, and there was enough to plant a field; so the laborer, whose little daughter Alice had plucked the ear, went to the farmer, who lent him a field to grow his corn in. Half was to be the farmer's for the land, and half his who had the seed: and when the summer came, there was a beautiful field full of corn, waving in the sunlight; and they called it Alice's field because she got the first seed, and when the corn was ripe, they gathered it, the farmer had and the laborer half; and there was enough to feed them all the winter and plant again in spring. This was all being performed by the one little Seed the Ruby had spoken so slightingly to while it was lying black and useless in the earth.

Let us be thankful for the corn-seed: it is a jewel worth more than all the rubies of Ceylon, richer than emerald or diamond. Lay these in the earth, they are dull and fruitless; but the seed will grow and multiply to feed the hungry!

MORAL.

THE LIVINGSTONE EXPEDITION.

Mrs. Livingstone, the wife of Dr. Livingstone, has just arrived from the Cape, per Mr. Duncan Dunbar's ship Victoria. At the railway station, the same of Dr. Livingstone on the luggage having caught the eye of the bystanders, she and her sable attendant were soon surrounded by a crowd eager again to see the great geographer. Upon being informed, however, that he was still in the centre of Africa, they wern-heartedly inquired respecting his health, and shook hands with her. Mrs. Livingstone having proceeded from the Cape on a visit about 800 miles into the interior to her father the renowned missionary Moffat, returned to the Cape, upon his journeying again north to see Moselekatse, where he hoped to hear of his son in-law. The missionaries from the Leyden society had already proceeded onwards to Skelets and the Mekolole. Mrs. Livingstone has brought with her an interesting additios to her family in the person of another little daughter, born in Africa; and has come with the hope of proceeding with the steamer about to be sent by Government to the Zambesi, end of at length rejoining her heroic husband.

MASON AND DIXON'S LINE.

On the 4th of August, 1763, Thomas and Richard Penn and Lord Baltimore, being together in London, agreed with Charles Mason and Jeremiah Dixon, two mathematicians or surveyors, to mark, run out, settle, and fix the boundary line between Maryland on the one hand, and Delaware and Pennsylvania on the other. Mason and Dixon landed in Philadelphia on the 15 of November following, and began their work at once. They adopted the peninsular lines, and the radius and tangent point of the circular, of their predecessors. They next ascertained the north-eastern coast of Maryland, and proceeded to run the dividing parallel of latitude. They pursued this parallel a distance of 23 miles, 18 chains and twenty-one links from the place of beginning at the north-east corner of Maryland to the bottom of a valley on Dunkard creek, where an Indian War Path crossed their route; and here on the 18th of November 1767—ninety-three years ago—their Indian escort told them it were the will of the Sioux Nation that the surveys should cease, and they terminated accordingly, leaving thirty-six miles, six chains, and fifty links, as the exact distance remaining to be run west to the south-west angle of Pennsylvania, not far from the Bound Tree Tunnel on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. Dixon died at Durham, England, 1777; Mason died in Pennsylvania, 1787.

THE DANGER OF MASQUERADING.—A JUDGE MISTAKEN FOR AN ESCAPED CONVICT.—The Cleveland (Ohio) Plaindealer says that recently a leading citizen having been invited to a perlor masquerade, resolved to go, and to make his disguise impenetrable, sent to Columbus for a convict's full suit. It arrived in due time, and about 9 o'clock on the evening of the masquerade the Judge put it on, covered himself with a light cloak and sallied forth. A violent wind prevailed, and one of the gusts took the Judge's cloak off and sent it whirling into the air. He sprang to recover it, and at the same time a watchman sprang for him. The Judge got his cloak, however, before the watchman got him, and started on a fast run, hotly pursued by the watchman. The Judge saw it all. The watchman mistook him for a regular escaped convict. If caught it would be unpleasant. The watchman saw it all, too. Here was a chance to distinguish himself, and perhaps to make something by it. The race became exciting. Fortunately for the Judge it happened on a back street. The race continued. The watchman was reinforced by another watchman, and both pursued the Judge at a furious pace. The Judge finally yielded, and made the watchmen, after considerable trouble, understand who he was and what he was about. He was then suffered to proceed on his way. He told his wife, who said she would never say anything about it, and that is how it got out.

A RICH ROAD.—We learn, says the Columbus (Ga.) Times that the Mobile and Girard Railroad Company bee received from the General Land Office at Washington returns showing the amount of lands donated to that company by the act of Congress. It will be remembered that the act gave them alternate sections of land to the distance of six miles from the road on either side thereof, and, in the event that any sections or parts of sections had been previously disposed of by the Government, they could go to the limit of 15 miles. The calculation has been made at head quarters, and the road is informed that it is entitled under the act to 347,000 acres of land. This, if sold at Government price, would bring in round numbers $430 000. Much the larger proportion of it, however, is worth a great deal more. There are thousands of acres lying in some of the richest valleys in Alabama, and on Mobile river, which most command from $5 to $20 per acre. This accession to its resources will materially improve the prospects of the road, and should cause an immediate appreciation in the value of the stock.

A SPLENDID SIGHT.—The Illinois Central Railroad, at a town called Mattoon, is crossed by the Terre Haute and Alton Railroad. Every day, at about 2 P. M., is seen at this point one of the most splendid effects of triumph of mind over space and matter that can be witnessed anywhere. It is that of four trains coming from four different directions, arriving at this point at the same time to a second every day. They can be seen as they approach for ten miles in each direction, the prairies there being a smooth, broad expanse stretching away to the horizon without any inequalities to obstruct the sight. As they arrive they approach their cow-catchers within twelve feet of each other, as though exchanging salutations, when gracefully backing, as though bowing an adieu, two of the trains go on the switches, while the other two scream away over the iron-bound prairie. The trains then let go on the main tracks again, and they are off and away.

THE MOUNTAIN MEADOW MASSACRE.—The bleached remains of the emigrant party massacred at the Mountain Meadow, in Utah, have been collected into a single grave, and a stone monument, conical in form, fifty feet in height, now marks the spot where they rest. This is surmounted by a cross of red cedar, twelve feet in height, on which is carved the following inscription: "Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord." On the base of the monument stands a granite slab, into which are cut the words, "Here 120 men, women and children were massacred in cold blood, early in September, 1857. They were from Arkansas."

A MOTHER, IN SPORT, KILLS HER CHILD!—The Hamilton (O.) Telegraph says: Last Tuesday, a little child of Mrs. Shaffer, who lives in Germantown, got possession of an old pistol and snapped it several times, after which she handed it to her mother, and said in a playful manner, "shoot me, mother!" Mrs. Shaffer took the pistol and pointed the muzzle towards her child and pulled the trigger, exploding the cap and sending a ball through the child's head, killing it instantly. The pistol had not been discharged for more than a year, and was supposed not to be loaded.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

REV. JAMES REAMES was born in Virginia in 1781. He was raised in South Carolina. In 1800, in company with his oldest brother, William, he moved to Mississippi, and from there to Louisiana, and engaged in overseeing near where the town of Jackson now stands. About the time of the change of government, the first Methodist preachers visited this wilderness country. In 1812, under the plain, pungent preaching of Rev. Lewis Hobbs, bro. Reames was first convicted of sin. The struggle was not long. He soon found peace through the blood of atonement. He immediately united with the M. E. Church as one of the first fruits of our ministry in this vicinity. In December of the same year he was united in marriage to Elizabeth H. Tabor, daughter of Rev. Mr. Tabor. They both still live to mourn his loss, but will be with the summons that shall call them to rest unbroken and rest. Brother Reames was immediately appointed a class-leader, and soon felt that he was called to preach. He consulted not with flesh and blood; he solicited an exhorter for five years; was then licensed to preach, and labored as a local preacher as long as his physical strength would permit. For many years he had been the child of affliction. Yet he complained not. And as age and infirmity increased, faith and love increased also. The Messenger finally came. He was ready; and on the 22d of March, 1860, in the 79th year of his age, he fell asleep in Jesus. He rests from his labors and his works do follow him. Brother Reames was a good and useful preacher. He was long one of the main supports of Methodism to this part of the country. His house was always the weary itinerant's home. He was a merciful master, an affectionate husband, and a kind parent. A large family of children and grand-children, mostly brought into the Church, by the savor of his teaching and example, are left behind to revere his memory. Thus passes, from day to day, the faithful pioneers of our beloved Methodism.

PROGRESS OF PROTESTANTISM IN MISSISSIPPI AND THE SOUTH-WEST.—No. XVIII.

Ma. Editon—In a previous number I briefly sketched the introduction of the Methodist Episcopal Church into Mississippi by Rev. Tobias Gibson, of the South Carolina Conference, in 1779, and of his being reinforced by Moses Floyd, in 1803, and further by Hezekiah Harrinon and Abraham Amos, in 1804, in which year Mr. Gibson died. I now propose to give a brief outline of the progress of our branch of the Protestant church in this country, with an occasional sketch of some of the ministers and laymen who were prominent actors in its achievments.

Previous to 1802 the vast domain designated as "the Natchez country," was considered an out post of the South Carolinn Conference. In 1801 it was included in the Georgia District, which was presided over that year by Stith Mead. In 1802 it was attached to the Kentucky District of the famous Western Conference, which was bounded on the east by the Apalachian Chain, on the north by the Canadian Lakes, on the south by the Gulf coast, and on the west by sun set, or as near thereunto as Anglo-Saxon feet "had trod the soil." William M'Kendree was the Presiding Elder that year, but I presume left the far off Natchez country to be managed by its pastor, Tobias Gibson. In 1803 it was included in the Cumberland District, with John Pugo for Presiding Elder. Nashville and Natchez were both embraced in that little district of four circuits. Natchez continued in the Cumberland District until 1806, when it was constituted a seprate district called Mississippi, including four circuits, with Learner Blackman for Presiding Elder. Previous to this date the whole country had been included in one vast circuit, which was served with only two effective preachers. The District as now set off includes Natchez, Claiborne, Wilkinson and Opelousas circuits. This is the first time any portion of Louisiana is mentioned as included in the regular work, though, no doubt, portions of it had received occasional visits from the pioneer preachers before. I think it probable that no Presiding Elder had officially visited the country until Learner Blackman came in 1806. The District was continued under the same Presidiog Elder in 1807, with the addition of Onachitta (Washita) circuit, in the northern part of Louisiana; and the same in 1808, except that Jacob Young was Presiding Elder; and the same in 1809 and 1810 with John M'Clure presiding elder. In 1811 Miles Harper was Presiding Elder on the Mississippi District, and Amite circuit, embracing a large scope of country in and adjacent to the valley of Amite river, both in Mississippi and Louisiana, was added, and Opelousas circuit was divided, one part being called Rapides, and the other Attakapas. In 1812 Samuel Dunwody, of the South Carolinn Conference, was Presiding Elder, and New Orleans and Tombeebee were added as additional charges. This is the first mention of any work being recognized in the Alabama portion of the Territory, and it was well manned the first year with William Houston and Isaac Quinn.

The Tennessee Conference having been organized in 1813, the Mississippi District was included in it, with Samuel Sellers Presiding Elder. With the addition of a new Circuit, called Pearl River, the District had become large enough to justify a division. This division was called for especially by the annual inundations of the Mississippi River, which rendered it extremely difficult, not to say impossible, several months in the year, for the Presiding Elder to cross from one side to the other. Accordingly the Louisiana District was set off with Miles Harper as Presiding Elder, who was required, in the meantime, to supply Washita circuit as preacher in charge. From this time a new era commenced in the history of our church in Mississippi and Louisiana. The distance and danger of traveling through the Indian nations during the war of 1812 to 1815 to the places of holding the Tennessee Conference was too great to justify the journey, and consequent expense and loss of time, so that the preachers with unanimity declined going. In view of these facts the General Conference of 1812 had authorized the organization of an Annual Conference in this country, whenever it should be deemed necessary. Accordingly the preachers laboring sooth of the Indian nations assembled on the 1st of November, 1813, at the residence of Rev. Newit Trick, a local preacher living near Spring Hill Church, in Jefferson county, Mississippi, and organized themselves into a quasi Conference. They had anticipated the presence of Bishop Roberts, and had he attended it would have fully legalized their Conference, but a communication from the Bishop, accompanied with an address from the Tennessee Conference, informed them that he could not come in consequence of the great danger of attempting to pass through the Indian tribes, excited as they were by the breaking out of the war. The Bishop advised them to transact the business of an Annual Conference, and appointed Samuel Sellers to preside. This first informal Conference was composed of Samuel Sellers, Miles Harper, Lewis Hobbs, Thomas Griffin, John S. Ford, William Winans, Richmond Nolley, and John Shrock. William Winans was elected Secretary, and the business was conducted in regular order. Jonathan Kemp, Simon Gentry, Thomas Amens, Peter James, and Josinh B. Daughtry were admitted on trial; Thomas Griffin, John S. Ford and William Winans were elected to Elder's orders; Lewis Hobbs was placed in a supernumerated relation; Miles Harper was located at his own request; and Randall Gibson and George Fletcher were elected to Deacon's orders as local preachers. The minutes of this informal Conference were sent to the Tennessee Conference for confirmation, which invested its transactions with complete ecclesiastical authority.

Three other similar Conferences were held without a Bishop, at which they received and elected preachers to orders, passed upon each other's character, collected their statistics, planned their work, assigned the preachers to their fields of labor, and then sent their minutes to the Tennessee Conference for approval, in order to their incorporation in the general minutes. As the British and Indian war was raging in 1814, the minutes of this inelpient Conference either were not sent that year, or failed to reach their destination, which accounts for their non-appearance in the general minutes of that date. The General Conference met in the city of Baltimore, May 1st, 1816, and on the 18th of the month, the Mississippi Conference was set off from the Tennessee Conference, which is the "mother of us all," though we are still glad to acknowledge the old western Conference as our grandmother. The act of the General Conference which legalized our existence as a Conference, reads thus, "The Mississippi Conference shall include all the State of Louisiana south of the Arkansas, and all the Mississippi Territory south of the Tennessee river," which Territory then extended eastward to the Chattahoochie river. A reasonable portion of Territory this for the occopancy of ten preachers! Plenty of room for "scope and verge." No danger of getting in each other's way, or complaints of being crowded. Latitude and longitude enough for all practical purpdes. Thank yoo, mother Temessee, for such a rich inheritance! It is true it has cost us an inculculable amount of bone and shiew, mind and money, to bring it into an advanced state of cultivation, but by the blessing of God we have succeeded, and where toiled and suffered the originl ten, we now have several flourishing Annual Conferences, numbering hundreds of able ministers of the New Testamen. I sometimes hope, Mr. Editor, that I may yet have time before I die to write some sketches of Itineracy as it was carried on in the original Mississippi Conference. O, sir, we had pleasure in those days, such as our juniors, who are smothered up in their little circuits and town stations, with steamboats and railroads to take them to Conference, will never know! A local preacher, in my knowledge, was once employed to fill the place of an absentee on a circuit for a term. On returning from his first round he gave it as his settled conviction, "that it took a very enterprising man to travel a circuit." And so it did in those days. He had to brave all sorts of weather, all stages of water, rides of all rideable distances, and lood and lodging of all varieties. But there was a bright side to all this. There was the pleasure of ever varying scenery, and the romance of adventure. If we had not time and books and composure to get up a new sermon, the one we preached yesterday would do for to-morrow, as we would be twenty or thirty miles away from all who had heard it before. If we got in the brush in preaching to-day, we had no time for a conference with "blue devils," but a fair chance to strike fire and burn out at the appointment to-morrow.

At the first legal Conference, Thomas Griffin was appointed Presiding Elder on the Mississippi District, to which had been added a new circuit called Chickasawhay, and Ashley Howit was appointed Presiding Elder on the Louisiana District, and also preacher in charge of Washita circuit. There had been a slow but steady increase of membership up to the formation of the Conference, at which time there were 1531 white, and 410 colored members. And now, Mr. Editor, I ask your readers to excuse me awhile from these statistical matters. It is true they are necessary and somewhat interesting, but they are rather too dry. I wish next to begin to say something of the men who were foremost in laying the foundation upon which we are building to-day.

J. G. Jones.

KENTIGERN.

Of Kentigern there is no contemporary record.—Adamnan's "Life of Columba," written eighty years after his death, mentions him as friend and contemporary of Columba. Bede is wholly silent regarding him. All that we can tell concerning him is gathered from a monkish life of him written in 1180 by Monk Joceline of Furness, at the bidding of Joceline, then Bishop of Glasgow. He too must build his new cathedral; and he sets about it in the approved way of the time, not so unlike our own plan. "He published," says an antiquarian writer already quoted, "a book, and set an association on foot. The book was a new 'Life and Miracles of St. Kentigern,' written by one of the most popular biographers of the day, Brother Joceline of Furness.—Besides other claims to interest, the skill with which it addresses itself to its object challenges praise. Nothing is omitted which could excite the faithful to be generous, nothing which could magnify the see of Glasgow." This book, then, of Monk Joceline may be regarded as the "brief put forth by the members of the Glasgow Cathedral Building Society" in order to raise the wind. In his preface, Brother Jocelino tells us that he had seen two older lives of Kentigern, one in barbarous Scottish style, the other of doubtful orthodoxy—that is, in the eyes of an ecclesiastic of the twelfth century—and that from them he had collected much material, which he dresses up in his own rhetorical garb. We have been thus minute in describing this life, from which our facts are taken, that our readers, knowing exactly whence they come, may take them for what they are worth, and no more.

The life opens with a strange, wild legend of our saint's birth: how that his mother, having been sent afloat in a small boat all alone, was drifted from the East Lothian coast up the Forth, till the boat came ashore at Culross, in Fife. There she brought forth her son on the open shore, and mother and child were found in the morning by the embers of a dying fire, and brought by shepherds to St. Serf. This old saint is said to have been ordained by Palladius, in his youth to have gone as missionary to the Orkneys, in his old age to have lived near Culross, instructing children in the Holy Scriptures. A gentle old man, from whose hand robins would feed, and sit beside him as he prayed. His name still clings to an island in Lochleven, on which he is said to have lived. St. Serf sheltered the mother and her bairn, and in due time baptized both, calling the mother Tanen, the boy Kyentyern, or Kentigern.—Tanen, in after ages, had a church dedicated to her in Glasgow, which the moderns have, ludicrously enough, corrupted into St. Enoch's. The boy lived on with him, and was educated by him, till in time the old man got to love him beyond all his pupils, even as his own son—another Samuel under another Eli. Apt to learn, loving, loved by all, he was called by the people no longer Kentigern, but Mungo; that is, Dear Friend.

Loved by all, except some of his compeers. They grew jealous—it is human nature—of this wonderfully "good boy," with his marvellous gifts and strange miracle-working powers, already beginning to peep out, hated him, bullied him, as boys will do, and made his life wretched. He tried to win them, but could not. So Kentigern began to bethink him that here was no longer his right place, that God had something else in store for him. Therefore, after committing himself to Him in prayer, the young saint arose, left St. Serf silently, and took his way Westward till he came to a great water, probably the Forth river, where was no bridge nor ford. But our young friend put forth his strange miraculous power, and crossed it as if on dry land. From the further bank, looking back, he saw on the other side the old saint, who, still in hand, had pursued him as fast as his old limbs could, crying after him, from the other shore, "Why have you left me? what have I done that you should leave me so? Desert me not in my old age; return, stay with me and close my eyes." Kentigern, with tears, replied in the spirit, if not the words in which many a missionary since has met remonstrative friends—

"I hearn voice you cannot hear,
Which says I must not stay;
I see a hand you cannot see,
Which beckons me away."

"Pray for me, then," cried St. Serf, "that I may be conveyed over to thee. I will become, from a father, a son to thee, from teacher, pupil, and will dwell beside thee till I die."

"Nay, father, it must not be. Return to thy home, and the Lord requite thee many fold for all the kindness thou hast showed to me!"

Then they mutually blessed each other, and said farewell. St. Serf returned to his own home. Kentigern went forward on his way. They saw each other's faces no more in this world.

The young missionary went on till he reached the neighborhood of what has since become Glasgow. The only human thing there then was the cemetery, consecrated more than a century before by St. Ninian. Near this he fixed his abode, and began his missionary work. His gifts and his sanctity were soon noised abroad, and reached the ears of the King of Strathclyde, who then had his dwelling on the top of Alclith—that is, Dumbarton Rock, the Dun of the Britons. King, clergy, and Christian people, what few of these there might be, came to Kentigern, and chose him for their bishop. Our young saint, then only twenty-five, pleads youth, unfitness, desire for retirement and contemplative life. But king, clergy, and people will take no refusal. An Irish bishop is summoned, for there is none in Scotland, to consecrate him; and Kentigern is ordained bishop by the hands of one bishop, contrary, confessus Monk Joceline, to our orthodox Roman usage, which requires three. So that, if Ninian received his teaching and orders from Rome, Kentigern received his from Ireland, as also did Columba. Scotland, therefore, owes fully more of her Christianity to Ireland than to Rome. His episcopal seat the new bishop fixes at Deschu, (Dear Family, the etymology is Joceline's,) now Glasgow. No bishop's palace there then, such as we are apt to fancy; but a cave perhaps, at best, a wooden hut. And so the kingdom of Strathclyde existed during that sixth century.—The king on Dumbarton Rock—the missionary bishop in his hut or cave by the Molendinar burn of Glasgow. "There, beneath the venerable trees of St. Ninian's cemetary, a little church and monastery of wood soon arose. From this, as the chief seat of his mission, St. Kentigern, the St. Mungo of our people, spread or restored Christianity throughout the whole extent of the British kingdom of Cumbria, from Lochlomond, near Stirling, to Appleby and Windermere. Glasgow became the ecclesiastical centre of this extensive region—the spiritual mother of all the Welsh tribes of Reged wide and fair Strathclyde."

His life was divided into two very distinct, almost opposite portions—boundless and unwearied activity, and intense asceticism and solitary contemplation. Instead, however, of being opposed, the retirement and solitude, which made up one part of his life, fed his soul with energy for the other.

He traversed without ceasing the wide kingdom, places one hundred miles apart, on foot, to his last day, like the apostles. By his preaching he converts many pagans, restores many who had lapsed from the faith; for heresy, Pelagian and other, has been rife after Ninian's time in the North. He casts down temples and shrines of devils, (Druidical or pagan Roman ones, or both, the monk must mean,) builds churches where he can, of wood and wattles doubtless, ordains clergy, dissolves unnatural marriages, changes concubinage into lawful matrimony.

Asceticism, the form of monasticism, newly come from the East, was spreading over Western Europe; and, in all the strength of its first fervor, was attracting most strongly the noblest natures. A new road to sanctity it seemed, a shorter road to heaven. In his private life Kentigern was a saint of this pattern, new then, but which continued to be the type of saintship for a thousand years in Europe, till Luther came; tried it for himself, and found it wanting. All the year round, except on church festivals, he practised the most unsparing austerity in food, sleep, clothing; took all most severe measures to mortify the flesh; would fast for three or four days on end. When he did eat it was only the sparest diet, bread, milk, pulse, no meat; wine never passing his lips. If at any time he dined with the king on Dunbarton Rock, and had to relax somewhat, he returned home to revenge this on himself by redoubled severities. His bed, a bare hole, hollowed out of a rock, like a cave; his pillow a stone. From this hard couch he would rise at midnight for prayer, and sing through all the Psalter. In the morning he rose to his stone bath, a trough scooped out of the rock, and into this he plunged, even when it was thick with ice, the coldest weather, the wildest storm, never stopt him. So that Kentigern did not, like some monks we have read of, reckon filth a virtue.

His dress, a rough goats'-hair garment next his skin, a fisher's cloak closely girt round him, over all the priest's white alb and stole. In his hand a crooked staff of rough wood, not gilded and gemmed, says Joceline, like the crosier of our later bishops. When Lent comes, he redoubles his severities, withdraws for forty days into the wilderness, in remembrance of John the Baptist and our Lord. There gives himself wholly to prayer and meditation, living all the while on nothing but the roots he gathers. Once or twice only, during the forty days, he visits his brethren for episcopal duties, and returns. His dwelling, all the while, a cave. At the mouth of it, we see him standing and praying during a tempest; and when the lightning and whirlwind are over, gazing on the skirts of the departing storm, and rejoicing to feel once more the spring breeze on his cheek. When Easter-day dawned, he returned to his monastery, and kept the fast with great joy. Afterwards he feasted cheerfully with his brother monks, and a great multitude of the poor.

By this life of blended activity and retirement, his influence waxed great in all Strathclyde. For what exact reason does not appear, but in time King Morken gets envious of the saint, perhaps just because he is a better and more influential man than himself. Perhaps, also, because even then the encroaching ecclesiastic spirit may have begun to shew itself. From whatever cause, the king calls him a magician and sorcerer, and bids him begone out of his sight. Kentigern goes to expostulate. King loses temper, maltreats the saint, even kicks him so hard as to lay the saint flat on his back. Kentigern bears it quietly and withdraws. Soon after Morken dies. But his kinsmen continue to persecute Kentigern, till at last he flies from Strathclyde to Wales. During his exile in Wales he dwelt with St. David, for a time, and then rears a great monastery of his own, wherein he taught the young St. Asaph. Joceline makes him, during this exile, visit Rome seven times, and once see Gregory the Great, and receive confirmation of his bishopric from him. The whole story seems quite apocryphal, invented, perhaps, at a much later day, to connect the early Scotch Church with the Romish. Many years he sojourned in Wales, and had already grown hoary in exile.

At length there arises at Strathclyde a Christian king, named Rederech, (Roderick,) who had been baptized in Ireland by followers of St. Patrick. His first act is to invite the saint to return and gather together his sheep, now long scattered on the mountains. At first Kentigern hesitates, as well he might; would rather pass his few remaining years in peace, and die in the Welsh monastery which he has built with so much toil, and among the disciples who love him as their father in Christ. But he has not been wont to follow his own likings heretofore, neither will he now, but will leave the whole issue to God. At night while he is in this mind, as he lay in his oratory, an angel appears and bids him arise and return to his own land and people. Straightway he ordains young Asaph bishop, takes leave of all his brethren, and sets his face to the north. He intends to go all alone, but 660 of his brethren arise and follow him. With that great army of monks, he re-enters Strathclyde, and Rederech and his people meet him on his way with welcome, and conduct him to his old monastery with much rejoicing. The new king, though a well-intentioned young man, and quite right in restoring Kentigern, seems to have been a wrekling withal, if we may credit Joceline. For not content with restoring, he must needs subject himself wholly to the bishop, and lay the kingly power absolutely at his feet. So early, if this account be true, came in the spirit of encroachment on the part of the Church, and of submission on the part of the weaker kings. Though all, yet the bishop's activity is unabated. He renews his travels through all the dales of Strathclyde, confronting Druid priest and confounding Druidism; confronting Saxons and confounding Woden; destroying idolatrous rites and places of worship; teaching Druids that the elements they took for gods were no gods, only God's creatures made for man's use; proving to Saxons that their Woden was no god, he told them "of the Triune God, Maker of all things, preached to them the faith of Christ and the sacraments of faith, and that there is but one name under heaven whereby men are saved." This he did in his own diocese. The same in Galloway, the same in Albyn or the Highlands, at the risk of death from savage Picts. Even with this he was not content.—What his aged body could not overtake, his spirit still longed to do. Unable now to go himself, he sent his most brave and zealous disciples to the Orkneys, and even, says Joceline, to Norway, to do there what he had done in Strathclyde.

At last overtaken by age, and unable to travel more, he returns to his monastery at Glasgow, to spend there his last days. Then it was that his contemporary, Columba, he too approaching the end of a life spent in like labors, came from his island monastery, all the way to visit his fellow laborer, the Apostle of Strathclyde. When Mungo heard that Columba was approaching, he went out with all his monks to do honor to the Apostle of Iona. They went forth, first the younger brethren, then the middle-aged, then the old, Kentigern with the last, chanting psalms: "The way of the just hath been made bright, the path of the holy prepared." The Iona monks raised their antiphony: "The holy shall go from strength to strength; they shall appear before the God of gods in Zion." As they drew nearer, Columba beheld he saw a dove of fire alight on Kentigern's head, and his raiment grew white as light. There they met by the green banks of the Molendinar burn, then a clear stream, now a black and foul sewer. For some days they stayed together, and conversed of the things to which their lives had been devoted, the kingdom of God and the salvation of men. Ere they parted they exchanged staves, as a testimony of mutual love in Christ. And long after, even to the fifteenth century, the staff Columba gave to Kentigern was preserved as a precious relic in the cathedral of St. Wilfrid, at Ripon.

While the two saints were thus employed, some of their attendants were more questionably engaged. Very naive is the narrative of brother Joceline. Some of the Iona monks having little taste for spiritual repasts, but a strong appreciation of better fare than Kentigern set before them, caught sight of the bishop's flock feeding at a distance. Off they go, lay hand on the saint's best ram, and, spite of the shepherd's adjuring them by the Holy Trinity and St. Kentigern, drag him off forcibly, and eat off the poor beast's head. But lo! the ram they had intended to flay and eat, rises and returns straightway to the flock, leaving his head in the hand of his slaughterer. The head turns to stone in his grasp, and remains firmly attached to his hands. Nothing they can do will dissever them. What is to be done? One thing only, go, throw themselves at Kentigern's feet, and beg forgiveness. The saint kindly chides them, gives them a little homily against fraud, theft, and sacrilege, and releases them, says Joceline, from the double bond of their sin and of the stone head glued to their hands. This may serve as a sample of some of the more puerile stories which meet us in reading these mediæval biographies.

And now, when he could no longer move abroad, his earthly tenement, worn by extreme age and much fatigue, began through its many chinks to let in the light of the eternal dawn. Then he called his disciples to him, gave them his last charge, blessed them, and committed them and his work to God. On a Sunday morning, the Sunday of the year on which he had been wont to baptize many, he bade his disciples bear him to a bath; not this time of freezing, but of tepid water. Laid in the bath, while they stood around him, he raised eyes and hands to heaven, and then sank into the gentle last sleep. So died the Apostle of Strathclyde. The survivors laid him on the right side of the altar of his own wooden church. To this place, which Kentigern had chosen for his rest, King Rederech followed him within the year, and here for ages the kings and warriors, the saints and sages of Cumbria chose to rest, beside the ashes of the renowned apostle of their nation. It was about the year 600 that Kentigern was laid in his grave, and for some centuries we know little how it fared with the monastery, and the church, and the religion he had planted. The kingdom of Strathclyde in time was broken up; by the tenth century it had begun to disappear, and its territory had passed under the Scottish crown. The see of Kentigern fell, the grave and shrine were neglected, and all that remained of Kentigern was his bones, and the ancient cemetery with its tall stone cross and girdle of old trees. In the twelfth century King David restored this, with so many more of Scotland's holy places, and the work, begun under his auspices at the beginning of the century, was carried forward, as we have seen, by the Bishop Joceline, at its close. David and his preceptor, Bishop John, built the first cathedral over the spot hallowed by Mungo's dust. After forty years it was destroyed by fire. Before the end of the century, Bishop Joceline had begun a new cathedral, and had consecrated over the same spot, that wonderful crypt, which has "perhaps no rival, certainly no superior," in this island. From that time the cathedral went building on, receiving age by age some new addition, and the Reformation found it incomplete. When the day of devastation came, and throughout Scotland cathedral and abbey everywhere went down, Melville clamoured for its instant destruction as a monument of idolatry, but the people of covenanting Glasgow turned out, and would not suffer a stone of their old minister to be injured. And well they might; for Kentigern, the patron saint of their cathedral, may be said to have been the founder of their city.

Of Ninian there is no visible memorial save that poor roofless chapel on the bleak promontory of Columba, only those forlorn walls, bleaching in the damp sea-mists and moist Atlantic winds; Kentigern has two lasting monuments, the cathedral built round his grave, and the city built round the cathedral. But for Kentigern and the reverence that gathered round him, no cathedral had ever been there; and but for the cathedral no city. The charters are still extant which shew the process by which the city grew in the twelfth century under shadow of the cathedral, "here a burgess of Haddington taking a house, there the monks of Melrose taking a grant of land; here a toft and a net's fishing in Clyde assigned to the Knights Templar, there a weekly market fixed for Thursday, and 'the king's peace' obtained by the bishop for the burgesses, and his protection for their chattles." And yet, though without doubt the saint is historically the cause of Glasgow, and all the commerce that now rolls through that mighty mart, the link between the ancient saint and the modern Glasgow merchant seems so remote, we so little expect to find the Kentigern of the sixth century develop into the Glasgow merchant of the nineteenth, that we cannot wonder the historical connection should be long since forgotten.

But no such incongruity arises between the associations of the cathedral and the cell of the saint. The one is the natural outcome of the other. As we stand amid the venerable gloom of that dim crypt, or wander through massive pier and pillar, arch and arcade, and look here on the grave of Mungo, there on the unlettered stone that hides Edward Irving, do we not feel that the fire which glowed in the Apostle of Strathclyde, burned on in the great preacher of our own age, and that we, though living in so changed a world, and looking forth on all things with so different eyes, are yet knit to all the Christian people of those early ages, their spiritual descendants, heirs of the faith in which they lived and died? Thoughts like these, which show how one golden thread runs through and knits together ages the most wide apart, characters the most opposed, so teaching us fairness and charity and forbearance, are one of the most precious fruits which a wide and sympathetic survey of Church history yields. If anything could make us unlearn our small sectarianisms, make us long for a wider Christian brotherhood, it would be the intimate study of those old Christian ages, the close contemplation of those early Christian heroes of our own land and of all lands; men in all externals so unlike ourselves, in temper, mode of life, in many opinions and beliefs so wide apart; in all that makes up outward civilization, household comfort, physical knowledge, social well-being, so far our inferiors; but in the soul, whereby alone men are great, in strength of faith, in devotion to high ends, the self-sacrificing heart, the strong effective will, by most modern Christians unapproached.

GARIBALDI AND ITALY.

FRENCH OFFICIAL VIEW OF GARIBALDI.

The expedition of Garibaldi, says the Paris Constitutionel, excites throughout Europe an emotion which is becoming more intense every day. It is an act contrary to the principle of the law of nations, and to the real interests of Italy. The policy of France has not hesitated to demand a categorical explanation from Sardinia; and M. Thouvenel has made known to Count Cavour the very determined view taken of this matter by the Government of the Emperor. It is assuredly to be regretted that the Government of King Victor Emanuel has been unable to prevent Garibaldi's expedition. Count Cavour's reply to M. Thouvenel proves at least that in Turin, as well as in Paris, that this bold attempt is energetically condemned. For when a statesman, occupying the high position of the Prime Minister of Sardinia, declares his repudiation of all solidarity with an enterprise contrary to the law of nations, his word must be accepted.

We comprehend the real difficulties which must have beset the action of the Piedmontese Government in the moment when the old chief of the Italian volunteers embarked at Genoa to go and liberate Sicily. Garibaldi has acquired a great popularity in Italy; he has rendered real services to the cause of independence; he is, above all, not one of those vulgar figures, who, after having excited and infatuated the masses, find almost at the same time indifference and disdain.

In parting for the two Sicilies at the head of his volunteers, he undoubtedly thwarted and even betrayed the interests and the policy of Piedmont; but in reality he was but logically pursuing his individual role, and at the same time responding to the sentiments of that portion of the people whose hero he was. It was; therefore, difficult for the Piedmontese Government to employ force against a man who now represents so great a popular power. It might have called forth throughout Italy a dangerous reaction, which it was better policy not to provoke. Let it, therefore, be understood, in the adventure which he has undertaken, Garibaldi has engaged all alone. He is the man of his initiative; Piedmont has disavowed him; and he goes not to plant upon the shore of the Two Sicilies the standard of a Government, but that of a party.

Our opinion, however, must not be misunderstood. If the enterprise of Garibaldi is condemned and reproved by the political sentiment of Europe, it is not because public opinion or governments conceal themselves the real situation of the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies.

This situation is very critical—so critical, that no person would be surprised at the success of this enterprise. The actual Sovereign of Naples has unfortunately followed in the errors of his predecessor. At the death of his father, Francis II had a magnificent opportunity to reconcile himself with the Italian spirit; he has thrown it away. We deplore it from our hearts, for we should regard the downfall of his throne as a dangerous complication for Italy and for Europe.

The policy of France does not seek to overthrow dynasties; and when its influence is exercised upon foreign relations, it is in order to reconcile kings with their people. This is what it sought to do in Parma, in Modena, in Tuscany, in the Romagna, and if it has failed, history has already told whose the fault was.

It is said that the hand of England is extended towards Sicily. All great nations have without doubt their ambitions; but ardent as they may be, they are generally kept in check by the nation's own and the general interest. It is no easier for England to seize Sicily than for Russia to occupy Constantinople. England has, besides, in the Neapolitan question, always acted in concert with France. The two Cabinets of St. James and the Tuileries have transmitted in common representations to the Court of Naples. Later, they have both simultaneously broken off diplomatic relations, and not resumed them again but in common. Why then suppose them to have conflicting designs?

ENGLISH VIEW OF GARIBALDI.

A man like Garibaldi, says the London Times, is sure to do something worthy of note; if not successful, he will at least be heroic; if he does not subvert, he will shake a throne; if the Sicilians do not remember him as a deliverer, they will cherish his memory as a martyr. He will neither sneak out of his enterprise like a Spanish Bourbon, nor will he carry it on in a manner to insure the destruction of himself and his followers, like John Brown. He may fail, but he will have carried terror to the heart of the worst Government in Europe, he will have lighted a candle in the South of Italy which will never be put out, and though he may not live to see the day, yet the liberation of the whole Peninsula from that thraldom which the North has already thrown off will be principally his work. The great excitement which has been caused by his expedition is a proof of the confidence which the world has in his powers, and its conviction of the rottenness of the Neapolitan Government.—Were Garibaldi a common man, an Ortega laboring under the hallucination that his cause had followers, or a Smith O'Brien fancying that Heaven had endowed him with influence over mankind, the Bourses of the continental cities would not be affected by the sailing of the General and his little band from Genoa. Were he even merely a brave soldier, we should look with anxiety and pity on his proceedings, and remember how the brilliant Murat found a grave in those very regions and on the same errand of dethroning the House of Bourbon.

LAMORICIERE AND GARIBALDI.

The Pope, laying aside his spiritual arms, has betaken himself to commonplace recruiting. He has engaged an able General, has allowed his army to be reorganized, and is retaining the services of all who may be willing to fight under the banner of the Keys. He has sympathizers and adherents in most parts of Europe, and he can draw tribute and support from foreign States. It seems as if Gen. Lamoriciere had received carte blanche on the condition only of making the Papal army effective, and the results of such a policy would soon be visible. The Roman army will probably be a very good army, but it will be composed of all people except Romans. It will be defending the Roman State, not against enemies, but against the native population, and the very people who once held the world in subjection will be kept down by a foreign Legion palutained in their own name.

When fighting is promised and Popery is provoked, it is no more than natural that Ireland should desire to have a finger in the pie. We are actually assured that 1,000 or 1,500 Irishmen have taken service with the Pope, and that an Irish Brigade will once more figure in the military establishment of a Continental Sovereign.—Possibly we may even see wars of religion once more, though that source of bloodshed at any rate was thought to be dried up for ever. The appeals made on behalf of the Pope are made in the name of Popery. It is true that the Pope's adversaries are Papists also, but that does not affect the terms of the conflict. It is a veritable crusade, preached in all Popish countries, and undertaken for the deliverance of a Holy City, from enemies if not from heathens. But a crusade has two sides, and implies especially a strong collision of opinions. Perhaps we may hear a trumpet calling the godly to arms against the pretensions of Antichrist. The battle of Armageddon has been fixed, we believe, for a period not very remote, and here is the Pope, at any rate, girding on his sword, and making ready for the fight.

The business of war is undergoing material changes, not only in methods of fighting, but in origination and conduct. "Volunteering" is carried to such a pitch that the question of peace or war seems passing out of the hands of Governments into those of the people. An expedition has just sailed for Sicily, consisting, we are told, of some thousands of men, well armed and under a popular commander, without any authorization for the part of any Sovereign State. The Pope's army will probably be made up in much the same fashion, and volunteers may join either side, according as they sympathize with Italian patriots or Romish rulers. "Sympathizers" are becoming as common in Europe as they used to be in America, and are giving as practical a turn to their views. General Lamoriciere will command an army of this class, and Garibaldi may meet him, perhaps, with another army of precisely the same character.

THE SPOT WHERE GARIBALDI LANDED.

The New York Post says: Marsala, where the landing took place, is classic ground, occupying almost the identical site of the ancient Lilly bæum, the most westerly headland of Sicily. Virgil, in the voyage of Eneas, speaks of the "unda dura saxis Lilybeia cæcis," denoting the danger of navigation at that point, owing to the sunken rocks which extend some distance from the coast. For many years the city of Lilly bæum formed the principal stronghold of the Carthaginians in Sicily, and was only surrendered to the Romans at the close of the first Punic war, after a seige of about eight years. Less than three hundred years ago the old harbor was closed by Don John, of Austria, to prevent its affording a refuge to the Mediterranean corsairs. The present harbor is much shallower, and about one mile distant. The place has a population of 21,000, mostly dependent upon the wine trade. Sixteen miles east by north is Trapani, the ancient Drypanium, the scene of some of the most terrible engagements in early times. A short distance therefrom stands the celebrated Mount Eryx, and in its harbor part of the Trojan fleet was burned by the matrons of that nation, wearied with their endless journeyings in search of the promised Latium.

GARIBALDI TO VICTOR EMMANUEL.

Before leaving for Sicily, Garibaldi wrote the following letter to Victor Emmanuel: Sire—The cry for help which reaches me from Sicily has touched my heart, and the heart of some hundreds of my old soldiers. I have not advised the insurrectionary movement of my Sicilian brethren, but as they have risen in the name of the Italian unity, personified in that of your majesty, against the most disgraceful tyranny of our age, I did not hesitate to take the lead of the expedition. I know that I am going to embark in a dangerous undertaking; but I trust in God, and in the courage and devotion of my companions. Our war cry will always be, "Long live the unity of Italy!" "Long live Victor Emmanuel, its first and bravest soldier!" Should we fail in the enterprise we have undertaken, I trust Italy and liberal Europe will not forget that it has been determined by the most unselfish sentiments of patriotism. Should we succeed, I shall be proud to adorn the crown of your Majesty with a new, and perhaps its brightest jewel, on the sole condition that you will prevent your advisers from handing it over to foreigners, as has been done with my native country. I have not communicated my project to your Majesty, for I feared the great devotion I feel for you would have exceeded in persuading me to abandon it.

Your Majesty's most affectionate subject,
G. Garibaldi.

OUR COUNTRY DISGRACED IN SICILY.

Letters from Italy received by the steamer Arabia, report that Mr. Henry H. Barstow, the American consul at Palermo, has been guilty of an act of perfidy which will forever brand him with infamy. This unrepresentative of land of liberty was instrumental in betraying Father Ottavio Lanza, one of the noblest and purest of patriots, into the hands of the agents of the vilest and most tyrannical despotism on the globe. The accounts state that on the 11th of April Palermo was startled with the report of the arrest of Father Lanza, by American intervention, on board a merchant vessel bearing the "stripes and stars," and that the act was committed by the agency of Mr. Barstow, the American Consul! The diplomatic corps at Palermo have refused to hold any further communication with this traitor against humanity—this alder and abetter of the despotism of the second Bomba, who thus prostitutes his official position. If one-quarter part of the stories reported about this Barstow are true, he should be at once dismissed from the service of a free republic, and suffer thu official, as well as the social, disgrace awarded to renegades.

THE BAY ISLANDS.

The last news, brought by the schoonar Dew Drop, Captain King, just from Roatan, informs us of the arrival of Americans by almost every schooner which comes from New Orleans, and of their friendly reception and profitable employment in the islands. The following circular, which will show the policy that dictates the invitation for Americans to settle on the Bay Islands, as well as the uncompromising opposition of their inhabitants to being handed over, "like a herd of cattle, to the tender mercies" of the Hondurean despot, Guardiola:

"Fellow-settlers, the worst is known! After extorting money for grants, the ink of which is hardly dry, guaranteeing our lands to us and our heirs forever, the British Government offers as land in exchange, acre for acre, without any regard to relatives value, where the last occupants have starved, out, and on our refusal to go and be starved, basely deserts us without securing a single privilege by treaty, and hands us over like a herd of cattle to the tender mercies of the most brutal and despotic ruler in existence.

"Are we going to submit to such a brute? Surely not!

"Are we going to accept the offer made by the British Government, of lands situated in places where the last holders have been starved? Decidedly not.'

"Are we going to give all we possess, all we have accumulated after a life time of labor, and go forth naked to begin life's struggles afresh? We certainly can not think of such a thing!

"What, then, shall we do? Stand shoulder to shoulder, and set the brute Guardiola at defiance! Our homes, our wives, our children, our fathers, our mothers, are precious to us—let us arm in defense of them! Do not begrudge the expense of good weapons, of powder, of shot in abundance! Do not begrudge the time necessary for perfecting ourselves in drill! Encourage the entrance of strangers from all parts who are able and willing to assist us. A chivalrous people are not far off—a people that hates oppression and brutality—a people that has an innate love of liberty and law! Let us give them our public lands, free of charge, if they will settle among us. Let us share with them our homes and the produce of our lands till they get their own. Let us hold out the hand of fellowship towards them, and with their assistance and the blessing of Almighty God on our united endeavors we shall be able to assert, obtain and maintain our rights, and live in peace and prosperity, enjoying liberty under the control of just and equal laws.

"Let this be our motto, and let us act up to it—'Liberty or Death.' An old Fellow Settler."

At this moment Mr. Squier's fine work on Central America, in regard to the military as well as commercial importance of the Bay Islands, will possess unusual interest. Mr. Squier devotes a chapter of about fifteen pages to their description. We will quote the first two paragraphs:

"To the northward of the mainland of Honduras, in the bay of the same name, there is a cluster of islands lying nearly parallel to the coast, at a distance from it of from thirty to fifty miles. Their names, in the order of their size, are Roatan (sometimes written Rustan and Ruttan), Guanajaba (or Bonacca), Utilla, Barbaretta, Helena and Morat. Dependent upon them are numerous coral islets, or "cays," of small size. These islands have good soil, fine climate, advantageous position, and some of them excellent harbors, rendering them both valuable and important to that portion of the continent upon which they are geographically dependent.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 13, 1860.

OUR CAUDAL APPENDAGE.

Dr. Summers, in the Southern Christian Advocate, expresses decided disapprobation of the word "South," as attached to the name of our Church. This paper has always opposed it, and, we believe, the entire press of our Church has done the same. It is suggestive of geographical limitation, and exercises now—and will exercise more hereafter—an unseen, but insidious and powerful influence, upon the character, policy and progress of the Church. The ecclesiastical opinions of thousands of our people are at this very day moulded by this geographical designation and its associations, instead of by the teachings of the Scriptures, or by the deductions of any ecclesiastical philosophy drawn therefrom.—It helps to defeat the very object the Church had in view in adding the Discipline of political sentiments and associations; for it helps to associate in the minds of our people the platform of the Church with the politics of section, and gradually leads them to connect the destiny of the Church with the fortunes of a political question. It was a mere expediency at the time it was adopted, and we protest against all expediencies in any such sacred matters.

Had our Church been a "secession" from the regular body instead of a "co-ordinate branch" of the great, though divided, American Methodist Episcopal Church, there would have been some more plausible ground for giving up the original Church name. As it is, we have been despoiled of our rightful name, and have been placed in a false position. It was an implied yielding of the question of regularity for which we have always justly contended. Those who did the work were well meaning but mistaken men, who yielded a great principle to a temporary expediency, even granting that it was an expediency, which we seriously doubt. Thousands of Methodists now, and ever since 1844, in the Northern Church, were with us in principle, and are with us still, but could not accept of a sectional name, and the consequent implication of a sectional position. Nor can we blame them for these scruples. They are well founded. Had we been in their situation, with our present views, we should have found the objection a hard one to overcome. Nothing would have enabled us to overcome it but the conviction that the sectionality of the Northern Church was one of principle, while that of the Southern Church was only in name. The tendency of all loyal Methodists is to adhere earnestly to the original Church, and, by the unfortunate change of our name, we gave strength to the unjust charge that we were not the original Church.

It may be contended that there must be some nominal distinction between the two Churches. We answer that the Northern Church was wise enough to leave us to discover and provide for the difficulty. There would have been distinction enough for all practical purposes, in the minds and designation of the people at large, without any official designation adopted by the Church. The two Churches would have been distinguished, probably, as they now are, as the Northern and Southern Methodist Churches, and yet we should have been as free from any awkward official caudal appendage, in our ecclesiastical style and literature, as the Northern Church now is. The history of our Church, in the synopsis of the Disciplines, in Cyclopædias, and in regular historical works, would have continued from the beginning, as the "History of the Methodist Episcopal Church," without any such deceptive and false interpolations as the "history of the Methodist E. Church, South"—false to our true position, and irredeemably deceptive to posterity. It is false to our true position, for it gives color to representations which are totally untrue. It is common, at this day, for organs of other Churches—even Churches whose "deliverances" are anti-slavery, though they are undivided—to falsely represent themselves as on the Scripture platform, neither pro-slavery nor anti-slavery; while they represent the Methodist Church as divided into anti-slavery and pro-slavery sections; whereas, the Church North is anti-slavery, and the Church South is neither pro-slavery nor anti-slavery—having no "deliverances" or laws either for or against slavery—treating both master and servant as the Bible treats them, and laboring for the salvation of both.

We protest against it, and urge its removal. It is an ever increasing grievance and cause of offence to a large body of our ministry and membership. They have only submitted to it heretofore for the sake of harmony.—When they have sought its removal, the principal objection has been the difficulty of the change, now that our literature, our history, our church-titles, our parchments of ordination all embody the word "South." Those who got us into this difficulty are unwilling to help get us out of it. We fear that pride of consistency has more influence over their opinions than they imagine. We wish the matter decided upon its merits. If, as we contend, it is an error, let us correct it without regard to inconsistency, difficulty, or pride of consistency. Let it not be asked what name we shall adopt. Let us determine to remove the deceptive appendage, first, and we can settle the other matter without difficulty.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT THE ADVOCATE.

We frequently receive, through the mail, one dollar, as the subscription price of the Advocate until the end of the year. This is a mistake, and we wish to correct it. From the 15th of May last until the end of the year, the price, according to our terms, should be $1 25; but, in order to encourage new subscriptions, we charged only $1 25 from the first of May. That price will not be changed until the first of July, from which time till the end of the year, the price will be one dollar. At the first of May we increased the edition for the benefit of those new subscribers who might wish to avail themselves of the reduced price, and we have a considerable amount of the back numbers yet on hand. We hope our friends will at least send in new subscribers enough to take all these. Let those who do not wish the back numbers, however, send us $1 00, and begin with the first of July.

We have no doubt but that if a general and earnest effort were made by all our agents and friends, our circulation might be largely increased. The paper ought to have a large circulation, much larger than it now has.—We hesitate not to say that it deserves a larger circulation. Much labor has been expended upon it. We have the old, also, of some of the best pens of the country, and we are constantly increasing our advantages of this kind. At a proper time we shall mention the names of the leading writers who contribute to our columns. If all our arrangements succeed, and we have no doubt of it, we shall soon have a staff of writers unsurpassed in this country, embracing all classes—religious, philosophical, and literary. We ask for such support and circulation as we are trying to make the paper deserve. We ask that our people shall show a due appreciation of the efforts of their editors to impart literary value and religious usefulness to their own papers.

Apart from this subjective view of the case, the useful ness of the Church and the good of the country are involved in the matter. A good paper can interest, improve and comfort a million readers as well as ten thousand. And all our readers will bear us witness that we take especial pains to make the Advocate acceptable and beneficial to all classes—in the Churches and out of them. We ask for and expect circulation, therefore among all classes of people, irrespective of Church or denominational lines. We ask our preachers and friends to show, recommend, and circulate the Advocate, in public and in private. We desire enlarged circulation the more, because we meditate some improvements, which we shall not be so ready to undertake unless we have substantial evidences that we shall be supported with energy. We are emboldened to make this call from the fact that we receive constant and flattering testimonials to the high opinion entertained of the Advocate from the most competent judges, North as well as South.

We again urge all our subscribers who have not done so, to pay up to the end of the year, so that every subscription may begin and end at the same time, and so that we may have hereafter a clean cash list. They have all received, or will soon receive their accounts in their papers. The accounts are also sent, at the same time, to the preachers, except in instances where the preachers have failed to send us lists of their post-offices. If there is any mistake in any account—if money has been sent which has failed to reach us—or if there be any confusion from any other cause—it can all be corrected by sending us a full and legibly written account of all the particulars; or, our agents can make the correction themselves, as they have full authority in the premises. We are labouring to have the books cleared of all accounts, and doing all we can to prevent and to correct all mistakes and confusion. Our friends will understand, therefore, why it is that we are so urgent in making collections. We do not wish to have a single unsettled account when the first of next January comes. And we earnestly desire to have at that time a very much larger circulation than we now have.

POLITICAL PLATFORMS.

In accordance with our rights and duty as conductors of a public journal, for the diffusion of knowledge, and for the transmission of current news, secular and political as well as religious and literary, we publish, as occasion may require, the important political movements of the time, especially at this interesting juncture in our public affairs. We have heretofore published a synopsis of the Republican platform, adopted at their recent convention in Chicago. We now publish, below, the platform, so far as it relates to slavery in the territories, reported by the majority of the committee of the Charleston convention, upon the rejection of which the delegates of eight or nine States seceded; and we publish also the resolutions offered by Senator Davis and recently adopted by about a two-thirds vote of the United States Senate, upon the same subject. They both embody the same doctrine, viz: the equal right of the people of all the States to emigrate with their property to the common territories of the Union, and to be protected, if necessary, in the enjoyment of that property. They both admit the right of the people of a territory, when forming a State constitution, to adopt or reject slavery, as they may prefer, and to be admitted into the Union accordingly. These resolutions embody the doctrine upon which the great body of constitution-loving and conservative men, of all parties, and of all parts of the country, will unite to oppose the Republican party, which seek to obtain control of the Government, and to administer it upon a sectional platform—to commit its whole power, indeed, against the rights and institutions of one section of the Union. As we understand them, these resolutions have nothing sectional, or of disunion tendency, in them. They only seek a just interpretation of the constitution; a constitutional administration of the Government; the consequent preservation of the Union formed by our fathers; and the enforcement of the laws throughout the country. They ask only equality for the Southern States in the territories, while they remain territories, and then leave them to determine for themselves whether they shall have slavery when they come to form a State constitution. The fairness and unsectionality of these resolutions, and their adoption by so large a majority of the United States Senate will doubtless have great weight with the people of the country in the coming contest.

CHARLESTON PLATFORM.

Resolved, That the government of a Territory organized by an act of Congress is provisional and temporary; and during its existence all citizens of the United States have an equal right to settle with their property in the Territory, without their rights, either of person or property, being destroyed or impaired by Congressional or Territorial legislation.

Resolved, That it is the duty of the Federal government in all its departments, to protect, when necessary, the rights of persons and property in the Territories, and wherever else its Constitutional authority extends.

Resolved, That when the settlers in a Territory, having an adequate population, form a State Constitution, the right of sovereignty commences, and being consummated by admission into the Union, they stand on an equal footing with the people of other States, and the State thus organized ought to be admitted into the Federal Union, whether its Constitution prohibits or recognizes the institution of slavery.

Resolved, That the enactments of the State Legislatures to defeat the faithful execution of the Fugitive Slave law are hostile in character, subversive of the Constitution, and revolutionary in their effect.

SENATORIAL PLATFORM.

1. Resolved, That in the adoption of the federal Constitution the States adopting the same acted severally as free and independent sovereignties, delegating a portion of their powers to be exercised by the federal Government for the increased security of each against dangers, domestic as well as foreign, and that any intermeddling by any one or more States, or by a combination of their citizens, with the domestic institutions of the others, on any pretext, whether political, moral, or religious, with the view to their disturbance or subversion, is in violation of the Constitution, insulting to the States so interfered with, endangers their domestic peace and tranquility—objects for which the Constitution was formed—and, by necessary consequence, serves to weaken and destroy the Union itself.

2. Resolved, That negro slavery, as it exists in fifteen States of this Union, composes an important portion of their domestic institutions, inherited from their ancestors and existing at the adoption of the Constitution, by which it is recognized as constituting an important element of apportionment of powers among the States, and that no change of opinion or feeling on the part of the non-slaveholding States of the Union in relation to this institution can justify them or their citizens in open or covert attacks thereon, with a view to its overthrow; and all such attacks are in manifest violation of the mutual and solemn pledge to protect and defend each other given by the States respectively on entering into the constitutional compact which formed the Union, and are a manifest breach of faith and a violation of the most solemn obligations.

3. Resolved, That the Union of these States rests on the equality of rights and privileges among its members, and that it is especially the duty of the Senate, which represents the States in their sovereign capacity, to resist all attempts to discriminate, either in relation to person or property, so as in the Territories—which are the common possession of the United States—to give advantages to the citizens of one State which are not equally assured to those of every other State.

4. Resolved, That neither Congress nor a Territorial Legislature, whether by direct legislation or legislation of an indirect and unfriendly character, possesses the power to annul or impair the constitutional right of any citizen of the United States to take his slave property into the common Territories, and there hold and enjoy the same while the Territorial condition remains.

5. Resolved, That if experience should at any time prove that the judiciary and executive authority do not possess the means to insure adequate protection to constitutional rights in a Territory, and if the Territorial Government should fail or refuse to provide the necessary remedies for that purpose, it will be the duty of Congress to supply such deficiency.

6. Resolved, That the inhabitants of a Territory of the United States, when they rightfully form a constitution to be admitted as a State into the Union, may then, for the first time, like the people of a State when forming a new constitution, decide for themselves whether slavery, as a domestic institution, shall be maintained or prohibited within their jurisdiction; and if Congress admit them as a State, "they shall be received into the Union with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe at the time of their admission."

7. Resolved, That the provision of the Constitution for the rendition of fugitives from service or labor, "without the adoption of which the Union could not have been formed," and the laws of 1793 and 1850, which were enacted to secure its execution, and the main features of which, being similar, bear the impress of nearly seventy years of sanction by the highest judicial authority, should be honestly and faithfully observed and maintained by all who enjoy the benefits of our compact of Union; and that all acts of individuals or of State Legislatures to defeat the purpose or nullify the requirements of that provision, and the laws made in pursuance of it, are hostile in character, subversive of the Constitution, and revolutionary in their effects.

SUNDAY SCHOOL MUSIC.

A most excellent plan is being adopted by some of our Sunday-schools for the improvement of their music. They send for our Hymn and Tune Book, and then employ a teacher of vocal music to instruct and lead the school in this delightful exercise, as well as important part of the education of the young. We have just seen an order to this depository from Marshall, Texas, for a supply of books for this purpose. We wish every Sunday-school in the land would adopt the same plan.—The Sunday-schools, after all, are the Christian Common Schools of the land, and are doing more for the Christian education of the masses of the people of this country than all the State systems put together. Such being the case, it is wise to make the "course of study" in them as extensive as possible, including this fine art of music, as well as didactic and homiletical theology, and English literature. There is one great advantage possessed by this department of the great People's University—it is that the students are not compelled to graduate in a certain number of years. They can remain as long as they please, even until they get married. And even then, as "resident-graduates," "fellows," or "professors," they can continue, "dwelling in the house of the Lord all the days of their lives, to see the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in his temple." They can continue to "grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ." We hope the time will come when it will be common for people to spend their entire lives in connection with the Sunday-school, first as scholars, and afterwards as teachers.

SUNDAY SCHOOL FESTIVITIES.

Sunday-schools themselves have a comparatively short history, and Sunday-school festivities, such as pic nics, concerts, and anniversary celebrations, have a much shorter history. We have been led to make these remarks by attending, recently, several of these festive occasions of the young people and children. In addition to anniversaries of single schools, and the Anniversary of the New Orleans Methodist Sunday-school Union, embracing nearly two thousand children, the Sunday-schools of Carondelet and Jefferson City Churches, and some others, have recently luxuriated in most delightful pic nics. The one for Carondelet, at the Park, or The Oak's, two or three miles back of the city, which is a beautiful and shady retreat, reached by a beautiful drive on the "Bayou Road," was a delightful affair. We learn that the others were also quite satisfactory.

We fear that the public mind is not fully awake to the value of these things. Regularly attended to, and well gotten up, they add incalculably to the numbers and interest of a Sabbath-school. The children take a huge delight in them, and the "old folks" catch the contagion, and are delighted too. Nothing is more refreshing than the sight of hundreds of children, in holiday attire, sportively enjoying themselves amid the flowers, grass, and green leaves of a shady wood. Every Sunday-school in the land ought to have one in the spring, at least.—Preachers, teachers, and people, can easily take that much trouble once a year. It is healthful to young and old—to mind and body. Children are children but once, and should be made as glad and happy as possible. And especially should we feel this obligation when the Sabbath school cause, and kingdom of Christ, are promoted by our labors.

RETURN OF DR. HAMILTON.

Our readers will find in this issue another of Dr. Hamilton's interesting letters, descriptive of his tour in Central America. Several others will shortly appear, in regular succession. His friends will be pleased to know that his health is greatly improved. He says he is quite relieved of his old complaint, asthma, thus far.—Dr. Hamilton came home by way of New York, having sailed from Carthagena for that port. We are rejoiced that the painful apprehensions of some of the Doctor's friends for his health and safety, in consequence of not having heard from him regularly, are now allayed. We must confess we never shared in these apprehensions, notwithstanding our sympathy with those who entertained them. Dr. Hamilton has been through too many hard runs, and has too much tenacity of life and purpose, to be killed off easily. He is good for many a year of hard and useful service yet. We trust he left the asthma in the tropics, never to return.

SOUTHERN METHODISM IN OREGON.

Rev. C. Fisher writes the Pacific Methodist: In Corvallis we have had a glorious work, and now as the result we have forty-three in society here. In Salem, also, God has blessed us, and we have there twenty in the Church. At Portland we have twelve, one a local preacher. We have just closed the second quarterly meeting on the Eugene circuit, at Liberty school-house, where forty-three joined the Church, one of them a local preacher. At Lancaster, in the same circuit, brother Gruwell took into the church ten a few days before. Many of these, in places, are either young converts, or reclaimed backsliders. Several have been received in other places not reported in the above list. Our number in Independence circuit stood nearly as reported last year. We have both here and at Salem flourishing Sunday-schools.—Let these facts and figures speak for God and us for the present, and let all pray for our future success. We are burdened with calls for preaching, and weary with looking in vain for the preachers the Bishop was to send us.

SOUTHERN UNIVERSITY.

A handsome lithograph front view of the University building has been sent us. It is intended to adorn the letter paper upon which those connected with the University write their letters. It is a very beautiful and imposing view, and will be an excellent advertisement of the institution. The programme of the Commencement will be found in another column. In our revival intelligence, our readers will be pleased to find that, in accordance with the design of the institution, the prayer of the Church and the doctrine of President Wightman's inaugural address, the Lord is blessing the University, during its first year, with the out-pouring of his Holy Spirit.—These columns have had much to say on the subject of religion in our colleges, and we rejoice to find that consecration to God is becoming a foundation sentiment in all our theories of true and thorough education. May all colleges, male and female, become houses of the living God.

TEXAS.

We have been delighted, of late months, by visits from several of our old friends from Texas. First, we had the Agent of the Advocate and Depository at Galveston, Rev. J. W. Shipman. He had been North, looking after the interests of his concern. The other day, among others, we had our friend and brother, J. L. Briggs, Esq. He tells us Galveston is becoming quite a city. It is not now so difficult to get into Texas. By the Berwick Bay railroad, and then by steamer, you reach Galveston in a little more than twenty-four hours, in time for the railway train to Houston every day at ten o'clock in the forenoon, except Thursdays and Sundays, when they leave at twelve o'clock. So, you can leave New Orleans one morning after breakfast, take breakfast in Galveston next morning, and then take dinner in Houston. And before long we shall be able to reach Houston and Galveston from New Orleans by railroad.

BISHOP PIERCE'S LETTERS.

We resume this week the publication of Bishop Pierce's "Foot Prints Across the Continent," in which our readers were formerly so much interested, and which, on account of the Bishop's ill health, were suspended for a time. There will be nearly a dozen more of them. We are glad to learn that the chills, with which the Bishop has been afflicted since his return from California, have at length been broken, and that he is now in much better health. It was feared by many that his constitution was very much shattered. We are glad to know that this is not the case, and that he is likely soon to be himself again. The whole Church will be interested to hear his impressions of California, and especially of the prospects of the Church there.

NOTES WHILE ON A FURLOUGH—No. X.

FROM CARTHAGENA TO CALAMAR.

In travelling in any part of Spanish America, one needs a large stock of patience, and ample as it may be, he will have use for it all if he extends his travels far. He will meet with delays and detentions of the most needless length and unexpected frequency. He will find himself among a people with whom time is of no importance, and punctuality almost unknown; a people for whom nature and habit have done what grace alone is expected to do for others, when it has brought forth its natural fruits—taught them that "in whatsoever state they are, therewith to be content." I reached Carthagena March 10th, and was informed that the boat for the Magdalena would start from Barranquilla, some ninety miles distant by land, on the 11th; so I was just 24 hours too late, though there at the regular time, there being no connection between the two lines, though both are owned by Englishmen. I was consoled however by the information that there would be another boat in fifteen days, on the 26th. There was no alternative but to wait, and as I was assured that it was far more comfortable in Carthagena than Calamar, (the point on the river where I was to take the boat) I judged it best to spend most of the fifteen days at the former place. How punctually the boat's engagement for the 26th was kept, the reader will learn hereafter. In due time I left Carthagena, giving myself margin enough to make the land trip leisurely. In doing so I had to take a mere bridle path—for road there is none—that has been used for the last 200 or 250 years by the same conveyances, and is in about the same condition now that it has been for the last 175 years. In many places you see the improvement and changes in the path which the energy of the people has achieved from time to time; for instance, after travelling for generations in the same track, up or down a hill, the ruins at length so washed it, that it became impossible for "cargo mules," and the Granadian has had the fortitude and public spirit to cut away the bushes for a few yards with his macheta, and thus a new path has been made. This is the extent of their improvements of the highways, for hundreds of miles. After winding along the shore of an inlet from the sea, for some three miles, we struck a cane-brake, with a rich prairie soil, and pretty level. This extends about twenty miles; the cane is very large, four or five inches in diameter near the ground often, and fifty or sixty feet high. This route which leads by Santa Rosa is called the old route. There is another leading by Turbacco, five leagues from Carthagena. Here that embodiment of perfidy and sensuality, Santa Anna, has been residing for the past six or seven years, fighting chickens and debauching the population. A year and a-half since he left for the Island of St. Thomas, to watch the course of events in Mexico, and he more convenient should there be an opening for him. His wife became insane some time since, made so probably by his misconduct, and he sent her to her friends in Cuba.

The first town on the old route is Santa Rosa, mentioned above, five leagues from Carthagena. It is a mere collection of huts, built of cane-poles and mud, and covered with thatch. Such are all the towns on this road. Three leagues further is Villa Nueva; and five leagues beyond that is San Estanislaus. There are other villages on the route, but they are such miserable places that I did not take the trouble to get their names. Between Villa Nueva and San Estanislaus the country is broken and hilly, and some fine views are presented. Almost the whole distance from Carthagena to Calamar is an unbroken forest. I saw but few fields in cultivation, and they were seldom more than half cleared. The method of cultivating the corn crop would amuse the farmers of any other country. The timber is cut down, and after having been exposed to the sun for some months, it is set on fire. Without further labor the workmen provide themselves with sharp sticks, and going over the ground make holes wherever there is a vacant spot, and drop in five or six kernels of corn. Once during the season they go through the field, and cut away the weeds with their machetas; the land and rain have to do the rest. They make but two or three crops from the same field generally, as it becomes too weedy; they prefer to clear new land, as the timber is not heavy.

In a few places along the route I noticed fine plantain groves, which had the appearance of being cared for. Sugar-cane here, as in Costa Rica, is perennial. I was shown a field where the crop was nine years old, and was assured that there were those where the crop had been growing fifty years without replanting; it is cut about every nine months. After a series of years it becomes very thick, and the number of stalks in the hill or row greatly increased; the quality, too, must become inferior, when it becomes such a matted mass. Air plants abound in the forests, and are in great variety; they are found in every possible position. I have seen them clinging to a single sprig of the long moss, four or five feet from any limb and flourishing. The blossoms of some varieties are beautiful; they are a curiosity in the vegetable world, and very highly prized by devotees to natural history, by whom high prices have been paid for single specimens. In the course of the trip we encountered a company of monkies of the brown variety, which greatly surprised me by their cries, or rather roars. This small animal can utter a cry which for depth and volume of sound would do credit to the largest sized tiger. One can hardly believe that it can be the voice of this animal until he sees them in the act of uttering it. There must be some peculiar formation of the throat, and some peculiar manner of employing it, to enable them to produce such a sound.

Among the things that arrest the attention of the traveller in this country, are the ants; their number and activity are such as to merit a paragraph; both are amazing. There are various species, distinguished not only by their appearances but by the houses they build. The most prominent is a large sized, red ant, much like some we have, but not only more numerous, but more skilful. Their houses, or "hills," are not unfrequently fifteen feet long, by ten or twelve wide. Either this is their season for moving or "swarming," or they are very migratory in their habits, for in hundreds of instances I noticed they were emigrating. And their movements are such as to attract attention; for all those not employed in transporting the eggs and young of the establishment, are loaded with a piece of green leaf, all evidently of the same kind; in a few instances they were carrying a yellow flower, and from the length and depth of the columns there could not be less than 20,000 in a colony, and I should not wonder if there were twice that number; and to see these green or yellow columns in motion, for hundreds of yards, was a striking spectacle. Their road, too, was a curiosity; no footpath, over which a thousand persons passed daily, could be trodden smoother or harder. They are from three to nine inches wide, according to the size of the colony, and perfectly free from every particle of leaf or other impediment. The work of preparing these highways is immense, and shows astonishing instinct, as they are very often made through the thickest undergrowth, and amid the greatest obstacles; ant-engineering has attained great perfection. A second species constructs their "hills" on the top of the ground, in the form of a cone, two or three feet high, by two feet in diameter at the base; they are uniformly of a dark color. A third species build on trees, often fifty or sixty feet from the ground; they very much resemble the hornets' nests in color, but are generally much larger and always much harder; they are usually suspended from the branch of a tree. Their number in the forest is astonishing, fifty of them may be counted at once. There is still another species that build in trees, but their nests are uniformly black, and instead of pending from trees are placed on the top of a branch, or in a crotch; they are very hard, and frequently as large as a barrel. Add to the above the destructive white ant of the tropics, and the reader will admit that the country is supplied with ants. So he would feel on seeing their vast numbers and extensive works.

Cruelty to animals is almost universal with the Spanish American race; the sin and shame of such things have evidently never been taught the people; sympathy for the animal creation forms no part of their religion. Nothing is more common than to see a poor little donkey, that seems hardly able to stand alone, loaded down with perhaps two hundred pounds, and then a great large negro or Granadian mounted on top of that; then with a sharp hook at the end of a stick, he commences goading the poor animal on the hip, perhaps already made raw, and yet with the most satanic coolness he goes on deepening the wound. Such spectacles presented constantly, force the inquiry upon the mind, is it the race or their religion that makes them thus unfeeling?

Calamar is situated on the west bank of the river, some ninety miles from the mouth; the location is flat, and both the town and its surroundings are dull and uninteresting. The population of the place may be five or six hundred, of which five-sixths are African in whole or part. There is an abundance of the best alluvial land in the immediate vicinity; but I did not see an acre of it in cultivation on the west side of the river. Yet there must be cultivation somewhere, for they have corn for their stock. I believe it is the policy of those who cultivate land to select it off from the road, and at a distance from town, that they may be less annoyed by thieves. The place has a small transit trade, as it is at the head of the canal, but it might have vastly more with industry and enterprise. Trade is suffering now from the effects of the recent revolution.

The Magdalena at this point is a large, noble stream, equal to the lower Ohio, which it much resembles. In its general appearance, for some hundreds of miles, it is more like the Mississippi than any stream I have ever met. Its islands, sand bars, its changing banks, constantly remind you of that noble stream. With this country in the hands of the Anglo-Saxon race, what a commerce would float upon these waters, draining as they do a vast and fertile country. In the hands of its present possessors trade will never improve much. With rivers teeming with fish, a country that will feed stock well by its range without an hour's labor; with a soil that will produce plantains, yuca, yams, sugar-cane, cocoa, and coffee, almost spontaneously, and with a climate demanding almost no covering by day or night, what do these people want of commerce! The idea is an impertinence. The Yuca and Yam are the great substitute for Irish potatoes and bread in this country, and really in the first particular they do very well, for they both very much resemble the potato, not only in appearance but in taste also. But as a substitute for the second, I cannot accept them at all. Yet every new comer has to be toiled upon them; corn shucks filled with yam bread meet you everywhere, and are set before you until you persistently refuse to eat it. To me it is too insipid to be tolerated.

An American is struck with the extent of the domain over which the Spanish have spread, and established their language on this continent, and the universality of its prevalence; not only Indians from the forest, and every negro from the Islands of this Archipelago, but every American and European who visit this region surrender to its demands. The wife of an English gentleman, who was herself English, could not be induced to converse with me in English; all was in Spanish. An English gentleman in Carthagena has three grown daughters, neither of whom can speak the mother tongue of their father. When English would do just as well, yea better, Spanish is generally used. It is a singular fact that we, as a nation, have paid less attention to this, the language of our nearest neighbor, than any other nation of Christendom. True, there is little in its literature, sciences or philosophy to attract attention to it, but its people in our vicinity are millions, and they have a claim upon us. The means for its acquisition should be immediately provided in all our colleges and academies. Ten Americans will need a knowledge of this language in future, where one will need a knowledge of French.

Learning that the boat would probably start for Honda on the 25th, I arrived at Calamar in good time; the 25th came but no boat, the 26th passed and yet no boat: on the 27th, at three, P.M., we were cheered by the sight of her smoke, when lo, the agent informed us that he had received information that four passengers were on their way from Carthagena, and that he was requested to detain the boat for them until the next day, and the captain, kind-hearted man, waited. In due time the travellers arrived, and about 12 o'clock, three days after the time appointed, we finally got under way. Steamboating on the Magdalena has some things peculiar to this country, which I will notice in my next.

FOOTPRINTS ACROSS THE CONTINENT.

NUMBER IX.

El Paso—Imaginary Difficulties—Mesilla Valley—Arizona—Missions—Improvements.

Mr. Editor: Various reasons, too tedious to mention, conspired first to stop and secondly to prevent me from resuming my California correspondence. It is not necessary to apologize where no offense has been given. If my letters have been missed at all, it has been because having commenced to write, the expectation was a natural one that I would continue to the end, rather than because they misastered to the edification or entertainment of your readers. Nevertheless I resume, because in the orders of events I shall reach the "land of gold," concerning which I have something to say—important to the Eastern Conferences of the Southern Methodist Church.

My last letter dated from El Paso. At this point we changed stage line and were compelled to lie over two days waiting for the great Overland Mail. This line—forsaking the upper route on account of scarcity of water and dangerous mountain roads, was just transferring teams and stages to the lower route. Of course there was some confusion, and whether we should start by day or night was an open question no man could settle. The Superintendent having assured me one afternoon that the stage could not arrive before the next morning, I accepted the invitation of Judge Hart and went to spend the night at his hospitable mansion. Myself and wife and daughter had just retired and were sinking into delightful sleep, when the roll of wheels swiftly revolving over the gravelly road smote upon our drowsy ears. In a moment or two the driver halted and urged speedy preparation. Here was a trial. Sleep was in itself a luxury, a good bed makes it more so, and to give up both at an unreasonable hour and go scaling mountains in the dark and then plunging down on the other side now walled in, and then driving on the brink of precipices, was far from comfortable. But go we must. To add to our troubles, the Rio Grande was swollen by the melting snows and had overflowed, driving us from the accustomed track and constraining us to extemporize a road. Withal I was assured that on reaching Fort Fillmore, forty-five miles distant, I could go no farther on account of the spreading waters. The driver said that I would have to wade waist deep for half a mile to reach the ferry, that the ground was so soft and miry that the stage could not possibly go across. "You might get through sir, but what will you do with your wife and little girl!" said one and another. I simply inquired if I could find any body about the fort to "pack" my baggage over. "Oh yes." Very well. I had made up my mind to make a raft of planks and put Mrs. P. and little Ann upon it, and to pull it over. By the way, we had to divide our company and leave two of the young preachers for the next stage. Brother D. who was with me, said he would help me in my impromptu navigation. So against all remonstrances, on we went. I am too old a traveller to be stopped by reported difficulties fifty miles ahead of me. What many people think impracticable is easy of accomplishment oftimes if resolution is brought to the task. Rumors of danger and difficulty are seldom to be relied on, so at least I have commonly found. Accordingly when we reached Fort Filmore, we learned that all the necessary arrangements had been made for our transit, dry shod, to the other side. Where we expected trouble we found entertainment. The mode of transportation was novel. The ferryboat, commonly called a flat," had been floated down nearly a mile to a little knoll upon the bank, a long rope attached; several Mexicans engaged and when the passengers and baggage had all been transferred, the word was given and the Mexicans wading along upon the bank, in water from the ankle to the arm-pits, pulled us safely along. One extra hand armed with an axe accompanied our team to cut down bushes and trees when the rope became entangled. The serious difficulty was, "how shall we reach the other side of the river?" This was settled after a long pull by taking advantage of a bend in the river where the current favored our landing. The rope was detached and the flat abandoned to the stream. The calculation was well made, for we struck the other bank in a few feet of the desired point. Here another stage was in waiting and we were soon on our winding way. After leaving the river and ascending for half a mile we enter upon the far-famed Messilla Valley, and soon enter the town also called Messilla—(pronounced Messa.) All the Mexican villages are alike, adobe houses, jakals, (called hacals,) here and there, without any reference to form or order; the streets of course are not mathematical lines, but run at random, and dogs, goats, and cattle, all roam at large; the whole looks a great deal more like a canvansary pitched for a night than the permanent habitations of a local people.

The valley is about 40 miles in length and 7 in width, and is very fertile. Easily irrigated, under intelligent culture, it would sustain an immense population. The thriftless lazy Mexican, content with his red-pepper, beans and onions, and a little corn, will never develope the capacity of the soil. As yet there are but few Americans in this region and these mainly officers of the Government, or traders or adventurers in transitu to any place which may catch the fancy. Without the Messilla Valley, Arizona is a deserted land, a land of rock and sand, without water or timber, dreary, desolate, a solitude without a single attraction, uninhabited and uninhabitable. To talk of it as an agricultural country is ridiculous, absurd. Nor is it much better as a pastoral region. Except about the little villages on the way, the traveller sees no sign of animal life. The curse of heaven seems to rest upon it. The terrible denunciation upon Israel and Judea, as uttered by the prophets, perpetually recurred to me. I felt as though I were journeying through a grave-yard, the tombs of an extinct people. The loneliness is oppressive. If perchance any living thing greets the eye, it is sure to be in motion as though in a hurry to get away. The mountains many of them are as bold and bare as the mossless rock. It is true that occasionally we saw a valley with soil enough to produce if water could be had, but there seems to be neither cloud above nor springs beneath. To condense and to express all in three words, I add drought, sterility, emptiness.

Messilla, Tueson, Tubac, are the three towns of the territory. Except the first, all are dependent mainly on importation for bread. Tubac is in the mining regions, and has I learn a considerable population, and her supplies come chiefly from Sonara. Before reaching Tucson, some three hundred miles from Mesilla, I lost my hat by nodding. On our arrival next day about noon, I stepped into a store to purchase a head covering of some kind. I found several Indians trading with the merchants, among them I noticed a well-clad, good-looking woman very unlike the rest. Pointing to her I asked the tradesman if she was an Apache? He replied yes. She seemed quite offended and turning to me, she said, "No, no Apache, me Christian Indian." I tried to talk with her, but her store of English seemed to be exhausted. I suppose she was a Catholic. The old Santa Cruz Mission is not distant from this place. That mission I think is now abandoned, and Protestantism has done nothing for these outcast tribes. Perhaps the time to occupy this forlorn region has not yet come. The Methodist Church, North, has sent out two missionaries to Arizona, but they have accomplished nothing. One of them has accepted the chaplaincy of Fort Filmore; the other, I believe, has gone to Los Angelos and is a member of the California Conference.

If the Overland Mail line is continued and is made daily, as it ought to be, or if the Pacific railroad is built, Arizona will present in a few years some points of interest for our Missionary Society. Gold, silver and copper, doubtless, abound in the mountains, and when the means of transportation are provided, so that food can be imported at living rates, many of these silent valleys will ham with life and labor. American enterprise and the lust of gold will overcome all difficulties and people some spots of this "waste wilderness." It is too poor and solitary to "howl."

At the stations where we change horses wells have been dug, and in most places water is easily obtained. It is all brackish and very unpalatable. At one point I saw them digging for water. They had gone down one hundred and ninety-six feet without a sign. The dirt at the bottom was well nigh as dry as the surface. When we returned, the work was abandoned. In New Mexico the government has experimented with an Artesian well and failed. Yet in some places water is found in fifteen feet. The Overland stage company, by their stations, wells and employees, have improved the route for emigrants. Water can be had for man and beast now, at points less distant from each other than in other days. There is less danger from Indians and Mexicans, and the dreariness is relieved now and then by the sight of a white man's face and the familiar sound of one's mother tongue. For myself, however, I never could master the patience to cross the plains in an ox wagon as many do, consuming six and nine months in the transit.

Invitations.—The editor of this paper has received many kind invitations to attend and officiate at examinations and commencements, of various schools and colleges, in the city and in the country. Official duties and private affairs, more than ordinarily pressing, render it impossible for him to comply, except in one very convenient instance—an engagement made early in the season. We are grateful for the consideration shown us, and regret that we cannot perform all that is desired of us.

New Church at Bay St. Louis, Miss.—Rev. J. D. Shaw informs us that he, assisted by others, is trying to raise means to build a Methodist Church at Bay St. Louis, and that there is a good prospect of success. But they need help, and we trust they may receive it. They ought to have a Methodist Church there; indeed, they ought to have had it long ago. Help them.

North Carolina Christian Advocate.—We are glad to see that this excellent paper now has an office of its own, and that the sheet is now a large and handsome one. We give our brother Hefflin joy, and wish him the largest success.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

WEEKLY SUMMARY OF NEWS.

CONGRESSIONAL.

In the Senate, on the 4th instant, a resolution introduced by Mr. Wilson, asking the Secretary of State to furnish copies of the correspondence relative to the arrest of Father Lanzn, on board an American vessel at Palermo, through the agency of our Consul, was unanimously adopted.

The House, on the same day, passed the bill making the consulates at Swatow, Ascension, Barcelona, Gibraltar and Hanover salaried officers.

In the Senate, on the 5th, the bill providing for the admission of Kansas as a State into the Union was under discussion, but no conclusion was arrived at. It is the well understood policy of the Democratic party to keep Kansas out of the Union until after the election of a new President.

The Senate concurred in the amendment to the Army bill, making the necessary appropriation for a regiment of Texas mounted volunteers.

In the House, on the same day, the bill providing for the return and support during one year of the Africans lately captured off the coast of Cuba by U. S. war vessels, was passed.

In the Senate, on the 6th, Mr. Toombs' bill to repeal the act recognizing the Houmas land claim was passed.

A motion to take up the Kansas Admission bill was lost—yeas 27, nays 35.

In the House, the Senate bill providing for the settlement of private land claims in the States of Florida, Arkansas, Louisiana and Missouri, was tabled.

The bill making appropriations for the relief of the widows and children of the officers and soldiers of the revolutionary army, was postponed till next December.

The joint resolution giving Congressional assent to such acts of the Legislatures of Louisiana, Texas and Arkansas have, or may pass, for levying tolls on steamboats navigating Red River, to pay for the removal of the great raft, was passed—yeas 84; nays 77.

The Senate, on the 7th, adopted the House resolution terminating the present session of Congress on the 18th inst. On that day, therefore, both Houses will stand adjourned.

In the Senate, on the 9th, the bill providing for the settlement of private land claims in the State of California, was passed.

The bill providing for the pensionment of Marshals and Deputy Marshals for allowing the prisoners to escape, was also passed.

In the Senate, on the 11th, Mr. Green, from the Committee on Territories, reported adversely on the petition from Utah to form a constitution, and asking admission as a State.

In the House, Mr. Blair was admitted to the contested seat for the St. Louis district, Missouri.

POLITICAL.

A dispatch from Utica states that the Hon. Horatio Seymour, ex-Governor of the State of New York, has published a letter, in which he declines to have his name brought forward as a candidate for the Presidency or Vice Presidency of the United States, at the convention which meets at Baltimore on the 18th inst.

The Hon. Edward Everett, who was nominated for Vice President of the United States by the National Union Convention, lately held at Baltimore, has written a long, interesting, and able letter to the Hon. Washington Hunt, of New York, President of that Convention, accepting the nomination, but declaring at the same time that, in yielding to the earnest solicitations which have been addressed to him from the most respectable sources in almost every part of the Union, he makes a painful sacrifice of inclination to what he is led to believe a public duty.

In the U. S. House of Representatives, on the 2d inst., Mr. Maynard of Tenn., in reply to a remark by W. Smart of Md., made the satisfactory statement on reliable authority, that Millard Fillmore does not and will not support the Chicago nominees. Mr. Fillmore, in our view, is too national in his political course to support sectionalism in any shape or guise.

Two Democratic State Conventions were held in Louisiana last week—the Old-Liners at Baton Rouge, and the Douglasites at Donaldsonville. The former passed resolutions endorsing and approving the action of the Louisiana delegates at the Charleston Convention, declaring that those delegates in withdrawing from that Convention, "did not thereby resign their seats or renounce their rights and privileges as members of said Convention participating in the proceedings, if they thought proper to do so," and therefore no other persons than said delegates are entitled to represent the Democracy of this State in the adjourned convention to reassemble at Baltimore on the 18th inst;" instructing the delegates to resume their seats in the adjourned convention at Baltimore, "provided they can do so consistently with the honor and constitutional rights of the South;" requesting the delegates to meet the delegates from the other seceding States at Richmond, with the view of conferring together for concerted action in regard to the great issues to be presented to them at the Baltimore convention; instructing the delegates that in case the Baltimore convention should refuse a proper modification of the platform adopted at Charleston to return from said convention, and meet the delegates of such of our sister States as may concur with us in our views, and make such a platform, and nominate such candidates as may be acceptable to the Democratic party;" and finally instructing the delegates in all their proceedings to act and to cast the vote of the State as a unit, in accordance with the will of a majority of the delegates present. The Douglas convention adopted a preamble and a series of resolutions. The preamble asserts that the Louisiana delegates by withdrawing from the Charleston convention, and joining in the formation of a new and strictly sectional party have vacated their seats in said Convention, and severed themselves from the great National Democratic family;" also that the Democratic Executive Committee, by declining to convoke a Democratic State Convention to fill the vacancies thus created, and by endorsing the action of the seceding delegates, have renounced all fellowship with the National Democratic party.—The resolutions (among other things) declare that the Convention "deems the action of the seceding delegates as an unwarranted rebellion against the great principle of Democracy and paramount rule of party discipline which pledges the assent and submission of the minority to the will and resolves of the majority," also that the true and real Democracy of Louisiana have no sympathy with such as seek to subvert the the time honored usages of the National Democratic party." After endorsing the doctrine of non-intervention, &c., the resolutions conclude with a declaration that the Convention has the most unbounded confidence in the firmness, patriotism and political honesty of Stephen A. Douglas, and looks upon him as one of the safest guardians of popular rights and of the equality of the States under the Constitution. But whilst it unhesitatingly avows its preference for him as the champion of the coming Presidential contest, it pledges its support and the support of Louisiana to the nominees of Baltimore, whoever they may be." A resolution offered by Mr. Soule, instructing the delegates to vote for Mr. Douglas, and to continue so to do as long as his name remained before the convention, was withdrawn, after a very excited debate. A resolution instructing the delegates to Baltimore to cast their votes on all questions as a unit was adopted. The delegates to Baltimore were appointed, and after some debate on other matters, the Convention adjourned. So, it appears, Louisiana will have two sets of delegates demanding admission to the Baltimore Convention.

The friends of Bell and Everett met in Faneuil Hall, Boston, on the evening of the 1st inst., to ratify the nominations made by the Constitutional Union party at Baltimore. There was an immense and enthusiastic gathering, and the proceedings were full of interest.

The Hon. Henry M. Rector has been invited by a number of citizens of Arkansas to permit the use of his name as a candidate for the office of Governor.

Gen. Wilson declines the nomination of the Union party of Missouri for Governor.

Democratic State Conventions were held last week in Georgia and Alabama, and at both the seceding Delegates from the Charleston Convention were sustained and sent to the adjourned Convention at Baltimore, with authority to withdraw to Richmond, in certain contingencies, and there make nominations for President and Vice President. At those conventions the majority withdrew, adopted their platform and appointed a new set of Delegates to Baltimore. Georgia and Alabama as well as Louisiana, will each have two Delegations asking admission to the adjourned national Democratic Convention.

The Austin State Gazette announces that the Democracy of Texas will be duly represented at the Baltimore Convention by the Charleston Delegation, appointed by the Galveston Convention.

The Convention of the seceding Delegates from the Charleston Convention re-assembled in Richmond on Monday, 10th inst. A dispatch says "It is generally believed the Convention will not at present take any final action on the subject of a nomination, but after a day or two of consulting among the members, and perhaps the adoption of a platform of principles, it will adjourn to await the action of the Baltimore Convention, to which all the delegates are accredited.

DOMESTIC NEWS.

The Japanese Treaty.—The Washington Constitution publishes an official copy of this treaty, and of the regulations under which American trade is to be conducted in Japan, which were finally ratified in Washington on the 24th of May. The treaty provides that the ports of Simoda, Hako-dadi, Kanagawa, Kagasaki and Nee-e-gata were to be opened to Americans previous to Jan. 1, 1861, and that Hiogo should also be opened on the first day of January, 1863. At all these ports a certain limited region of the surrounding country is to be thrown open for the free migration of Americans, and a fair opportunity appears to be thus offered to them to cultivate the acquaintance of the Japanese, and to establish a traffic in all articles upon which a mutually profitable and advantageous trade can be conducted. After 1862 Americans are to be allowed to reside in the city of Yeddo, and after the first day of January, 1863, in the city of Genco. Free exercise of religion, and the right to erect suitable places of worship is to be secured to Americans in Japan, with the understanding that the citizens of neither country are to offer any insult or injury to the temples or religious worship of the other.

The regulations under which the American trade is to be conducted, provide for the regular entry and clearance of vessels, and for the punishment of smuggling, &c., as well as for the strict prohibition of the importation of opium—the fees to be paid to Japanese custom-house officers, &c. The Japanese tariff is singularly brief and comprehensive, and is embraced in the regulations as follows:

Regulation Seventh. Duties shall be paid to the Japanese Government on all goods landed in the country according to the to the following tariff:

Class One. All articles in this class shall be free of duty. Gold and silver, coined and uncoined. Wearing apparel in actual use. Household furniture and printed books not intended for sale, but the property of persons who come to reside in Japan.

Class Two. A duty of (5) five per cent shall be paid on the following: All articles used for the purpose of building, rigging, repairing, or fitting out of ships; whaling gear of all kinds; salted provisions of all kinds; coals; timber for building houses; rice; paddy; steam machinery; zinc; lead; tin; raw silk.

Class Three. A duty of (35) thirty-five per cent, shall be paid on all intoxicating liquors, whether prepared by distillation, fermentation, or in any other manner.

Class Four. All goods not included in any of the preceding classes shall pay a duty of (20) twenty per cent.

All articles of Japanese productions which are exported as cargo, shall pay a duty of (5) five per cent., with the exception of gold and silver coin and copper, in bars. (5) five years after the opening of Kanagawa the import and export duties shall be subject to revision, if the Japanese government desires it.

The U. S. Senate has confirmed the apointment of Stephen Higginson, Jr., of Massachusetts, as Consul at Padang, in the Island of Sumatra, to fill a vacancy caused by the death of the late Franklin P. Reed, also of Massachusetts.

In New York a few days ago Albert W. Hicks, convicted of piracy and murder on the high seas, was sentenced to be hanged on the 13th of July next. Hicks, it will be recollected, committed the murders on board the Oyster sloop, E. A. Johnson.

Fire in San Antonio.—A fire occurred in the Alamo building, San Antonio, on the 26th ult., but by combined efforts its ravages were confined to a comparatively small range. The flames were not however subdued until a large amount of property was destroyed. The premises consumed were stables and workshops adjoining the main buildings. The entire loss is variously estimated at from $50,000 to $75,000.

Oscar F. Bledsoe, of Lowndes county, Miss., took the first honor of the State University at the recent commencement.

Arctic Expedition.—A new Arctic expedition sailed from New London, Connecticut, a few days ago, in the bark George Henry. The expedition consists of Mr. B. F. Hall, of Cincinnati, and his Esquimaux guide, Cud-la-ja-eh. Mr. Hall designs to leave the vessel in which he sailed at Sussex Island, taking with him a large boat, which has been constructed expressly for him, and with which he designs to make explorations in the region lying between Cape Willoughby and the entrance to Fury and Hecla Strait. A crew of five Esquimaux, which he will select at Sussex Island, will assist him in his researches. Mr. Hall hopes to obtain further traces of the party which went with Sir John Franklin.

The Columbia, S. C., papers state that steps have been taken to erect a monument to Wm. C. Preston.

The Great Eastern.—This monster steamship was announced to leave Southampton on Saturday last for New York with a limited number of passengers. It said that there is much indignation felt in Maine, and all along the line of the Grand Trunk Railway, that the Great Eastern is to go to New York instead of to Portland, in spite of the expenses the latter has been put to for her reception, in the building of docks, &c. It is looked upon as a shameful breach of faith. In New York however, the feeling is the reverse of this; it is one of joyous exultation, as might be expected, and the Gothamites are rejoicing at the prospect of a new sensation on the arrival of the long expected vessel, and a rich harvest of dollars to be gathered from the thousands of people who will be attracted to New York to view the largest ship that ever floated. Doubts, however, are expressed in many quarters as to the possibility of the Great Eastern's crossing the Bar, although an experienced and skilful New York pilot, who has gone to England to bring the ship into port, expressed full confidence in his ability to do so with perfect safety.

The Slaver Wanderer.—The U. S. Circuit Court at Savannah adjourned on the 31st ult., after passing sentence on Messrs. C. A. L. Lamar, J. Mott Middleton, Carey W. Styles and William Hone, who plead guilty to the charge of having rescued Capt. Farnham from the county jail. The Court, in consequence of their having plead guilty, sentenced them each to pay $250 fine and to be imprisoned thirty days, leaving the place of their confinement optional with the U. S. Marshal. The Court have admitted Capt. Farnham to bail in the sum of $5,000, and Capt. Nicholas A. Brown in the sum of $1,000, to appear at the next term to stand their trial, charged with being engaged in the landing of negroes from the Wanderer.

San Antonio, Texas, appears to be rapidly increasing in population. Improvement is the order of the day. We notice a statement that over one hundred new buildings are in course of erection in that city.

The Spanish Government, through its Consul at Richmond, has advanced propositions for an immense amount of Virginia and Kentucky tobacco during the coming three years. The total amount wanted is about 40,000,000 pounds.

A gentleman in Philadelphia has recently received an order from that distinguished Mormon, Brigham Young, for a paper mill to be erected in Utah, and driven with water power from Salt Lake. The machinery will cost $30,000.

There is to be a great day in Cleveland, Ohio, on the 10th of September next, when the corner stone will be laid of the monument of Oliver H. Perry, one of the greatest naval heroes that the conquering race of Anglo Saxon sea-kings ever produced. The oration on the occasion will be delivered by George Bancroft.

Col. Wm. R. Hallett, for many years President of the Bank of Mobile, and a gentlemen of great distinction and influence in Alabama, as a Banker, Merchant, and Democratic leader, died in New York, where he was on a visit, on the 5th inst., at an advanced age.

Storm in the West.—The entire West seems to be the section this year of extraordinary disturbance of the elements. A terrible storm visited St. Louis on the evening of the 2d last. The thunder boomed out peal after peal with deafening and stunning effect, the lightning flashed incessantly, the wind swooped down in fearful gusts, and after a lull "the windows of heaven were opened," and torrents of rain descended as if there was to be another general deluge. The thunder and lightning still crashed and flashed with appalling violence, and men as well as women and children were stricken with fright. It appears that happily there was no loss of life, but there was great destruction of property. On the evening of the 3d a tornado swept over north-western Illinois and eastern Iowa with the most destructive violence and the most terrible effects. At Clinton, Iowa, it commenced at 7.30, and although it lasted but two and a half minutes it caused more destruction of life and property than any similar storm that has visited that portion of the country. The towns of Camanche, Iowa and Albany, on opposite sides of the river, and five miles below Clinton, Iowa, were completely demolished. In Camanche thirty-two dead bodies were taken from the ruins, and still there were a number that could not be got at. In Albany, five or six dead bodies were found, with about fifty wounded, some seriously. At Morrison, Ill., five persons were killed and five seriously wounded. In the vicinity of Lynden, three miles south of Sterling, fifteen persons were badly injured by having arms and legs broken.—The tornado passed two miles northwest of Amboy. Report says over ten lives were lost and a number badly injured. Alten, Ill., suffered severely. Some twenty dead bodies were found there, among the piles of lumber, bricks, and the wreck of houses, after the storm. Three churches were seriously injured, and the Democrat newspaper office was laid in ruins—all the machinery and materials being destroyed.

A despatch from Louisville states that on the 4th a tremendous storm passed over that city, and made its way in a northerly direction, where, according to accounts received from several points above, it has done immense damage to property.

A Washington despatch says the Secretary of of War has summoned Gen. Harney to arrange for an extensive campaign against the Indians. Another despatch states that Gen. Jessup, U. S. Army, died in Washington on Sunday, 10th inst.

A destructive fire occurred in Franklin, Parish of St. Mary, on the morning of the 5th inst. Loss estimated at between $20,000 and $30,000.

The law prohibiting the manumission of slaves in Maryland, went into operation on the 1st inst.

New Mexico.—Late accounts from New Mexico represent that the Navajo Indians had made an attack upon Fort Defiance and came very near taking it, the occupants not expecting anything of the sort. Fortunately, by some mismanagement of the Indians, their presence was discovered, and after some fighting they were repulsed. The loss on either side is not reported.

The President has appointed the Hon. Cave Johnson, of Tennessee, Commissioner to Paraguay, under the new treaty, in place of John Van Buren, declined.

The Japanese Embassy left Washington on the 8th, for Baltimore, where they had a handsome reception. Business was generally suspended, and an immense number of people assembled in the streets to view the procession on the arrival of the distinguished strangers, and to witness the grand display of fireworks at night. On the 9th, the Embassy left for Philadelphia.

The Growing Crops in Georgia.—The Savannah Republican, of the 2d inst., says: "The impression seems to be that but a moderate crop of wheat will be made in the State generally; equal, however, fully to the product of last year, and in some sections exceeding it. Corn and cotton, though small, are vigorous and healthy throughout the State, giving promise, without disaster, of an abundant yield. The rice crops of the low country are generally in flourishing condition. The inland plantations have suffered somewhat for want of water, but the grain is now looking well and promising finely. The same may be said of sea island cotton, which has been thrown back by the drought, but is now in a flourishing condition. Fruit of all kinds is most promising, and we shall probably have more of it and better than we have had for some years."

The Japanese Embassy.—A dispatch from Washington says that the Japanese Ambassadors took leave of the President on the 9th inst. It is further said that after visiting the principal Northern cities, the Embassy will leave New York on or about the 7th of July, on board the frigate Niagara for Japan.

The Indians in Arizona.—Late advices from Arizona represent that the Indians in the Territory were becoming very troublesome. They were attacking trains, killing people, and stealing mules along the mail route. The Governor had issued his proclamation, and volunteers were in the field.

Kentucky Hemp Crop.—The Louisville Courier reports that the recent violent storms in Kentucky have proved very destructive to the hemp crop of the State.

Another Prince Coming.—It seems that Prince Napoleon is about to sail from France for this country, in the Government vessel Cassard.

New Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern Railroad.—The Picayune, noticing the regular monthly meeting of the Board of Directors of this road, makes the following gratifying statement: "We learn that a committee was authorized to make arrangements for ironing as speedily as possible that part of the extension of the railroad beyond Canton, of which the grading is under contract, and expected to be soon finished, by Messrs. Cooke, Bradford & Co. We are glad to learn that the exhibit of the finances of the company ensures beyond question the punctual payment of the July interest on the mortgage bonds, and the contribution to the "sinking fund" for the redemption of the principal. The provision is actually made in full. The resources of the company have been already increased by a large curtailment of its expenses, and with its increasing business, under careful management, there is no doubt that its floating debt will be gradually, but steadily absorbed, and its re-established credit suffice to provide the means of carrying on to early completion the extension of the road, pursuant to its new engagements with the State of Mississippi."

The Crops in Texas.—The accounts of the condition of the corn and cotton crops in Texas are very favorable, while the wheat crop, now being harvested, will prove a very heavy yield.

University of Mississippi.—The two literary Societies of the University have elected the Hon. J. F. H. Claiborne, of Bay St. Louis, to deliver the anniversary oration at the next Commencement, June 18th.

Hon. D. L. Yulee.—The Florida papers publish a letter from this gentleman in which he announces his determination to retire from public life altogether.—we presume at the expiration of his present Senatorial term, though the precise time is not stated.

Prince de Joinville.—The Prince, (son of the late Louis Phillippe) who has been travelling in this country for some time; recently left Washington for New York, where he spent several days very pleasantly, and then proceeded to Canada, visiting Mr. Polat on his way. At last accounts the Prince was in Toronto, en route to the Canadian hunting and fishing grounds. The New York Herald says, "about the middle of next month he will leave for Europe, returning again in the course of six months with his young son and two nephews—the Count de Paris and the Duc de Chartres—who are at present traveling in Syria. It is the intention of the Prince to place his son in the Naval Academy of Annapolis for a course of instruction."

A Disinherited Daughter Righted.—A few days ago in the Surrogate's Court, New York, the will of the widow of the late Stephen Whitney, the millionaire, whose death occurred a few months ago, was admitted to probate. Mrs. Whitney leaves $6500 to her neices, and all the rest of her property to her daughter, Emeline Dore, wife of John Dore. Mr. Whitney left this daughter comparatively a small portion of his estate, which is probably the reason she has been so liberally provided for by Mrs. Whitney.

Cortina.—A letter from Rio Grande city mentions a report that this notorious Mexican border chief is preparing to make another foray on the Texas side of the Rio Grande, and that his preparations are nearly completed. His forces, to the number of 800, it is said, can be called together almost instantaneously, they being scattered in all the ranchos on the river.

The municipal election in Washington city, on the 4th inst., resulted in the re-election of Mayor Berrett, the Democratic candidate, by a majority of twenty-four over all the opposing candidates.

Important Grants to Americans in Honduras.—The Boston Traveller says that Messrs. Raymond H. Weed and W. C. Barchard of New York, who recently arrived at that port from Truxilla, have obtained from the Government of Honduras a large grant of land in the district of Olancho, for the purpose of establishing a colony, and the exclusive right for forty years to the navigation by steamers of the three largest rivers of that country. They will organize a company in New York to carry out their part of the agreement with the Government of Honduras.

Ships for the Captured Africans.—The New York Journal of Commerce says that the ships Castilion, 999 tons, and Ironisphere, 1023 tons, have been chartered under the auspices of the Colonization Society, to take the captured Africans from Key West to Liberia. The price to be paid is understood to be $12,000 for each vessel.

The Hon. Seml. D. Ingham, Secretary of the Treasury under Jackson, died at Trenton, N. J., on the 15th inst., aged eighty-one.

Mr. Appleton, late Assistant Secretary of State, has been confirmed by the United States Senate as Minister to Russia, and Mr. W. H. Trescott, of South Caroline, is appointed to his place in the State Department.

New Wheat.—We learn from the St. Louis papers that new wheat was received there on the 2d inst, from Memphis. It was grown in De Soto county, Mississippi.

Lady Franklin.—The New York Journal of Commerce learns that the North Atlantic Steamship Company have generously proffered to Lady Franklin a free passage for herself, her niece and maid, in the steamship Adriatic, on her next trip from Southampton to New York. The noble woman, the noble wife, when landed on our shores, will have a reception which Queens might envy.

Fowler the Defaulter.—A Washington despatch says that the New York Postmaster (Hon. John A. Dix), in his report respecting Mr. Fowler's defalcation, shows that Mr. Fowler's accounts had never been legally settled during Mr. Buchanan's administration.

Hon. Erastus Corning, of Albany, and James S. Wadsworth, Esq., of Geneseo, have become the securities of John A. Dix, the newly appointed Postmaster for the city of New York, in the sum of $150,000,—double the amount of the bond of the late Postmaster.

The mere cost of land on which British railways are constructed has averaged $43,000 per mile—as much as the average cost of making a railway in the United States.

The country seat of the late John G. Boker—prominently known to the public by his ownership of the Art Union Gallery, and disowning his daughter Mary Boker, who married John Dean, his coachman—situated a short distance above Tarryton, on the Hudson River, was a few days since sold at auction for $91,000.

Expensive Law Suit Ended.—We learn from the New York Herald that the great India Rubber war between Day and Goodyear, is at an end. The Herald understands that, on the 2d inst., Mr. Day sold out his entire interest in the rubber business to the agent of Mr. Goodyear, thus forever settling the vexed question relative to the use of certain patents. During the litigation between these parties, which has been going on for sixteen years, the enormous sum of half a million of dollars, it is said, has been expended in counsel fees, &c.

The Indianola Bulletin learns that the iron for the San Antonio and Mexican Gulf Railroad has been procured, and that the road is in a go-ahead condition.

The Forest Divorce Case.—In the Supreme Court, New York, a few days ago, final judgment was rendered in the Forest divorce case. The court ordered that Mr. Forrest should pay into the United States Trust company in New York, for the benefit of Mrs. Forrest, the sum of $35,593, being the amount adjudged, and also $966 98 for costs, disbursements, etc.

Tornado in Pennsylvania—Loss of Life.—The Pittsburg Post has an account of a fearfully destructive tornado which visited a small village called Mayaville, in Clarion county, Pennsylvania, on the 30th ult., about noon. A grist-mill, saw-mill, store, tavern, and some six or eight houses, stables, etc., situated on Redbank Creek, were entirely blown away. Eight persons have already been found dead.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The news from Europe, received since our last issue, is full of interest, and in several respects highly important, but we have room for only a very brief summary.

From England we learn that the House of Lords had rejected the Commons' bill, repealing the paper duty, also that the further consideration of Lord John Russell's Reform bill had been postponed till the next session of Parliament; also that great preparations are being made in England for the departure of the Prince of Wales to America, which will take place on the 15th of July. Five ships of war will compose the fleet which is to accompany the Prince to Quebec.

The general news from Europe indicates new complications and the great probability of a war in which nearly all the nations will become involved. The cry of persecutions suffered by the Christians in Turkey has again been raised, and there are reports of the concentration of Russian troops in positions threatening Turkey, while it is said France and Russia have made a treaty in relation to the "sick man," having in view the partition of his territory. On the other hand there is a rumor that Austria, Prussia and Great Britain have agreed to maintain the integrity of Turkey. Meanwhile it is understood that the Turkish government, mindful of the signs of the times, is taking measures for defence against aggression. But this is not the only threatening complication. The Italian question, especially since Garebaldi's landing in Sicily, has assumed an aspect which disturbs and fills with apprehension all the European cabinets.—The accounts from Sicily are very contradictory as to Garibaldi's progress, but the weight of testimony shows that his march to Palermo was a triumphant one, that whenever he encountered the Royalist troops he defeated them, and that if not already in Palermo (as some accounts represent) he was in the immediate vicinity, and master of the situation.

Havana.—Late accounts from Havana represent that the cane-grinding continues as many plantations, that the juice is of excellent quality, and that the general opinion is that the crop will be fully equal to that of the last year. On the morning of the 2ed last., four men—one white and three mulattoes, were garrotted near the Punta Castle, in the presence of 20,000 people. They were the murderers of S. Aguero, one of the employées of the Government.

West Indies.—Late advices report a drouth in the West India Islands. At St. Martin's water was so scarce that a police force had to be placed over the fountains.

Mexico.—The accounts from this distracted country are very contradictory. One day we hear that the Liberals have been successful in a battle, and the next arrival brings news that they were defeated, and the Church party victorious. The last account we have, is of the total rout of the Liberal army under command of Gen. Uraga, at Guadalajaha, by General Woll. It is said that Uraga had one of his legs carried off by a cannon shot during the action, notwithstanding which he succeeded in making good his escape.

The great Banking House of Jecker & Co., in the city of Mexico, has failed for an immense amount—some $5,000,000—causing immense excitement.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

Kentucky Baptists.—Rev. S. L. Helm, in the Western Recorder, estimates the Baptists of Kentucky at not more than about 80,000. He thinks that the denomination in that State has not been gaining the last four or five years in numbers—owing to the tide of emigration westward; but that there has been great improvement in the erection of church edifices, schools and colleges, the education of young ministers, and increased beneficence. Dr. D. R. Campbell, in the same paper, states that "within the past five years an amount approaching $300,000 has been raised for educational purposes" by the Baptists of Kentucky, and that there are now 30 promising young men at Georgetown College, preparing for the ministry.

Missionaries.—A correspondent of the New York Evening Post writes from Shanghai: "After all, say what we may of our navy, our consuls and ministers, our merchants and professional men who represent us in foreign lands—and I am proud to say they will not suffer when compared with those of any other nation—yet the truest and by far the best types of American civilization in this land are these pious, educated and devoted men who represent the different religious denominations of our country as missionaries."

Mission Funds of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church.—The Board of Missions of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church reports cash collections for the past year to the amount of $14,442 19 cts.,—an increase of about $5,000 over the receipts of any previous year.

An Example.—In his reference to the new Episcopal church at Front Royal, Va., Bishop Meade says: "A very few young ladies, with no means except those furnished by the labor of their own hands, have, within a few years contributed to the erection of this church, between $700 and $800."

American Baptist Publication Society.—The receipts of this Society, for the past year, were, in the business department, $49,937 20cts., and in the missionery department, $10,019 03 cts. During the year, 52 new publications have been issued, making the number of publications in Catalogue 607, of which 302 are bound volumes. Of the Young Reaper, the Society's Sunday School Paper, 96,000 copies have been issued per month.

New School Presbyterianism.—The reports presented to the General Assembly at Pittsburg, show 40 missionaries employed by the Church Extension Committee, and 50 per cent. increase in receipts—the total being $14,101 13. The whole number of foreign missionaries now in the field is 50, most of whom are married. The amount contributed during the year for the education of young men, was about $30,000, and the number aided about 500. The receipts of the Publication Committee were 16,778 78 cts., and the advance of sales on the preceding year, 50 per cent.

The Methodist Church North and Slavery.—The General Conference of the Methodist Church North, after the loss of the proposed changes of the General Rule, adopted a new chapter on the subject of slavery.

The following is the form of the chapter, as it stood before the late action of the General Conference.

Quest.—What shall be done for the extirpation of the evil of slavery?

Ans.—We declare that we are as much as ever convinced of the great evil of slavery; therefore, no slave-holder shall be eligible to any official station in our church hereafter, where the laws of the State in which he lives will admit of emancipation, and permit the liberated slave to enjoy freedom.

2. When any travelling preacher becomes an owner of a slave, or slaves, by any means, he shall forfeit his ministerial character in our Church, unless he execute, if it be practicable, a legal emancipation of such slaves, conformably to the laws of the State in which he lives.

3. All our preachers shall prudently enforce upon our members the necessity of teaching their slaves to read the word of God; and to allow them time to attend upon the public worship of God on our regular days of divine service.

The chapter substituted for this utterance is in the following words:

Quest.—What shall be done for the extirpation of the evil of slavery?

Ans.—We declare that we are as much as ever convinced of the great evil of slavery. We believe that the buying, selling or holding of human beings as chattels, is inconsistent with the Golden Rule, and with that rule in our Discipline which requires all who desire to continue among us "To do no harm, and to avoid evil in every kind." We, therefore, affectionately admonish all our preachers and people to keep themselves pure from this great evil, and to seek its extirpation by all lawful and Christian means.

CITY NEWS.

The municipal election on Monday, 4th inst., was the most peaceable and orderly of any election we have had for years. There was no rioting, no intimidation, and no act of serious violence that we have heard of. Both tickets were partially successful. The Americans elected John T. Monroe their candidate for Mayor, the four Recorders, one Alderman, and six Assistant Aldermen. The Citizens' ticket was successful in the election of the Street Commissioner, four Aldermen and three Assistant Aldermen. We have no recollection of any former municipal election in which more interest was manifested than in this, and our citizens exult in the fact that it was conducted fairly and without any resort to these violent practices which of late years have been so prevalent, and which have cast a blot on the fair fame of our city.

A beginning has been made in the laying of the track of the city railroad, on Canal street. We hope the day is not far distant when these railroads will penetrate every portion of the city to the outskirts. They will not only be a great public convenience, but will conduce largely to the lucrease in the value of property.

Gen. Wm. Walker left this city on Wednesday for Central America, accompanied by a few of his old fellow officers. As an advertisement has been published, inviting all who wish to emigrate to Central America to address Captain Frysoux, who remains here for the present, it is pretty evident that a new movement is contemplated; and that ere long we may expect stirring news from some of the Central American States.

Reports being in circulation in all parts of the Union that the yellow fever is prevalent in New Orleans, Doctor Delery, President of the Board of Health, on the 7th inst. published a card, in which he states that "there has not been a case of yellow fever in the city, either in private practice or in the Charity Hospital, during the present year."

The Fire Alarm and Police Telegraph has been completed, accepted by the City Council; and is now in full operation. The Council has elected Mr. Achille Hebert Superintendent, and Mr. J. K. Mingle First Assistant Superintendent of the telegraph.

COMMERCIAL.

Monday Evening, June 11, 1860.

We condense the following statement from the New Orleans Price Current of the 9th instant:—

Business in our general market has been of quite a moderate character, since the date of our last report, and in Cotton we have noticed unusual dulness and depression during a portion of the week. Sugar has been in fair request but operations have been restricted by limited supplies and advancing prices. We have noticed a dull market for Flour, but an active demand for Corn, and moderate transactions in Provisions, for which prices have been very well sustained. Freights and exchange have been firm though without much animation.

COTTON.—With respect to prices, we have to remark that the market closed very heavy and unsettled and prices were ten irregular to admit of quotations for the lower grades.

The receipts at this port since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 2,034,958 bales, against 1,582,447 bales to same date last year, and the increase of the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 772,474 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is an increase of 706,999 bales to Great Britain, and of 155,557 to France, while to other foreign ports there is a decrease of 82,703 bales.

New Orleans Classifications:

Inferior	4 @ 5	Good Middling	11¼@12
Ordinary	6 @ 7	Middling Fair	12½@12¾
Good Ordinary	7½@ 8¾	Fair	—@—
Low Middling	9¾@10½	Good Fair	—@—
Middling	10½@11	Good and Fine	—@—

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to 7000 hhds. We quote for Inferior and Refining 3½ to 5½; Common to Good Common 0 to 7; Fair to Fully Fair 7¼ to 7¾; Prime to Choice 7¾ to 8½; Centrifugal and Clarified 7 to 8½ cents per pound. The above quotations apply to round lots, but small orders of 5 hhds and under, could not be filled without paying a further advance of ¼ to ½c per pound.

MOLASSES.—Total receipts of the week 1,500 barrels. The prices obtained during the week were: Inferior to Fair, 25 to 30 cents per gallon; and Prime to Choice, 31 to 35 cents; half barrels, 30 to 36 cents per gallon.

FLOUR.—About 8,000 bbls have been sold during the past week, at from $5 75 to $6 55 for superfine, $6 75 to 7 00 for ordinary to good extra, and $6 75 to $7 50 per bbl. for choice extra brands.

BACON.—Shoulders 8 to 8½; Ribbed Sides 10 to 10½; Clear Sides 11 to 11½; Sugar-cured Hams 12 to 12½ cents per pound.

LARD.—We quote 11¼ to 11¾a for prime to choice prime, in tcs., and 11¾ to 12c. for kegs.

BUTTER.—Western generally selling at 14 to 16 cents per pound, according to quality; and Cheese 9½ to 10c.

BAGGING and BALE ROPE.—We quote Kentucky Bagging at 14½ to 15 cents per yard; India Bagging, 12½ to 13½c; Bale Rope, hand spun, 7½c to 8c, and machine made, 8½ to 9 cents per pound.

COFFEE.—We quote fair at 12½ to 13, and prime at 13½c per pound.

PORK.—The principal sales reported through the week were at $17 75 to $18 25 per bbl. for Mess.

GUNNY BAGS.—Limited parcels sell at 10 cents for light and 10½ to 11c. to heavy and extra heavy bags.

NAVAL STORES.—A good demand for Spirits Turpentine mostly on speculation. Sales of some 500 bbls at 38 to 40. Latterly holders have been asking 40½ to 41c per gallon, the market closing at the outside rate. Of Rosin some 1000 bbls have sold at $1 30 to $1 50 for Common and No 2, and $1 75 to $3 per bbl of 280 pounds for Low No. 1. The finer qualities are scarce and in request. Tar dull and nominal. Stock of same 5000 bbls on hand.

LIVE STOCK.—Beef Cattle—Western, 7 to 8½c. per lb. net; Texas—ordinary to fair $15 to 16, and choice $30 to 50 per head.
Hogs, selling at 0 to 0½c. per pound net.
Sheep—Selling at $4 00 to $5 50 per head.
Veal Cattle—Selling at $8 00 to $14 00 per head.
Milch Cows—at $40 to $85 per head.

BY FANNY SHELDON.

Chapter IV.

"Angry words are lightly spoken
In a rash and thoughtless hour;
Brightest links of life are broken
By their deep insidious power."

Emma West, a beautiful girl about eighteen years of age, an intimate friend of Alline's, called on her one evening. They had been schoolmates together as children, and though differently situated in many respects in life, and entirely different temperaments and dispositions, yet they had found pleasure in the society of each other. Alline's calm, even disposition, her sad, patient face, and her firm, self-reliant nature, formed a striking contrast to the bright blooming face, and wild, impulsive, wayward, giddy-hearted, but warm-hearted Emma. Yet there was a vein of melancholy that lay like an under current beneath this rippling, sunny surface. At times Emma seemed discontented and gloomy, and when crossed or chafed, there shone a wild gleaming in her dark, deep-set eyes, which, though fitful and evanescent, struck the beholder painfully, and caused many to look serious, and often to exclaim, "Her grandfather was a lunatic, and died by his own hand!" As she stood this evening on the portico of Alline's dwelling, there was much of this very strange light in her eyes; her cheek was flushed to deep crimson, and her whole form quivered with emotion.

"How is your mother this evening, Alline?" she inquired. "I hope she is better, for I have come to ask you to walk with me."

"My mother is much better; but what can have happened, Emma, to disturb you? Come in and see mamma, and rest awhile; it is early yet."

"No, no, Alline. I am impatient, and wish to walk to our old seat near the little stream. I have something to tell you."

Alline went in for a few moments. After seeing that her mother was comfortable, and charging little Mary to sit beside her till her return, she prepared for her walk.

"I am glad you are going out, my child," said Mrs. Elwin; "this close confinement to a sick room is stealing the bloom from your cheek, and you know our newly appointed minister is to call this evening; and there is already much rivalry existing among the girls of our little village—each one intends to strive for the prize, and a prize he certainly is, if he merits the reputation that he seems to have already acquired," and Mrs. Elwin smiled as if to cheer her child.

"Mamma, I know you too well to believe you would have me do aught to engage or attract the attention of our minister. No, no, mother, if Alline Elwin ever marries she must be sought and won, for she will never stoop to seek or strive to win; no, not even though the prize be a star of the first magnitude." And she kissed her mother, and bade her good evening.

Mrs. Elwin gazed after the form of her child, and felt that one so high-minded and firm in her principles would have a stronghold within herself; that her firm, unerring adherence to all that was good and right—her unwavering trust in her God, would be her safeguard.

"And though alone in the dark world, a strong unfailing arm
Would be forever round her thrown, defending her from harm."

The home of Emma was situated just beyond Mr. Elwin's, at the distance of a half a mile; but a skirt of woods between rendered the walk an unpleasant one.—The dwelling was a large two-story frame building, which had never been painted; and as it was very old, it had become blackened and mildewed by time, till, within the shade of the sombre-looking, gloomy old trees which surrounded it, it stood the very ideal of forsaken loneliness. The home of Emma had ever been a dreary place to Alline. Well did she remember with what strange, gloomy feelings she had, as a child, always approached this dwelling; and many a time, when the shades of evening had overtaken her in going to or returning from this place, she had felt a depression of spirits amounting almost to fear, and she determined she would not go again, let Emma urge as she might. The inside of the house was not more prepossessing than the outside, for the rooms were large, and being ceiled instead of plastered, they too had blackened by time and looked dreary enough. The parents of Emma were old-fashioned people; they clung with tenacity to the customs of their ancestors, and followed their example in the management of their household; and thus, in the autumn and winter, they might always be seen seated in each corner of the large, open fireplace. The old lady, with her dark dress and bunch of keys, her clean cap and knitting, was a personification of industry. At her side, just within what was termed the work room, and adjoining the dining or sitting-room, stood the old-timed spinning wheel, which whirled round and round with its buzzing and (to Alline) lonely sound, interrupted in its monotonous roll only when the thread broke or the work had to be adjusted. That spinning wheel, with its ceaseless sound, with that dark, shining, though somewhat sullen-looking servant, was an unpleasant curiosity as well as an annoyance to our heroine when ever she went to Oak Hill, as it was called. The old man sat with his pipe in his mouth, in a half doze, while ever and anon the blue smoke curled up about and above his head, filling the apartment with a smell of tobacco, and rendering the time-worn but massive furniture almost, to Alline's excited, active imagination, objects of terror—seen, as they were, by the dim light of the yellow coals which remained from what had been earlier in the evening a cheerful blaze. But it appeared that this evening fire was never replenished, or lights brought, till twilight deepened into night, the old people preferring to meditate or doze away this portion of their lives in gloom and shadows. The tea-kettle simmered and hissed upon the hearth in front of the red coals, for the tea was invariably made under the old lady's eye; and often Alline has sat there and wondered and listened to the lowing of the cattle, the bleating of the sheep, and the harsher discord of geese, each heart knowing its own sorrow, but each receiving it so differently. One, bowing in meek humility and resignation to the will of heaven, and becoming better and more disciplined for life every day; the other, resisting the holy influence that would have "tempered the wind to the shorn lamb," murmured at the chastening of a Father's hand, and became more discontented and unhappy every day.

"Well, Emma," said Alline, after they had seated themselves, "what has occurred to make you so restless and unhappy? If I can be of service, or can soothe your sorrow, be assured I will do so willingly."

"Be of service you cannot, Alline; but you can soothe and calm my irritable temper, when no other can. Well, you know I have been engaged to Edward Leslie for three years. I was but fourteen years old when he sought and won my heart; and though but a child in years, I loved him with all a woman's deep, abiding love. I did not know that his family were unacquainted with his feelings toward me, and dreamed not that they would object; but, while walking with Ellen Carlton and Alles May last evening, Anna Leslie and some other girls followed at a short distance behind—so near that I could not fail to overhear their conversation, and I know not but that it was intended for my ears. I heard Anna say, in reply to a question of one of the girls, 'No, he did not go with Emma West, for he told me that he was to attend Betty Coleman to church.' 'But he did go with Emma West, for they were before us only a few steps, and I saw them,' said one. 'I then heard Anna exclaim, in an indignant tone, 'I cannot imagine what brother Edward sees in her to admire. If he persists in these attentions, he will disgrace himself and all his family. A poor, proud creature, in whose family there is hereditary lunacy! If the combined efforts of every friend he has can prevail, he shall never marry her.' Alline, you cannot conceive how my passionate nature chafed at this public insult. I grew more incensed every moment, and not being able to contain my rage, I turned and spoke to her. I am not conscious now of all I said, but I gave her to understand that the wealthy, aristocratic family of the Leslies, which could boast of but an old homestead, and a genealogy of mechanics and tradesmen, should never blush that Emma West, whose ancestral name descended from artists and statesmen, yea the greatest and most celebrated that our own free, glorious country could ever boast, was allied to them. I west directly home, and in my room I found relief; but not in tears; no, I seldom shed teers, and I was too excited to weep now. But I found relief in the determination to break the tie which bound me so long to him—to crush from my heart every fond hope, to bid farewell to happiness and peace forever. In this resolution I found a degree of calmness which surprised even myself. And now, Alline, it remains but for me to see him, tell him all this, return this small glittering bauble, and say farewell. If I could do this calmly, and without passion, I should be victorious over him and myself also; but how to subdue my own excited, wayward heart, how to control my temper, is a lesson I have never learned."

"But, Emma, why do this? Perhaps his family are mistaken, or something has happened which he can explain to your satisfaction. I should certainly ask this explanation before I resorted to the final breaking of the engagement. I am truly pained that this should have occurred, for I do believe that Edward Leslie loves you devotedly."

"I know this too, Alline, and I know that in rending asunder the ties which bind me to him, his own heart will bleed, and his own strong, proud nature will quiver and writhe in anguish equal to mine own. Seek an explanation! No, no, Alline! Not though it could give me back the peace, hope and happiness which I possessed a few short hours ago. No, I will abide my destiny, and a dark one, it appears, it is to be."

"Emma, seek comfort where it can alone be found; depend not upon your own strength to bear this trial. God will aid you to control your temper, and to calm your troubled heart. Act not harshly, or with revengeful retaliation; but consider—he may be entirely innocent, and may have no knowledge that his family are opposed to his marriage with you."

"Then why say, Alline, that he was to attend Betty Coleman to church, when conscious that he had made an engagement with me? Yes, he knew it, and it was a deception of which I can scarce deem him capable. He has appeared so noble, high-minded and honorable, that this grieves me more than all else. To think that he would utter a falsehood to shield himself from the censure or opinion of any one. I gave him credit for more independence."

"This still may be a mistake. Have charity, Emma, and do be more lenient to him; at least until you hear all this confirmed."

"I shall wait for no confirmation, Alline. But it is getting late, and we had better go."

"Yes, mamma may be anxious for me if I am late," said Alline.

"I have tried to comfort Emma, and to soothe her excited feelings, and hope I have succeeded in winning her to thoughts better calculated to tranquillize her mind," thought Alline as she hurried home.

Children's Column.

THE LITTLE PREACHER.

It may interest some of the younger readers of the "Children's Column" to learn something about a little Sabbath-school scholar who was known among his schoolmates as "The Little Preacher." His parents named him CHARLES J. IVY—the last name in compliment to the then pastor of the church to which they belonged.—"Ivy" was scarcely five summers old when he died. But short as was that life, in it he learned much of God and the holy child Jesus, and of heaven and the angels, from his pious parents and at the Sabbath-school. He was very fond of the pastor, whom he would naively address as "Bud Ivy," and would sometimes tell him he would be a preacher too. Often would he gather around him his little companions, and, in his own child-like way, preach to them. He would tell them that Jesus loved good little boys and girls, and that God would take such to heaven, where they would live with angels and with his "sissy" and "buddy" who were already there. On these occasions the "little preacher" would sometimes say things so singularly touched with earnest piety, as to astonish his parents and others. Little Ivy was greatly attached to the Sabbath-school—ever when the Sunday morning came would he be sure to urge his Pa to take him there, he wanted to go so much. He delighted to hum over the "songs of Zion" which he heard sung at Sabbath-school; in this way he learned a great many hymns; among his favorites were—

"Way over in the promised land," and that other sweet, exulting strain,

"Happy day! oh, happy day!
When Jesus washed my sins away."

Indeed, heaven and the angels seemed to constantly occupy the "little preacher's" thoughts, especially the last few weeks of his life. A few minutes before he died, while his parents and some children and kind neighbors stood by his bedside, he looked affectionately on them, and then his childish lips prayed, in accents of touching tenderness, "Dod bess all! Dod bess de chil'en! Dod bess Suay!" ("Suay" was the colored woman who assisted in taking care of him during his sickness.) His Pa then asked him "My son, do you wish to go to heaven, to be with sister Georgiana and all the angels?" The dying child answered, with a peculiar calm and emphasis, "Yes, Pa!" and before many moments passed, the sweet, pure spirit of the child was caught up by holy angels to the bosom of Him who said, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

Little Ivy was unmistakeably an example of the blessed influence Sabbath-schools and pious family training have upon children of even his very early years. His case was a clear proof of the practicability of instilling genuine piety into the hearts of the youngest of children; and, as such, should be an encouragement to pious parents to commence early—very early—to instruct their "little ones" in holy things.

STORY OF GRACE DARLING.

Among the heroines of history the name of Grace Darling will ever claim a high place. The noble act which made her known to the world should be held in perpetual memory, in justice to her and as a stimulus to philanthropy. Finding that the facts in her history had passed so much from public remembrance, and that they were so inaccessible, a friend has condensed the narrative from Chambers' Miscellany for our columns. It will be new to many of our readers and interesting to all:

Grace Darling, the seventh child of William Darling, was born November 24, 1815, at Bamborough, on the coast of Northumberland, but most of her girlhood, to the time of her death, was spent within the prison-like walls of the Longstone Light-house.

Her disposition was reserved and retiring. In person she was about the middle size, of fair complexion and pleasing countenance; there was nothing masculine in her appearance, but, on the contrary, she presented a very gentle aspect, with an expression of the greatest mildness and benevolence.

William Howett, the poet, who visited her after the noble deed which made her so justly celebrated, found her a realization of his idea of Jennie Denn; he said: "Her smile was the sweetest he had ever seen in one of her station and appearance;" and added, that "she was thoroughly good—under her modest exterior lay a spirit capable of the most exalted devotion—a devotion so active that daring seemed not so much a quality of her nature as the most perfect sympathy with suffering, or endangered humanity, swallowed up and annihilated everything like fear or self-consideration—put out, in fact, every sentiment of itself."

Living on this lonely spot, in the midst of the ocean, with the voice of the tempest familiarized to her mind—the sound of the everlasting sea her only prospect, with now and then a distant sail on the horizon—Grace Darling was shut out, as it were, from the active scenes of life, and debarred from the innocent enjoyments of society and companionship, which, as a female, must have been dear to her, unaccustomed though she was to their indulgence.

She was twenty-two years of age when the incident occured which has made her name so universally known. The Forfarshire steamer, a vessel of about 300 tons burden, under command of Mr. John Humble, sailed from Hull, on her voyage to Dundee, on the eve of Wednesday, September 5th, 1838, with a valuable cargo of hale goods and sheet iron, and having on board sixty-three souls. In consequence of the very inefficient state of the vessel, though only two years old, it soon became unmanageable, and the tide setting strong in the south, she proceeded in that direction. It raised heavily during the whole time, and the fog was so dense it was impossible to tell her situation. At length breakers were discovered close to leeward, and the Farne lights, which were now visible, left no doubt as to the imminent peril of all the crew. Capt. Humble vainly attempted to avert the catastrophe by running the vessel between the island and the mainland; she would not answer the helm, however, but was driven to and fro by the furious sea. About half past three in the morning she struck, with her bows foremost on the rock, the ruggedness of which is such that at periods when it is dry, it is scarcely possible for any one to stand erect upon it, and the edge which met the timbers of this ill-fated steamer descends a hundred fathoms deep or more.

At this crisis some of the passengers, (steat only on self-preservation, lowered one of the boats and left the ship. The scene now presented on board was painful in the extreme. Cries of anguish and despair were heard on every side from the women and children—among them the captain's wife, who clinging to him, frantically besought that protection which, alas! it was not in his power to give.

Very soon after the first shock, a powerful wave struck the vessel, which raised her off the rock, but next moment she was thrown with greater violence against the sharp edge of the cliff, which striking her about midship, broke her in two pieces. The afterpart, containing the cabin, with many of the passengers, was instantly carried off through a tremendous current called the Pile Gut, which is considered dangerous even in good weather, while the fore part remained on the rock.

In the fore cabin, exposed to the fury of the waves, was Sarah Dawson, the wife of a weaver, with two children. When relief came, life was still trembling in the bosom of the mother, but her children lay cold in death by her side. The sufferers, nine in number, remained in their dreadful and perilous situation till dawn, fearing lest every rising surge would sweep the fragments of wreck on which they stood into the dark and foaming abyss beneath their feet.

As day broke, on the morning of the 7th, they were described from the Longstone Lighthouse by the Darlings, at nearly a mile's distance. A mist hung over the island, and though the wind had somewhat abated, the sea, which even in the calmest weather is never at rest among the gorges between those iron pinnacles, still raged fearfully. At the lighthouse were only Mr. and Mrs. Darling and their heroic daughter. The boisterous state of the seas is sufficiently proved by the fact that at a later period in the day a reward of £5 offered by Mr. Smeddle, the steward of Bamborough Castle, could not induce a party of fisherman to venture off the malaland. To brave the perils of that terrible passage then, would have done the highest honor to the well-tried nerves of even the stoutest of the male sex. But what shall be said of the errand of mercy being undertaken and accomplished mainly through the strength of a female heart and arm?

Through the dim mist, by the aid of a glass, the figures of the sufferers were seen clinging to the wreck. But who would dare to tempt the raging waves that intervened, with the hope of rescuing them? It is said that Mr Darling shrank from the attempt; not so his daughter. At her solicitation the boat was launched with the help of her mother, and father and daughter entered it, each taking an oar. What makes it more remarkable is that Grace Darling never had occasion to assist in the boat previous to this time, others of the family being always at hand.

In estimating the dangers which the heroic adventurers encountered, there is one circumstance that ought not to be forgotten. Had it not been ebb tide the boat could never have passed between the islands, and Darling and his daughter knew that the tide would be flowing on their return, when their united strength would have been utterly insufficient to pull the boat back to the lighthouse; so that, had they not obtained the assistance of the survivors in rowing back, they themselves would have been compelled to remain on the rock beside the wreck till the tide again ebbed. It could only have been by great muscular power, as well as determined courage that the father and daughter carried the boat up to the rock, and when there, a danger greater even than they had encountered in approaching it, arose from the difficulty of steadying the boat and preventing its being destroyed on these sharp edges by ever-restless heaving of the billows.

The nine sufferers were, however, safely rescued. One of the poor fellows, in speaking of it afterward, with tears, said the thrill of delight which he experienced in seeing the boat approach the rock changed to a feeling of amazement, which no language could express, when he saw that one of their deliverers was a female. They were all taken at once to the lighthouse, which was their only place of refuge at the time. Grace gave up her bed to poor Mrs. Dawson, and contented herself with lying down on the table.

No sooner was the circumstance known through the papers that a young girl had thus risked her life than that lonely lighthouse become the center of attraction to curious and sympathizing thousands, including many of the wealthy and the great, who in most instances testified, by substantial tokens, the feelings with which they regarded the young heroine. The Duke and Duchess of Northumberland invited her and her father to Alnwick Castle, and presented her with a gold watch. The Humane Society sent her a most flattering vote of thanks, and the President gave her a handsome teapot. A public subscription was also raised, which amounted to about £700. To such a pitch did the enthusiasm rise, that a large nightly sum was offered her by the proprietors of the Metropolitan Theatre, on condition that she would merely sit in a boat during the performance of a piece in which her character bore a prominent part, but she declined all such offers.

Amidst all this applause, Grace never forgot the modest dignity of conduct which became her sex and station. These many testimonials only seemed to produce in her mind feelings of wonder and grateful pleasure—although her circumstances were very much improved, preferred to reside with her parents at the lighthouse.

In 1841, her health failing, she was removed to Bamborough, and placed under the care of Dr. Fende. Finding no relief, she was taken to Wooler, and from thence to Newcastle, for further medical advice. The Duchess of Northumberland, hearing of her arrival, immediately procured a comfortable place for her in an airy part of the city, supplied the poor sufferer with every requisite, and sent her own physician to give her the benefit of his medical counsel. But consumption had set his seal on this fair young girl, and death had marked her for his own.

Once more she was removed back to her sister's home at Bamborough, where she arrived only ten days before her decease. On the day of her removal from Alnwick, the Duchess of Northumberland—without any attendant, and attired in a very simple manner—called to take her last farewell of Grace, which she did with the most unaffected kindness.

Shortly before her death she expressed a strong desire to see as many of her relations as could come, and, with surprising fortitude and self-command, gave each some token of remembrance. The thought of death gave her no uneasiness, and, throughout her whole illness, no complaint escaped her lips.

On the 20th of October, 1842, she quietly sank into that sleep which knows no awakening on this side of eternity; and, on the Monday following, her remains were carried to the grave, attended by a large concourse of people. Such was the brief career of this truly noble and heroic maiden.—Life Illustrated.

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

Sister SALLIE A. BREAZEALE, wife of brother James K. Breazeala, and daughter of Joseph Soles, Esq., died in the faith of the gospel, 15th of April, near Farmersville, Lowndes Co., Ala. She had buried two interesting little boys last Spring. This was a great affliction, but it was sanctified to the good of the parents. This writer had the pleasure of taking them both into the Church last Fall. Sister B. left an infant which in ten days was taken again to the arms of its mother. All who knew sister B. loved her. She lived and died a Christian.

SARAH T. CHEVIS, daughter of David T. and Elizabeth F. Chevis, died in Vermillion parish, La., April 15, 1860, in her 54th year, after a long and tedious pulmonary disease. So quietly and gently did she fall asleep that those who were watching knew not the moment that she ceased to breathe. Long a member of the Methodist Church, of whose doctrines and usages she was ever a zealous defender. Punctual to the performance of her religious duties, especially in the religious instruction of her pupils, she was nevertheless always a doubting Christian.

PROGRESS OF PROTESTANTISM IN MISSISSIPPI AND THE SOUTH-WEST.—No. XIX.

MR. EDITOR—We have in Fayette Circuit, Mississippi Conference, one of the most interesting historical records to be found in the archives of Southern Methodism. It is the Steward's book, which, with but few omissions, has been regularly kept forty-five years. It contains the names of all the Presiding Elders and Preachers in regular succession, with the amount of their claims and receipts, the manner of raising the money, the places from whence it came, &c. The way we came in possession of this very interesting record seems to have been this: the little tract of country, now embraced in Fayette circuit, was about the centre of Tobias Gibson's original Natchez circuit, and as new circuits were set off from either end, the records tended toward the centre, so that when this got to be Cole's Creek circuit about thirty years ago, with Reuben B. Rickets for Recording Steward, tradition says he collected all the records he could find pertaining to the finances of the circuit, as it had been and then was, and transcribed them into a suitable book, since which time John M. Fulkes and Benjamin F. Jones, as Recording Stewards, have continued the records with praiseworthy care to the present time. The first entry in the book is as follows: "Feb. 7th, 1805. The Mississippi Territory being one circuit, William Foster and Randall Gibson Stewards."

I now propose to give your readers an extract from this old record, in order to show them how the assessments were made in those days, and in what sort of currency the preachers were paid. The account which I transcribe does not stand closed on the book, and probably that part relating to the transactions of the last quarter was lost. The credits were made on the 12th of August, and as neither of the preachers had received his disciplinary allowance, I take it for granted other entries ought to have been made, but enough is found to answer my purpose.

Rocky Spring, 1400 lb. seed cotton, at $2 50 per hundred lb.	$35 00
Hick'a Class, 400 lb. " "	10 00
Clark's Creek, 400 lb. " "	10 00
Redlick Class, 1100 lb. " "	27 00
Hopewell, 870 lb. gin'd cotton, sold for	133 75
Same, 330 lb., in Natchez unsold	— —

Credits Aug. 12th., by cash paid—

Anthony Huuston's traveling expenses,	$9 12½
Same, quarterage,	50 20
Same, in 11¼ yrds bagging,	8 64
Same, 14 lbs. Rope for bailing,	1 46
Same, 200 lbs. seed cotton,	5 00
J. M'Minn's travelling expenses,	1 00
Same, quarterage,	14 00
Isaac M'Cowa, "	47 00
John M'Clury, P.E.,	38 00
Same, per Barkes for J. M'Minn,	2 00
Same, for 1 bottle sacramental wine,	1 00

I have introduced this extract in order to give your readers some idea about the currency and commercial transactions of the times. The currency of the country in those days consisted almost exclusively of what were termed "gin receipts," and Spanish silver coin. About one man in a township, and in some places not more than one in a county, was able to own a cotton gin. The cotton producers would haul their cotton to the gin in lots to suit their convenience, and after the gin holder inspected it as to quality, it was weighed in large baskets made for the purpose, and passed into the gin. After deducting one-tenth of the gross amount for toll, the gin-holder gave the producer his receipt for the balance. The producer took this receipt to his principal merchant, with which he paid his store account, and received the balance in his favor in Spanish silver coin, with which he paid other accounts, or made other purchases. The merchant holding these receipts was entitled to receive from the gin-holder, in ginned cotton, one fourth of the weight of the seed cotton for which his receipts called, which he sent to his factor to be sold to the cotton brokers, generally at a remunerative rate, though sometimes at a loss. So you see that the preachers, who were paid either in seed or ginned cotton, had nothing to do either with the handling or selling of it. The Stewards endorsed over to them the gin-holder's receipts, which they used as paper currency in the payment of debts, or in making purchases.

This old Steward's book incidentally brings to view another item of financial economy, which really looks penurious in our day. It was that of charging the preachers with the value of all the presents they received in the way of handkerchiefs, hosiery, and other wearing apparel, or travelling equipage. Fortunately for the feelings of the kind-hearted donors, as well as for the moneyless preachers, this item of financial economy has long since been abandoned.

Of the two Stewards, Randall Gibson and William Foster, whose names first appear in the book, when the "whole Territory was one circuit," I may say a few words. They both lived in the vicinity of Washington when Tobias Gibson first came as a Missionary to the country, and they with their wives, made four of the eight that joined the Church the first time the door was opened. Randall was the cousin of Tobias Gibson, and had been striving to be a Christian amidst the darkness of the times, before the arrival of his cousin. He had even gone so far as to give in his experience to the newly organized Baptist Church, and was waiting a convenient time to be immersed. But after conversing freely with his newly arrived cousin on doctrinal, experimental, and practical Christianity, he found that he was more of an Methodist than a Baptist. He accordingly withdrew his application for membership in the Baptist Church, and united with seven others in forming the first Methodist Church ever organized in the vast domain, afterwards embraced in the Mississippi Conference. Of the eight that joined at the first opening, Randall Gibson was the first to offer his hand to the preacher. This was ominous of his future course, for he was generally first in "every good work." His intelligence and wealth, combined with his gentle manners, and consistent piety, soon gave him prominence as a Methodist. He filled the offices of Steward and Class-leader with great acceptability, and at an early day was licensed as a local preacher. In due time he graduated to Deacon's and Elder's orders, and for a long series of years was acknowledged as one of the most talented, faithful and useful Local Preachers in the South-west. His body was thin and feeble, and his vocal organs not capable of much exertion without intervals of rest, so that he did not feel called to the itinerant work, and yet he did a good deal of pioneering in all the region round about. He did a large share of baptizing and funeral preaching wherever he lived, and often officiated at the hymeneal altar, for all classes of society. He removed from Washington to the northern part of Jefferson county, where he remained until about 1827 or, 1828, when he moved into Warren county, where, in a few years more, he went down to his grave full of years and honor. "Why am I not pardoned and regenerated?" was the oft repeated and anxious inquiry of my young heart, in the fall of 1821, after I thought I had given up all sin, and had been an earnest seeker of forgiveness for some time. On a Sabbath I attended one of Randall Gibson's funeral discourses in the Petit Gulf Hills, which was preached out of doors, because the audience was too large for the house. "A man may know himself to be a sinner without feeling himself to be such, but he must not only know but feel himself to be a guilty and helpless sinner in order to true repentance," said the preacher. "That is me," said I, "I know, but alas! I do not feel." The preacher continued, "And a man may believe all that the Scriptures say about the shedding, death, and intercession of Christ for sinners, but this will avail him nothing until he feels his personal need of a Saviour, and believes in his heart that Jesus died for him, and that God accepts of him now for Christ's sake." "That is me," again my heart replied. From that hour I made these matters a subject of constant prayer, and bright, heavenly light was daily poured in upon my darkness and unbelief, showing "sin to be exceeding sinful," until I indeed felt that I was a guilty and lost sinner, and my only hope was in the great Atonement. The grace of God abounded, and in a few weeks I rejoiced in a "knowledge of salvation by the remission of sins." Glory be to God that I heard Randall Gibson preach that sermon! He was a most excellent nurse for young Christians and young preachers. Not long before his death, "in age and feebleness extreme," I heard him say to a camp meeting audience, that "he no longer felt the obligation of preaching; that burden had been entirely removed from his mind. He had nothing now to do but to wait in faith and patience for the call of his Master to go home." O, that heavenly countenance, and those joyful tears, as he uttered these sentiments, I shall never forget. His name is yet like the fragrance of the richest odors among the few yet remaining on earth who knew him best. Peace to his memory! We expect to meet him again.

The family of William Foster was in the vicinity of Natchez, at an early period, for in one of the Indian forays upon the Jersey settlement, previous to 1787, he had one of his arms shattered with a ball. The Indians had made an incursion into the settlement between Second Creek and Ellis' Cliffs on the Mississippi river, which being discovered, the men were called to arms to expel them. After a fruitless search they assembled at the house of one of the settlers for rest and refreshment, and not having the least apprehension that the Indians were dogging their retreat, carelessly laid aside their arms. The house being surrounded with high corn and other obstructions, the savages got near enough to make a deadly fire on the company before they were discovered. Such as were not killed or disabled by the first fire, grasped their guns in haste and fled to the adjoining woods. Mr. Foster, with a comrade, attempted to escape through a lane leading from the house, while the Indian rifles were popping on either side, and just as they passed the mouth of the lane a volley was fired at them. A ball shattered the forearm of Mr. Foster, which caused him to drop his rifle, which he was carrying in that hand. His comrade was separated from him, and he continued his flight toward Second Creek. His arm bled freely, and he soon discovered that the Indians were trailing him by the blood. When he got to the creek he hastily selected a place concealed by logs, and sank himself in the water, leaving only his mouth and nose out for respiration. The Indians trailed him to the Creek, but his stratagem put them at fault, and after a hasty reconnoisance they gave up the chase. Mr. Foster remained under the water until after nightfall, which proved refreshing, and effectually checked the flow of blood from his wound. He then drew himself quietly out of his aqueous retreat, bound up his wound as best he could with his handkerchief, and sat down at the root of a tree, against which he supported himself until the break of day. At early dawn he began to hunt his way to the nearest settlement, but he could see no one to give any information as to the probable whereabouts of the Indians, or the amount of damage they had done in the neighborhood. After a while he came in sight of a house, but hesitated to approach, not knowing whether it was in the possession of friend or foe. He was, however, so exhausted from excitement, hunger, pain and loss of blood, he did not hesitate long. On approaching he was overjoyed to find it inhabited by whites, and to learn that the Indians had concluded their raid and fled from the settlement. He suffered long with his arm, until he was induced to visit an experienced physician on the coast, who, with his surgical tongs, extracted piece after piece of the fractured bone, until the wound was permanently healed, though it left him maimed for life. After this Mr. Foster married and settled on Pine Ridge, about six miles north of Natchez, where he probably resided at the time of his accession to the Church. He possessed a mature judgment, was industrious and economical, and soon became quite thrifty in his secular affairs. Brother Foster was taciturn, and not much gifted in exhortation and extemporaneous prayer, but he had important and useful talents, which were solemnly consecrated to God and the good of the church. His financial skill, coupled with proverbial generosity, made him the best of Circuit Stewards. Many a traveling itinerant not only found a pleasant home under his hospitable roof, where he could rest and recruit his wasted strength, but had his exhausted purse supplied with any amount necessary to meet his present wants. He was well trained in religion, and felt that he was a steward in the household of faith by Divine appointment, and his constant study seemed to be, how much good he could do with the means entrusted to him for disbursement. Having no children of his own, he did much in the way of raising orphan relatives, and successfully managing their estates. The first regular session of the Mississippi Conference, attended by a Bishop, was held in his private residence, where one room sufficed for Conference purposes by day, and a sleeping apartment for the whole Conference at night. I cannot close this brief sketch of one of the purest and best of men, without referring to a characteristic act of generosity to myself, which occurred just before his death in 1834. Should I be spared to that age when a man may write about himself, without the appearance of egotism, I shall wish to write more in detail about the occurrence, as it was connected with the most dangerous crisis in my ministry, and as I have ever viewed it in the light of a special providence. At the close of my eighth year in the ministry, by having to break up housekeeping, and remove my family from place to place, where my superiors thought my services were most needed, and, no doubt, in part from the want of financial experience, I had fallen behind with my creditors, which greatly oppressed my feelings, and rendered me almost incapable of doing "the work of an evangelist." In my impatience and unbelief, I had well nigh made up my mind to locate and leave the work to which I had professed a Divine call. When I was stationed in Washington circuit, in 1834, brother Foster incidentally became acquainted with my embarrassment, and with characteristic liberality, made me a donation of $500, which fully relieved me from debt, and set me afloat again, so that if my services as an itinerant minister have been worth anything to the church for the last twenty-six years, William Foster will certainly share largely in the reward. He did not feel called to preach himself, but he had a way of keeping others at it who did. Soon after this noble act he went down to his grave in a good old age, "like as a shock of corn cometh in his season." The wives of these two excellent men, Randall Gibson and William Foster, survived their husbands a short period, and were justly reckoned "mothers in Israel." Their end was peace, and their names are still "as ointment poured forth."

J. G. JONES.

OUR NEW PASTOR.

BY LITHA TONTELLE.

At nine o'clock the next day we were all ready for Sunday-school. Grandpa, Charles and Willie, went on horseback. Uncle John took aunt Margaret and Belle in the buggy. Grandma and the rest of us filled the two carriages. A quiet joy beamed from every face. As we drove along, aunt Grace looked silently out on the clinging scene. A light shower the previous evening had laid the accumulated dust of weeks, that so sadly marred the freshness and beauty on which it rested. As she gazed on the bright loveliness that smiled, as if glowing with joy, in the beaming face of the sun, she compared it with its late appearance. "It seems to me like one who, in life's springtime of purity and vigor, has weakly, thoughtlessly permitted the defiling dust of sin, gathered in the momentary impulse of anger, impatience or uncharitableness, to settle thickly until it obscures all the virtues and graces of the character." How sad our faces were as we listened to her sweetly impressive voice, and looked back over the dust-veiled foliage of the day previous!

"But in the hour of calm reflection, that sometimes comes to all, the young soul turns a clear searching glance over the brief course it has pursued, and clouds of shame and regret envelope it as it notes the accumulated errors.—Then tears of earnest penitence wash away the veiling sins, and the virtues shine out once more in the smile of the reconciled Father, with a new and tender radiance. How happy is the soul which Jesus has purified and refreshed, and to which He has given new strength to meet firmly its coming trials."

She felt it, too, in her innate soul, though we, who read the noble purity of her daily life, wondered how any traces of sin-dust could shadow it.

In a thoughtful mood, we reached the fine, Gothic structure that stood in a magnificent grove, one of "God's first temples," and raising its hand far above the towering oaks and dark magnolias, pointed silently heavenward. No, not silently, for as we left the carriages, its deep voice rang out on the still air with a solemn invitation. "What a rich melody, that never loses its peculiar charm, the church-bell has for those who have heeded its call in childhood!" said Grandpa. "Yes; and what pure and tender associations are linked with its sound!" replied aunt Grace.

We were soon seated in our classes. Miss Harper and all the older members of our family were teachers—Edith and I were in Judge Firmly's little Class, which aunt Grace taught in his absence. There was something singularly suggestive and impressive in the arrangement of that Sunday-school. The church was more than half filled with the classes, and in most instances grey or silvery heads presided. The sober dignity which comes with the knowledge and experience of a true Christian, and which is as far removed as possible from the stern, forbidding expression which hypocrites often assume; the cheerful tone in which believers speak of their Savior; the simple, earnest manner in which the truths were imparted; all these combined, fixed and interested the young eager souls, and they bore thence distinct and vivid impressions that rendered the chapters, so dry and unmeaning to many, a familiar scene of beauty and truth whose virtue was reproduced in their own lives. Without, the bright foliage and grey-robed moss waved, with a natural grace, their glad thanksgiving in the sun's warm beams; the light danced joyfully over the lateuse green of the stately magnolias; the birds, flitting from branch to branch, warbled their morning praise; and graceful vines wreathed the old trunks, more beautiful than sculptured pillars. Sometimes the pupils glanced out for a moment, unrebuked, and took into their hearts nature's impromptu sermon. But their eyes were generally fixed with eager attention on the faces of their beloved and revered teachers.

I perceived that there had been a considerable accession of members during my absence. Every age was represented, from the bewitching bud of few summers to the bent form and hoary head that seemed calmly gazing into its own grave. Young ladies turned aside from the absorbing follies of the world, and sought a finer jewel than their gold could buy—the inward adorning of the Spirit. Youth, flushed with college honors, and proud of its own high attainments, learned from the lips of revered age a loftier wisdom than the lore of schools. Fair women and brave men, who had known fame, or had drunk deep of pleasure's syren cup, and felt their ripened joys change suddenly to ashes on their lips, bowed low the haughty head and drank of "living waters."

This was the gradual, but glorious result of the combined efforts of a few pious souls, whose faith, earnest and pure, bore constant fruit—of men and women of large hearts and noble minds, whose ever widening influence was used for truth alone. After the close of school, there was a quiet interchange of friendly greetings, while the children refreshed themselves under the trees.

As the last bell ceased its vibrations, Dr. Truesoul, the new pastor, appeared. The firm, ringing step, whose like I never heard, caused me to turn, involuntarily, to see the man it must bear onward. A tall figure of grand proportions was advancing up the aisle. Every eye rested on him; his was introverted. In the finely cut features and the reigning expression, I read a resolute soul with a high-fixed purpose. Calm and dignified in manner, and of a noble presence, he appeared the embodiment of the Christian graces. I noticed immediately how wholly engrossed he was in the work of the hour.—There were none of the wandering glances, or careless irreverence of manner that detracts so much from the influence of the pulpit. When he prayed, he was communing with God. When he sang, he was praising Him. And while preaching, there was not the most remote allusion to himself. His utterance was distinct and melodious, always in keeping with his clear statements, the calm strength of his logic and his fine illustrations. His key-note was never so high that he lost the power of modulating his intonations, nor so low that the words fell on the ear, startling and shocking the auditory nerves. When he sat down he left before the mind, forever, a beautiful structure, firm and complete in every detail, a clear light revealing the symmetry of its fine proportions, with no superlative ornament, but with every chaste figure distinctly illustrative, while it adorned the strong pillars that supported the edifice. Looking at it, you always saw the Chief Corner Stone, the firm Rock on which it was built. Alas! how frequently this is concealed by an ostentatious mass of rubbish.

In his sermon to the blacks in the evening, you still saw the building going up before you, but the illustrations were more numerous, more striking and familiar. In his opening prayer for them, his soul seemed aglow with religious fervor, and poured forth itself to God in heart enkindling expressions, fraught with images of rare warmth and beauty. As my soul essayed to keep pace with his, I seemed hurried on from one height of loveliness and grandeur to another, until my heart was bowed with its fulness of love, and gratitude, and humble reliance on the All-Father.

Afterwards, in social intercourse, I found him a gentleman in the finest sense of the word; deferring to others, his inferiors, without a shadow of condescension; listening attentively, and covering any mistake of those around him with exquisite tact; never a conscious hero; with a genial humor, and a kind cheerful manner. There was, too, an utter absence of cant. He might be a planter of cultivated intellect and intimate acquaintance with the world. Or you might take him for a merchant prince, with a soul above his millions, or an eminent lawyer, or a divine of any school, so devoid was he of affectation, so true to his own originality.

The Sunday previous, I had listened, in the morning, to the orator of the city, Rev. Dr. Haughton. He was a large heavy man, not so tall as Dr. Truesoul. His voice in reading and in the opening of his discourse, had an affected, mournful cadence, and there was something in his manner connected with his figure which made me, involuntarily, say to myself, "A little pompous!" But I forgot this, in a great measure, when he entered fully upon his subject. His sermon was the most lucid and complete illustration of faith I ever heard. A school-boy could grasp it and comprehend its details, and the finest intellect present acknowledged the strong logic and the charm of its simple, elegant language. It was considered marred by the relation of an affecting incident relating to his own family. The pathetic little story brought tears to the eyes of many, but as it placed the speaker prominently before them, the weepers criticised.

At night I had listened to another distinguished clergyman of the city. He was of a nervous temperament and self educated. His peculiar attitude in the pulpit, and his arms extended and waving, made him seem to me like a huge eagle ready to swoop down upon his prey, or to soar away suddenly from our sight. His restless manner, his rapid flow of words, the crowd of images, the involution of his sentences, the startling thought, the bold denunciation, the hissing satire, reminded me of a rapid river hurrying over a bed of rocks which dre sometimes hidden, sometimes upreared, around which it circles and foams, and hisses, and dashes itself lifully, then rebounding, rushes away to view a wide scene of beauty, or to lave the banks and kiss the sweet flowers it has nurtured.

But these stars paled before the mild splendor of our new planet. The purity and warmth of its searching rays penetrated and illumined every heart.

During the service of the blacks I sat nearer to the pulpit than in the morning, and before the opening prayer I studied eagerly the face of Dr. Truesoul, for I knew that when he spoke he would carry my thoughts beyond himself. He was so calm and immovable, as I perused the expressive lineaments, that when he turned his face suddenly towards me, and I saw the rich deep blue of the eyes, filled with the soul's clear light, I suppressed a cry of joy. It was as if the crowning beauty of a painting or piece of sculpture was revealed to me. A pale blue eye is guiltless of deep feeling, and I have never looked into blue eyes faded, not by time or disease, that I have not read a cold selfish nature, unrestrained by principle. But the deep hue of those orbs satisfied me.

"You know him, then, my dear?" said aunt Margaret, as she marked my kindling face.

I could only look a denial, but my cheek flushed with shame and confusion for my involuntary rudeness. I did not look up again until the hymn was read, lost in my abstraction. I should again forget that he was not a statue.

RAMBLES IN EAST MISSISSIPPI.

We left Mobile, on the Citronelle train, in company with a choice companion, whose observing faculties being largely developed, our attention was called to many interesting objects by the way, which by the ordinary traveller are usually unobserved. Meeting an old familiar face, on which we were in earlier days accustomed to look, old memories were awakened, and our thoughts ran back to childhood's sunny hours, when after the studies of the week were past, on some bright Saturday morning, we were allowed to accompany this same person, who, with a school-mate of his own boyhood, had the amiability to take us on "pic nic," where the whole day would be spent in rambling over the hills in search of grapes, which grew abundantly near our home in the "Old North State;" or we would occupy ourselves in picking up sea shells as we ran along the white beach, while old ocean laved the shore. Golden hours they were, free from care, our greatest trouble arithmetic, English grammar, Webster's old spelling book, and the geography lesson.

Well, really, we are at Sidney, the place of our destination, for a few days only. Here we spent several days pleasantly, finding several kind and dear friends, who entertained us after an elegant manner. We were led to think, after all, it is a great accomplishment to be a good house-wife. To find everything moving on harmoniously and orderly, yet not able to discern the magic hand which sets the whole machinery in motion. A mother who raises such a daughter, not only reflects credit upon her self, but does a good work, for which a future generation may bless her. Near by, Rev. Mr. Brandon, the circuit preacher, was holding a protracted meeting, in which a few individuals at least manifested a deep interest.—The morning on which we left, as we were about to take cars at Citronelle, we met Rev. Mr. Hamill, who was looking bright and joyous, as he walked out in the fresh morning air. We inquired if he was going up the Road? He assured us he had come to attend the meeting at this place. Though we were much disappointed at not having his company, we could but rejoice that he had come to attend the meeting, for his valuable services were needed, Mr. Brandon having already labored too much. As we took our seat in the cars for Enterprize, for the first time in our lives we were alone in a crowd, not having seen a single person about us before; and for five hours were deprived of the pleasure of speech, save only a few words with the clever conductor about our ticket and check. Seated in front of us were two gentlemen in grey traveling clothes, their appearance indicating both refinement and wealth. Becoming interested in these our fellow travelers, we tried to while away the hours by studying their faces; but this did not prove altogether a pleasant task, for while the younger of the two individuals slept we had a good opportunity of watching his fine face, which had not as yet a single line of care upon it, and his youthful appearance reminded us of a beloved brother, with whom, but a few years ago, we journeyed in this same direction, hoping thereby he might soon be restored to his wonted health and spirits, and whom, after many months of weary watching, we had to consign to an early grave. The wound had not yet been healed. That dear one had been as a sunbeam to our household and our hearts; and when the young man opened his eyes and changed his position, we felt relieved. But even now we should be glad to know something of his history. Oh, we sighed for somewhat of companionship that we might give vent to long pent feelings. But we comforted ourselves when we remembered that an all-wise Providence directs well, and has his own purposes in removing from us the loved ones of earth; and our hearts were glad to feel that we could claim so many precious ties in that bright world beyond. There, Providence is no longer "a mystery;" but the chastenings allotted here are necessary to the purifying of our hearts. And but for these, we had not bowed ourselves submissively at the foot of the cross of Jesus Christ.

Two o'clock found us at Enterprize, "the City of the Woods," in time for dinner. Here we met the down train for Mobile, and here, too, the passengers take dinner. Enterprise has been incorporated as a city, and is situated in a hilly region; after walking about which one feels very much like he had been ascending and descending the stairs of all the furniture stores in Mobile, being hill and dale everywhere, and is spread out over an area of several miles. They have four churches, three academies, and a few private schools; and also a fire company. Enterprise is said to be the most moral of interior towns, and from observation we can truly say she may boast of a church going population, which is estimated at about fifteen hundred. The Presbyterian, Baptist, and Methodist churches are crowded each Sabbath. All these being situated on the west side of the Chickasaha river, which flows gently through the city, and is the dividing line between East and West Enterprise. The Protestant Episcopal congregation worship in the Academy on the east side; here they also hold a Union Sabbath School, which is reported as being in a flourishing condition.—The eastern part of the city has sprung up into a town of some consideration in the last four years. The Mobile and Ohio Railroad has done wonderful things for all this region of country. Towns all up and down the route having sprung forth as if by magic, giving to every trade occupation.

The Methodist Church has a fine Sabbath School, numbering about one hundred scholars. They have a good library, consisting of five hundred well selected volumes. Mr. Turner, the Superintendent, seems much beloved by the school. The Librarian, a youthful man, with a fine head, and if a good countenance is expressive of a good heart, we should say he has both a pure and generous one. How beautiful to see a youth thus occupied.—When we entered the church the school was singing one of our Sabbath School hymns, a selection from the "Sabbath Bell." We could not realize ourselves a stranger. The song, the school, the church, all having such a home like air, and altogether so pleasant on that bright morning, we felt like we were in every sense of their number. It was not long ere the school was dismissed. We must say there was something novel in the manner of this dismissal, to us at least, as our own school is always dismissed with prayer, unless some speaker overtalks his "ten minutes;" even then the school is regularly dismissed.

Surely we have been most highly favored this Spring, having been privileged to attend a protracted meeting for four or five weeks in Mobile, where the untiring efforts of the ministers in charge were greatly blessed, and many souls were born to God. Rev. Mr. Motley seems to be acceptable to this people, and his labors are being blessed; already the meeting has been going on for two weeks, with many accessions to the Church, and is still continued with interest. Rev. Mr. Merriwether of the Memphis Conference preached an intensely interesting sermon to a crowded congregation on Sunday, from the text, "Quench not the Spirit." Judging from the large number who, at the close of the sermon, crowded about the altar to give in their names for Church membership, we should think it had been received with much power. We became deeply interested in everything for the time, and felt that it was good to be there.

LEAVES FROM A LOG-CABIN JOURNAL.

Friday, April 27.—The Quarterly Meeting at Jones' Chapel, Morehouse parish, La., commences to-day; Bro. Ivy presiding. We very gladly welcome among us brother Ivy and his assistants, brethren Hawes, Stone, and Wright. I hope the Lord will revive his work. I should like to go to church to-day, but the crop is in the grass and I cannot have the horses; so I must contentedly remain at home and have enough provisions prepared to last over the Subbath.

Bro. Ivy preached to-day.

The sun has set most beautifully clear; all nature rejoices in the beauty of Spring. "Make a joyful noise unto the Lord, all the earth; make a loud noise, and rejoice, and sing praises."

Saturday, 28th.—I was up in time to see the beautiful dawning. It reminded me of the twilight after a bright sunset. I looked forth upon the dew-gemmed beauties of the dawning day, as I hastened hither and thither about my preparations for attending meeting; for I must go to meeting, grass or no grass. So, packing up our dinner, we started, and within two hours were comfortably seated in Jones' Chapel. Brother Wright of Bastrop, preached most beautifully and clearly from xxvii chapter of Ezekiel, which was followed by an exhortation most convincing by brother Ivy. The congregation was dismissed, and in a short time dinner was spread for all by the neighbors. After which the sweet songs of Zion were heard again in the Chapel, calling ministers and others to the Quarterly Conference, and the people also congregated with an animation which betokened the desire of hearing and taking to their hearts the word of the Lord; and it was most faithfully expounded by brother Stone of Louisiana Conference. "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen," fell solemnly and gratefully upon the hearts of the hearers, and they returned to their homes.

Sunday, 29th.—Awakened by the merry bird music which came in my cabin on the morning breeze that had perfumed itself as it touched gently my pinks and roses. O, it is a holy and a happy feeling to awaken with that peace which the Christian only knows, and to feel the sweet influences of the early Sabbath morn calling the soul to worship! A short time spent in my garden before sunrise; my family gathered around the family altar, then breakfast, and taking our dinner with us we are off for church again. As we near it, the cypress pickets around my baby boy's grave, beyond the Chapel, gleam through the underwood, and O how sadly my heart yearned for my child; but then comes the comforting thought that little Freddie is in the beautiful home above, and I felt resigned, though the tears will come.—The doors are closed at about half past nine, and the exercises of Love Feast commence. It was indeed a feast to the soul to listen to the testimony of the Lord's people, of his ever enduring mercy and wonderful goodness. Love Feast and Class Meeting are two means of grace often blessed to the conversion of souls. We felt it was good to be there. A few moments intermission and we were assembled to hear the gospel proclaimed by brother Ivy, P. E., a workman who needeth not to be ashamed, for the Holy Spirit enlarged his heart and gave him power to preach the truth as it is in Jesus. The ex 1salm was most felicitously and comprehensively expounded, and we cannot imagine how any one could resist his appeal, in behalf of his Savior, to join the band of free, noble, liberal people whom God had set free. The ever solemn sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered to forty or fifty communicants. Dinner is again served in the grove, and refreshing ourselves with a drink of cold cistern water, we again collect in the Chapel, and listen with pleasure and profit to brother Wright. Then brother Ivy, by a most heart searching, appeal, invited sinners to the mourner's bench. Fifteen or more came up, and we sang and prayed for them; but alas! we and they did not "knock at the door" earnestly enough, or it would most assuredly have been opened, and many souls have been converted. We started to our homes, but some of us stopped on the way and had "prayer-meeting." At a late hour of the night we wended our way home through the dark swamp, by the aid of moonlight and lamps.

Monday, 30th.—The sun arose behind a vail of clouds, which he soon dispersed, and there was promise of a fair, lovely day. I hastened to get my provision ready to go to meeting, but ere all my preparations were finished, long, low, peals of thunder vibrated through the air, and the dark clouds came on apace, until the whole heavens were covered. Now, I really wanted to go to worship, and I could hardly believe that it would rain. The low mutterings of thunder, like death dirges, continued to come, and drops of rain fell sparingly; the wind rose and lulled, then the rain came gently but perseveringly for several hours, and I gave up the hope of attending meeting, and busied myself in household duties. Brother Ivy, notwithstanding the rain, preached to an interested congregation.

Now, at 5 o'clock on the last evening of April, 1860, while my little clock so unwearily tells its fast passing minutes and hours, the sun shines serenely on the beautiful earth, and the cool breeze comes laden with fragrance from my flower garden; the wee chicks are chirping to be hovered to their nightly rest; there is beauty all around, in the line of sky and its fleecy clouds, in the leafy trees and grassy plots.

WHEN THE NIGHT AND MORNING MEET.

In the dark and narrow street,
Into a world of woe,
Where the tread of many feet
Went trampling to and fro,
A child was born (speak low),
When the night and morning meet.

Full seventy summers back
Was this—so long ago—
The feet that were the track
Are lying straight and low,
Yet hath there been no lack
Of passers to and fro.

Within the narrow street
This childhood ever played;
Beyond the narrow street
This manhood never strayed;
This age sat still and pray'd
Anear the trampling feet.

The tread of ceaseless feet
Flow'd through his life, unstirr'd
By waters' fall, or fleet
Wind music, or the bird
Of morn, these sounds are sweet,
But they were still unheard.

Within the narrow street
I stood beside a bed—
I held a dying head,
When the night and morning meet;
And every word was sweet,
Though few the words we said.

And as we talked, dawn drew
To day—the world was fair
In fields afar I knew;
Yet spoke not to him there
Of how the grasses grew,
Besprent with dew-drops rare.

We spoke not of the sun,
Nor of this green earth fair.
This soul, whose day was done,
Had never claimed its share
In these, and yet its rare
Rich heritage had won.

From the dark and narrow street,
Into a world of love,
A child was born—speak low,
Speak reverent; for we know
Not how they speak above,
When the night and morning meet.

AMUSEMENTS OF THE LEARNED.

Many persons are of belief that authors are very grave and reserved in their manners—that they are constantly engaged in study—have no relish whatever for relaxation, and are careless of the ordinary pleasures of society. This is a ridiculous fallacy; authors just think and act like other men when not engaged in their literary avocations; and whatever may be the gravity of their writings, they are generally very merry fellows, and like to indulge in frivolous amusements as well as their neighbors. D'Israeli, who has taken the pains to enter into a minute investigation of many literary subjects, recites a number of instances of learned men indulging in different amusements by way of relaxation to their mind.

"Among the Jesuits," says he, in his Curiosities of Literature, a work we recommend to the perusal of our readers, "it was a standing rule of the order that after an application to study for two hours, the mind of the student should be unbent by some relaxation, however trifling. When Petavius was employed in his Dogmatu Theologica—a work of the most profound and extensive erudition—the great recreation of the learned father was, at the end of every second hour, to twirl his chair for five minutes.

"After protracted studies, Spinosa would mix with the family party where he lodged, and join in the most trivial conversations, or unbend his mind by setting spiders to fight each other; he observed their combats with so much interest, that he was often seized with immoderate fits of laughter. A continuity of labor deadens the soul, observes Seneca, in closing his treatise on 'The Tranquility of the Soul,' and the mind must unbend itself by certain amusements. Socrates did not blush to play with children; Cato, over his bottle, found an alleviation from the fatigues of government—a circumstance, he says in his manner, which rather give honor to this defect, than the dishonor defects Cato.—Some men of letters portioned out their days between repose and labor. Asinius Pollio would not suffer any business to occupy him beyond a stated hour; and after that time, he would not allow any letter to be opened during his hours of relaxation, that they might not be interrupted by unforseen labors. In the Senate, after the tenth hour, it was not allowed to make any new motion.

"Tycho Brahe diverted himself with polishing glasses for all kinds of spectacles and making mathematical instruments—an amusement too closely connected with his studies to be deemed as one.

"D'Andilly, the translator of Josephus, after seven or eight hours of study every day, amused himself in cultivating trees; Bureley, the author of the Argenis, in his leisure hours, was a florist; Balzac amused himself with a collection of crayon portraits; Pierce found his amusement among his medals and antiquarian carlosities; the Abbe de Marolles with his prints; and Politian in singing airs to his lute. Descartes passed his afternoon in the conversation of a few friends, and in cultivating a little garden in the morning. Occupied by the system of the world, he relaxed his profound speculations by rearing delicate flowers.

"Rohault wandered from shop to shop to observe the mechanics labor; Count Caylus passed his mornings in the studios of artists, and his evenings in writing his numerous works up art. This was the true life of an amateur.

"Granville Sharp, amidst the severity of his studies, found a social relaxation in the amusement of a barge on the Thames, which was well known to the circle of his friends; there was festive hospitality with musical delight. It was resorted to by men of the most eminent talents and rank. His little voyages to Putney Kew, and to Richmond, and the literary intercourse they produced, were singularly happy ones. The history of his amusements cannot be told without adding to the dignity of his character, observed Mr. Prince Horace, in the very curious life of this great philanthropist.

"Some have found amusement in composing treatises on odd subjects. Seneca wrote a burlesque narrative of Claudian's death. Pierius Valerianus has written an eulogium on beards, and we had a learned one recently, with due gravity and pleasantry, entitled Elogo de Perreques—an Eulogium on Wigs.

"Erasmus composed, to amuse himself when traveling in a postchaise, his panegyric on Maria, or Folly; which authorized by the pun, he dedicated to Sir. Thomas Moore.

"It seems, Johnson observes in his life of Sir Thomas Browne, to have been in all ages the pride of art to show how it could exalt the low and amplify the little. To this ambition, perhaps, we owe the frogs of Homer, the gnat and the bees of Virgil, the butterfly of Spencer, the shadow of Wowerus, and the quincunx of Browne.

"Cardinal de Richelieu, amongst all his great occupations, found a recreation in violent exercises; and he was once discovered jumping with his servant, to try who could reach the highest side of a wall. DeGramamont, observing the Cardinal to be jealous of his powers, offered to jump with him; and in the true spirit of a courtier, having made some efforts which nearly reached, the Cardinal surpassed him. This was jumping like a politician; and by this means is said to have ingratiated himself with the Minister.

"The great Samuel Clarke was fond of robust exercise; and this profound logician has been found leaping over tables and chairs; once perceiving a pedantic fellow, he said, 'Now we must desist, for a fool is coming in.'

"An eminent French lawyer, confined by his business to a Parisian life, amused himself with collecting from the classics all the passages which relate to a country life. The collection was published after his death.

"Contemplative men seem to be fond of amusements which accord with their habits. The thoughtful game of chess, and the tranquil delights of angling, have been favorite recreations with the studious. Paley had himself painful with a rod and line in his hand—a strange characteristic of the author of Natural Theology. Sir Henry Wotton called angling, 'idle time not idly spent;' we may suppose that his meditations and amusements were carried on at the same moment.

"Seneca has observed on the amusements proper for literary men in regard to robust exercises, that these are a folly, an indecency to see a man of letters exalt in the strength of his arm or the breadth of his back! Such amusements diminish the activity of the mind. Too much fatigue exhausts the animal spirits, as too much food blunts the finer faculties; but elsewhere he allows his philosopher an occasional slight inebriation—an amusement which was very prevalent among our poets formerly. Seneca concludes admirably: 'Whatever be the amusements you choose, return not slowly from those of the body to the mind; exercise the latter night and day. The mind is nourished at a cheap rate; neither cold nor heat, nor age itself, can interrupt this exercise; give, therefore, all your cares to a possession which ameliorates even in its old age.

"An ingenious writer has observed, that 'a garden just accommodates itself to the perambulations of a scholar who would perhaps rather wish his walks abridged than extended.' There is a good characteristic account of

POPULAR AND CHRISTIAN EDUCATION.

The numerous advertisements appearing in our own columns, and in the columns of the newspapers generally, of approaching college and academy commencements and examinations, are pregnant with instructive and encouraging thought. The number of these institutions is truly astonishing to those acquainted with the country only a quarter of a century ago. Then, the majority of the people only knew of the existence of colleges and high schools by reputation. A college graduate was a rarity, a wonder, and an object of envy. Now, colleges are in every State, and good seminaries in almost every populous vicinity. The lateness of the period in which they have been reared, and the rapidity of their multiplication, are absolutely without precedent or parallel. Another wonderful feature is, that they have been established by a comparatively uneducated people. Nothing of the sort has ever been known before since the world began. Still another peculiar feature is, that it has been a popular development—a movement of the people—and not the result of legislative action, or of the benevolence of wealthy and cultivated individuals—however much the favorable influence of these have assisted. The educational sentiment in this country is a popular sentiment. It is as characteristic of the people as the sentiment of liberty, of personal independence, of the acquisition and cultivation of new territory, or of the desire to make money and grow wealthy.

Whatever may be the faults, and exaggerations, and excesses of American character, it is a most hopeful indication that, in harmonious developement with all other characteristics, the love and value of education is a leading sentiment. As has been before expressed in these columns, we find in this popular educational sentiment, the hope of the realization of the only permanent security of democratic institutions, and of the disappointment of the friendly forebodings or malicious predictions of European friends or enemies, viz.: the ultimate diffusion of the conservative influence of culture among all classes of our people. The majority of our people are pecuniarily prosperous, more or less, and the children of all prosperous people in this country are being educated. The children of the poor, too, are being educated to a most encouraging extent. The number is not large, compared with the former experience of the world in such things, who are too poor to educate their children. And the number of this class is decreasing with every year. The multiplication of high schools and accademies, also, however much they may momentarily prevent the full endowment and maturity of our higher institutions, is helping to bring the facilities of education almost to every door, and lessening still more the number of children who are compelled to grow up without its advantages. And in an enlarged and ultimate view of things, instead of an antagonism, there is a real harmony between the interests and prosperity of the lower and higher schools. The former are the nurseries of the latter.

In support, further, of the statement that the tendency is to the diffusion of education among all classes of the people, it is only necessary to inquire into the parentage and circumstances of the children in all of our schools, high and low. The children of the older and traditionally wealthy families are among them, of course. In this country, as a rule, a family once educated never becomes uneducated, whatever may be the changes in fortune and position. Then, the number of those whose parents are more or less wealthy, but who commenced life utterly poor and uneducated, is a social phenomenon known only in this country. In addition to these, the number of those whose parents are now poor, and of humble position, will astonish any one who has never previously made it a matter of observation. And then there is a class, and a large one it is, which no other country could produce. It is that large class of men who become educated without wealth, or position, or schools, in ways known only to themselves, probably not fully to them, even. The very physical nature, scenery, atmosphere, breadth of territory, and scope for variety and success of individual action and enterprise in this country, have an inspiring educational influence. The intimate association of all classes of people, in this free country, the uneducated with the educated, helps to elevate the one, while it does not degrade the other. The increasing and already excessive esprit du corps of American nationality, while it is prolific of many errors and faults, helps to inspire and educate every citizen. The increasing circulation, and cheapness, and quality of books and periodicals, constitute another mighty, popular educational agency. And all these facilities, agencies, and influences, are rapidly increasing in number and diffusion, growing in popular appreciation and power, and rising in height of standard and excellence of tone.

The most interesting and hopeful feature of American educational progress is yet to be mentioned: it is, to a great and growing extent, a Christian education and a Christian progress. The leading schools of the country are directly under Christian auspices and influences.—They were conceived, originated and established by Christian men. Christian men have given the momentum to the cause of education of which we have been speaking. They have done more than all other agencies combined to inspire the popular mind with the sentiment of education. What unreligious men have done in behalf of education has been done under the influence of sentiments originated and diffused by Christian men. Even the schools not professedly under Christian auspices, are under Christian influences, more or less. It is now tacitly confessed that schools without Christian influences are a failure, and that education without religion is a vicious partialism.

What we now most need is the development, definition, diffusion, and right direction of the religious idea of education. We need to understand and appreciate, better than heretofore, the true connection between Christianity and education. We need to feel, as a self-evident axiom, that this connection is not accidental or artificial, but organic and vital. That the one is the complement of the other, in their highest maturity. We need to feel that there is no such thing as a healthy progress of Christianity without a corresponding progress of education in connection with it; and that there is no such thing as a healthful progress of education, without a corresponding progress of Christianity—as of a body of which education is a part—as of a character of which education is a principle. In the language of a recent lecturer, our own educational institutions are the result of a growth or evolution which has been going on through all the Christian era. Christianity, by the designed working of its two great vital forces, the Word and the Spirit, has ever developed itself in the direction of culture. In its very origin and groundwork there was a magnificent preparation for a world-wide development. Christ came as the Great Teacher—was "the light of the world," and created at once the College of the Apostles, with the design that a few men should be fitted to teach others, and this process go on until the whole world should be enlightened with the light of true knowledge.

Christianity, at the outset, manifested a natural affinity for all true learning and culture—for every form of truth and beauty. The actual progress of this intellectual development in the world during the first Christian centuries was followed out—now in the midst of the highest pagan civilization—now plunging into the depths of heathenism—reaching not simply a few leading minds, but the masses of the people; infusing everywhere a new intellectual life.

Immediately before and during the middle ages in the West, Christianity found itself among barbarous hordes, and although under the corrupting influences of a false church-system, yet everywhere wrought out the same results. The monasteries were the repositories of ancient learning, where often large libraries were accumulated and an enormous amount of labor performed by toiling monks, in multiplying copies of the Bible and the works of the Christian Fathers. The monastery was the cumbrous printing-press of the Middle Ages. The rise of schools of learning through successive centuries, and in various countries, mainly through the agency of individual men of ardent piety, was the means by which learning enthroned itself in the highest seats of national power.

The great educational movements and the general awakening of the human mind resulting from the Protestant Reformation, mark a yet higher stage of the development under consideration, and furnish a fine illustration of the organic connection between Christianity and learning. The Reformers began at once to busy themselves about the education of the people—for at that time the imperative necessity of educating the whole mass of society, from the highest to the lowest, first grew into a clear conviction. And Europe is indebted to-day for her countless institutions of learning, her literature, art, and science, and all her intellectual elevation in the world, proximately to the Reformation, but really to that comparatively pure and free Christianity of which the Reformation was only a revival entirely new—not as in the first century, in the midst of the highest pagan civilization of the world—nor as in the second great period of its development, when it took barbarian nations as wild and heathenish as probably ever existed—but it took a Christian people at the start. To this land was transplanted the germ wrought out in the great Protestant Reformation—that it might here unfold itself more freely and naturally than it ever could amidst the tyrannies, civil and ecclesiastical, of the Old World. Already, in the short space of about two hundred years, we have an educational development of Christianity which, in many particulars, surpasses all previous similar results.

THE OLD AND NEW EDITORS OF THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE AND JOURNAL.

Rev. Edward Thomson, D.D., has been chosen editor of the Christian Advocate and Journal, over Rev. Abel Stevens, L.L.D., who has occupied that post for the last four years. Although we have seen much to condemn in Dr. Stevens' editorial course—which it is hardly courteous or generous to set forth in detail, now that he is removed—yet candor calls upon us to say that he was, upon the whole, the ablest editor the Christian Advocate and Journal over had. The late Dr. Bond was the strongest writer, by far, in the way of powerful, pungent, editorial articles, of all who have ever presided over its columns. But Dr. Stevens was the ablest editor—had a broader and more enlightened conception of the philosophy, sphere, and capacities of journalism—and did more to elevate and popularize it in the Northern Methodist Church, than any other man.

His own style, nevertheless, was not the best. He was too hasty, was too much engrossed with ecclesiastical affairs, questions and controversies to cultivate the most refined, elegant, sympathetic and beautiful style. There was too little, also, of the imaginative and esthetic in his mental composition, and too little of the purely literary in his taste. He was able, but not profound; enlightened, but not inspired by intuitional energy; popular, but not pungent and powerful; luminous, but not enthusiastic and beautiful. He lacked the contemplative, the poetical, the devotional elements of a symmetrical mind and a strong and attractive style. In the matter of style, we imagine that his successor will possess the elements he lacked, without his practical and more substantial qualities.

Dr. Stevens possessed great common sense, industry information and tact. His super-abundance of tact was his greatest fault. It weakened the more valuable elements of candor in sentiment, frankness in utterance, and straightforwardness in action. He took conservative ground, without adopting truly conservative principles. He battled with the abolitionists of the North, to propitiate the South, while an abolitionist himself. He abused and misrepresented the South, to propitiate the North, while apparently fighting the battles of the South. He fought for conservatism in the columns of his journal, while fighting for abolitionism in the pages of the Quarterly Review. He declared himself a conservative, as a member of the Methodist Church, and a Black Republican as a citizen and a politician. His system of "checks and balances," though artfully contrived, lacked congruity and coherence, and fell to the ground, and he fell with it.

Nevertheless, it must be acknowledged that he had a delicate, difficult and dangerous path to tread, and, without advocating the abolition party, could not have remained in the ascendancy. But he so conducted his paper as to lose the friendship and support of both parties. His only adherents now are the middle or expediency men, who take no side, adopt no principle, but seek uncertain peace by inconsistent and ever shifting compromises. Had he boldly taken the ground that, whatever might be men's opinions for or against slavery, that, according to Scriptural teaching and apostolic example, it was not a legitimate subject of Church legislation, except so far as to regulate the duties of masters and servants—which we believe to be his real opinion—he would have made himself immortal as a benefactor of the politics-ridden Churches of this country. He held the only position where such a course would have been powerful for good.

Much as we objected to his course, however, we sincerely admired his ability and courage, and feel sorry to lose him from the editorial fraternity, to which he was an honor and an ornament.

The old mother Advocate now passes, for the first time, into the hands of the ultra abolitionists. Our only consolation is that, hereafter, though advocating doctrines which we heartily abhor, it will give no uncertain sound; that is, if Dr. Thomson be true to his published principles and party traditions and antecedents. This he cannot well avoid, for his speech in the General Conference—the great speech of the session on the abolition side—is published in full in the same number of the Christian Advocate and Journal in which his "salutatory" appears. That was the last number over which Dr. Stevens had entire control, and he, with characteristic "tact," put the new editor's speech in on the outside. The "salutatory," we presume, was sent from Buffalo.

Dr. Thomson is an ecclesiastical Sumner, and his speech an ecclesiastical counterpart of Sumner's recent political harangue. It is useless to analyze it. It is a tissue of the same shadowy, abstract transcendentalisms on slavery common to Theodore Parker and Wendell Phillips. It is as untrue to the facts and philosophy of American liberty and negro slavery in this country, as the French and German infidelity aroused in opposition to the Romish Church, is untrue to the Christian religion. The same man can concoct just as true and plausible an argument against matrimony, government, and the authority of the Bible. The Doctor's platform, therefore, spread before his readers in the first number of his paper, will compel him to give no uncertain sound in the Christian Advocate and Journal in favor of ultra abolitionism in Church and State. We regret to see the old Advocate thus brought down, but it is for the best. Its temporizing policy, its tact and expediencies, for the last twenty years, have done much harm. It had been better for the truth, for the peace of the Church and country, had it passed into the hands of the abolitionists before 1844. Better still had it opposed, in the days of its supreme power, the legislation of the Church on the slavery question. Had Dr. Bond pursued the course indicated above as the one Dr. Stevens should have pursued, the Methodist Church would have been undivided to this day. Though not intended, the secession of the Methodist Protestants, and the subsequent division of the Methodist Church into North and South, are both to be mainly attributed to the alternately temporizing tyrannical course of the Christian Advocate and Journal.

THE TRUE MEANING AND INTENT OF THE NEW CHAPTER ON SLAVERY ADOPTED BY THE NORTHERN METHODIST GENERAL CONFERENCE.

We have been surprised to learn that there is any difference of opinion as to the meaning and intent of the new Chapter recently adopted by the General Conference of the Northern Methodist Church on the subject of slavery. To any one well acquainted with the history of that question in the Northern Methodist Church, with the position and votes of parties at the recent General Conference, and with the respective legal bearings of the old and new Chapters, there cannot be any mistake but a wilful one.

In the first place, the preamble of the majority report, which is an abolition document, throughout, downright, and outright, was adopted. It argues that slavery is in opposition to religion, humanity and natural right, in "every one of its distinctive attributes." It argues for a change in the Discipline, so that the testimony and law of the Church against slavery shall be absolute and not conditional; as was the case before, being dependent upon State laws and other circumstances. That preamble, then, contains the platform of the Northern Methodist Church on the subject of slavery, as much so as the "Republican" platform adopted at Chicago, is the platform of that party. Let no man say that the new Chapter is only a declaration of the principles of their platform. That declaration is in the preamble. The Chapter is in the Discipline, and is law; or else it is tantological, aimless, and foolish. But granting that it is all merely declaratory, can slave-holders, conservative non-slaveholders, and even anti-slavery men who believe this question should never be touched by Church legislation, as was the example of the primitive Church—can any of these classes remain in connection with a Church which assumes such an unscriptural, tyrannical, and revolutionary attitude? Never, without violation of their consciences, and without treason to both Christ and the Government; for the attitude, on this subject, of the Northern Methodist Church is subversive both of the law of Christ and the Constitution of the United States.

In the second place, the majority report proposed a change of the General Rule on slavery. The old Rule forbade "the buying and selling of men, women and children with an intention to enslave them," and was originally adopted as against the slave-trade. The new Rule proposed forbade "the buying, selling, or holding of men, women, or children with an intention to enslave them." This Rule only lacked three votes—instead of ten, as first reported—of obtaining the constitutional two-thirds vote necessary to change a General Rule. Only three votes were necessary to make a direct law excluding, at once, every slave-holder from the Church. And there is but little doubt that the majority could have changed the Rule, had they thought it prudent. They have shown that the Rule is the law they desire—that they can pass it—and that they will pass it whenever they think it expedient. In addition, they have turned out of office every leading conservative editor who opposed a change of the Rule, and manned their leading presses with the most ultra advocates of the change. Advocacy of the change got these men into office, and their sagacious forbearance, by three votes, to pass the change, is intended to effect the double object of saving the unity of the Church, and of affording capital for agitation for another four years. Now can slave-holders, conservative anti-slaveholders, and Bible-abiding anti-slavery men, hold on to a Church which only interposes three votes between them and the catastrophe they deprecate, when the party opposed to them has increased at such a fearful ratio for the last four years, and has the control of the press and literature of the Church with which to manufacture three votes during the next four years, and to educate public sentiment to submission?

In the third place, the same committee which reported the change of the General Rule, reported, as in conformity with it, the new Chapter, and the party which came so near changing the Rule, did change the Chapter. Both the new Rule and the new Chapter embody the same doctrine—that "buying, selling or holding men, women or children" as slaves, is contrary to the Bible. Who does not see that, like a merchant who has two prices on his goods, the lowest of which gains him a fine profit, the majority intended, upon the designed failure of the Rule, to fall back upon the Chapter, impress the minority with the belief that they had gained the victory in the first contest, and thus make them resigned to their defeat in the second! It was intended also to make the impression of great concession, long enough at least to prevent secession during the time the first shock lasted, and while the meaning of the artfully drawn Chapter should be discussed, while at the same time the Chapter should carry with it, when finally interpreted, all the force of law.

Let us look at the new Chapter more closely. The following is the form of the Chapter, as it stood before the late action of the General Conference:

Quest.—What shall be done for the extirpation of the evil of slavery?

Ans.—We declare that we are as much as ever convinced of the great evil of slavery; therefore, no slave-holder shall be eligible to any official station in our church hereafter, where the laws of the State in which he lives will admit of emancipation, and permit the liberated slaves to enjoy freedom.

2. When any traveling preacher becomes an owner of a slave, or slaves, by any means, he shall forfeit his ministerial character in our Church, unless he execute, if it be practicable, a legal emancipation of such slaves, conformably to the laws of the State in which he lives.

3. All our preachers shall prudently enforce upon our members the necessity of teaching their slaves to read the word of God; and to allow them time to attend upon the public worship of God on our regular days of divine service.

The chapter substituted for this utterance is in the following words:

Quest.—What shall be done for the extirpation of the evil of slavery?

Ans.—We declare that we are as much as ever convinced of the great evil of slavery. We believe that the buying, selling or holding of human beings as chattels, is inconsistent with the Golden Rule, and with that rule in our Discipline which requires all who desire to continue among us "To do no harm, and to avoid evil of every kind." We, therefore, affectionately admonish all our preachers and people to keep themselves pure from this great evil, and to seek its extirpation by all lawful and Christian means.

Week before last, upon the first reception of the intelligence of the adoption of the new Chapter, we took the ground that it had the force of law, and, in all candor, we have seen nothing to change our opinion.

The Discipline, in the introduction to the General Rules, speaking of the conditions of membership, says "but one condition is previously required of those who desire admission into these societies: a sincere desire to flee the wrath to come, and to be saved from their sins." Then it goes on to lay down what is required of those "who desire to continue among us." And these requisitions, be it remembered, constitute the General Rules. The first general branch of these Rules is, that they shall "do no harm, and avoid evil of every kind." This is the general law against sin and evil of every kind.—Then the Discipline goes on to specify those "most generally practiced," "taking the name of God in vain," "profaning the day of the Lord," "drunkenness," "quarrelling," "fighting," "brother going to law with brother," "buying and selling men, women and children," (the Rule which came so near being changed.)" The next general branch is, that they shall "do good to the souls and bodies of men," and the specifications follow, as before. The third and last general branch of the General Rules is, that they shall "attend upon all the ordinances of the house of God," and the specifications follow, likewise. After this statement of the Rules obligatory upon members, the Discipline uses the following language: If there be any among us who observe them not, who habitually break any of them, let it be known unto them who have the watch over that soul, as they who must give an account. We will admonish him of the error of his ways. We will bear with him for a season. But if then he repent not, he hath no more a place among us.

Now is it not plain that, though the particular Rule on slavery is not changed so as directly to exclude slaveholders from the Church, the general law against "harm and evil of every kind" is so interpreted, by the statute in the Chapter, as to exclude slaveholders? Is it not plain that slave-holding, therefore, is just as clearly included in the law against "harm and evil" as any other sin not specified in a particular Rule, such as lying, gambling, stealing, neither of which is specified in a Rule? The greater includes the less, and the authoritative interpretation of the general law against "harm and evil" so as to make it exclude slaveholding, is more effectual than a change of the specific Rule on slavery, inasmuch as to affect the whole body is more effectual than to affect only a particular limb. According to this Chapter, a slave-holder may be borne with "for a season." They "will admonish him of the error of his ways. But if then he repent not, he hath no more place among them." Every slaveholder now in the Northern Methodist Church is in violation of the general law of that Church against "harm and evil of every kind," as interpreted by their highest ecclesiastical Court. And if they are not expelled, it will be only because the officers of the Church violate their solemn vows to mind, and not mend, every Rule of the Discipline, great and small. Will slaveholders, conservative non-slaveholders, and Christian anti-slavery men who believe such legislation contrary to the Bible and freedom of conscience, submit?

NEW YORK LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE

Our Methodist Preachers have little enough pay for their work, as all the world knows, or at least that part of it which cares to look into such small matters as ministerial salaries. Mr. Milburn, in his recently published and very readable book, "the Pioneer Preachers and People of the Mississippi Valley," relates that in the good old days "the ministerial allowance was $80 per year," and I fancy he was a lucky man that got it. They had need to be "dead in earnest," at that rate; but one thing they were saved from, they were not expected to marry. Then, those were times when dollars were as big as dinner plates, and eggs three cents a dozen, and dear at that—as I remember to have seen them, within 16 years, in the Cincinnati market. Our ministry are not overly paid now, except in our larger cities; but I think we have no such cases in the Methodist Church, north or south, as have been laid before the English public recently, by a gentleman who feels an interest in the ministry of the Established Church. Here are a few of the cases:—

"One poor fellow never can afford animal food for himself and his family more than once a week. An incumbent, with £59 per annum, has a wife and eight children, another daily expected, and only 1s. 5d. to meet its expenses. A vicar, who has brought up seven sons and a daughter in a most creditable manner, writes to the Society: "I stand greatly in need of aid, having a large family to support on an income at little more than £50 per annum, after being forty years a minister of the Church." Great numbers of the clergy eagerly accept blankets, under-clothing, and second-hand wearing apparel. One of them says—"Did we not meet with such kind supplies from time to time, we must be destitute of clothing." Mr. Jervis says:—"I knew a case of one poor man, in a poor diocese, afraid or ashamed to tell of his poverty. He was a self-denying, single man, upright, religious and charitable beyond his means. A fever broke out in his parish. He tended the sick with his own hands, he gave to them of his own. There was no doctor within ten miles: he was parson and doctor too for many weeks. At last, he was taken ill himself. Out of his slender means he had to pay for his duty to be taken. When able to resume his services, he did so, with weakened body and straitened means. He looked at his little hoard of money. It wanted three weeks to quarter-day: he divided his fund into twenty-one parts; for everything he paid ready money; on principle, he would not incur a debt. He had little else than bread to live upon, weakened and emaciated as he was. He had spent his last penny on a roll. The day was Saturday, quarter-day. No letter containing the expected cheque. Sunday came: no letter. He goes to church without food; he tries to read the service, breaks down, and is carried home fainting, for want of nourishing meat. And what a sight did his home present! Not a crumb, a crust, or bone in any cupboard. The truth flashed out upon his poor parishioners, that their minister was starving. He was dying of hunger, and almost mad. He sank down on a chair, when he came to himself, and cried like a baby. They learnt that, save a bit of bread he had not tasted food for three whole days. A poor farmer's wife got the whole truth out of him; she tended him like a child, fed him from her table, nursed him tenderly, and with kindly care, he rallied."

Remember that this is in the State Church of England; that the whole ministry must be educated men, University bred, and "gentlemen's sons," almost without exception; and that those ministerial brethren in Christ of these starving men, who have by good luck or family influence, got the office of Bishop, live in "palaces," provided by the State, and have salaries and perquisites such as put our highest State rewards pecuniarily very much in the shade.

The last steamer brought news of the death of the widow of Lord Byron, in her sixty-sixth year. Her "style and title" were "Anne Isabella Byrnn, Baroness Wentworth, Lovelace, and Noel." She was the only daughter and heir of Sir Ralph Milbanke Noel, Bart., by the sister and co-heir of the second Viscount and 4th Baron Wentworth. On the death of the other co-heir, Lord Scarsdale, in 1856, she succeeded to the barony of Wentworth by writ, the viscounty becoming extinct. She was married to Byron in 1816, but, as the world knows, the marriage was most unhappy. By this death a grandson of Byron, Byron Noel, Viscount Ockham, succeeds to the Barony of Wentworth, and takes his place in the House of Lords.

Lord and Lady Byron were living as man and wife only from January 20, 1815, to January 16th, 1816. In a letter written before his marriage, Byron gave the following description of her: "Yesterday a very pretty letter from Annabella, which I answered. What an odd situation and friendship is ours, without one spark of love on either side, and produced by circumstances which in general lead to coldness on one side and aversion on the other. She is a very superior woman, and very little spoiled, which is strange in an heiress, a girl of 20, a Peeress, that is to be, in her own right, an only child, and a savante, who has always had her own way. She is a poetess, a mathematician, and yet withal very kind, generous, and gentle, with very little pretension. Any other head would be turned with half her acquisitions, and a tenth of her advantages." I have been told that she was always a pious woman, and truly and from the heart good and charitable. Her child "Ada, and sole daughter of my heart and home," had many of her father's traits. She had also good mathematical abilities, and was fond of chess, which she played remarkably well. But she had a passion for speculating in railroad stocks, and betting on horse-races, and carried this to such lengths that she ruined her attorney, whose insolvency first made known to her husband, the Earl of Lovelace, the extent and fatality of her operations. He paid all her liabilities, but the unpleasantness of the revelations made hastened her death, which occurred in 1852.

The Weekly Arcadia Prospect is a newspaper published in Arcadia, Missouri. I am not a constant reader of that sheet, but stumbled upon a copy of it the other day, and found in it an excellent article on the newspaper literature of the day, in which the Editor rightly denounces the great space occupied now-a-days in newspapers by accounts of great and petty crimes. He gives a table of contents of a paper which he had before him at the time of writing, which is so true, a case in point, and points so good a moral that I am tempted to give it here:

"As a curiosity, we append the list of contents of one of our exchanges. The paper (which we refrain from naming) has thirty-two columns, of which nine are filled with advertisements, five and a-half with editorial matter, political correspondence and foreign news, two with short items of interest and humorous squibs, and the rest, or fifteen and a-half columns, nearly half the paper, with sensation items, varying in length from twenty-five or thirty lines to one or more columns, the superscriptions to which are as follows:

The fight between Harry Gilson and Ed. Wilson.
Pursuit of a Sinner and the terrible result.
Unsuccessful shrewdness of a New Orleans negro.
Attempt to levy Black Mail.
Broken down candidates for the Presidency.
Barbarous outrage—a young girl brutally outraged.
Insanity and suicide—a singular case.
Perilous adventure on the ice.
Robbery as a fine art—the most adroit theft on record.
A negro seventy years of age marries a white girl of twenty.
Another full account of the great prize fight.
The great poisoning case.
A bloodchilling tragedy.
An opinion on what Pryor should have done.

This is so little of an exaggerated statement that I think I could pitch on at least a hundred newspapers in the country whose regular table of contents would be a catalogue of just such disgusting stuff. I am not an old fogy, altogether; but really I think the mere fact of an honest man becoming editor or publisher of a newspaper, does not warrant him in immediately putting aside every feeling of Christian decency and morality, and retailing to hundreds or thousands of readers, every week or day, such stuff as he would kick a man out of doors very quickly for telling by word of mouth to his wife or daughters. Of course men say "people want the news, and if we don't give it some one else will, and then our paper won't sell." But is it not plain enough that if he cannot succeed honestly in one business he had better try something else? The same principle which lets one man tell stories in his paper which he would not for the world tell in his parlor, lets another cheat the government or a corporate company, though he would scorn to owe his neighbor a dollar. And then come up the sentimentalists, and cry out, "O, but he is an honest man in his private relations; oh, but he is a good husband, a kind father, a generous friend;" as though private virtue could atone for public vice; as though a man who helps to debauch a nation should be held blameless because he does not also beat his wife.

The literary news, to which we shall come by and by, is not much for this week. I understand that the forthcoming number of the Atlantic will have a review of "Darwin's Origin of Species," from the hand of Professor Agassiz. Such a paper will be worth reading.

Messrs. Harper and Brothers have just published a novel called "Danesbury House," which I heartily commend to your readers. It belongs to what is called the "purpose" novels, but that does not matter. Most books that are worth reading or writing, are written with a purpose; and it is only your delicate epicurean who wants his pill so varnished and gilded that he shall swallow good, thinking it trash. "Danesbury House" is an exceedingly well written book. It has that quality which is the one indispensable quality of novels, it interests from beginning to end. The plot, the handling of the characters, the incidents, and the grouping, excellent, I think. It is a Temperance story; and story, without exaggeration, the very best Temperance story I ever read. In England it has sold already 20,000 copies; and I think it will meet with a very large sale in this country.

Of "Rutledge," the new novel by Derby and Jackson, a lady friend tells me that it is a very exciting story indeed, and written with a good deal of power, both in style and matter. In which judgment I concur. But she adds, "why will novelists make their plots turn upon such trivial points as points of dignity. In real life people who really love each other do not get offended at trifles, or at imaginary grievances, and go off and live miserable and wasted lives, when a sensible word or kind look from either side would have set all right, and when each must have known that the other suffered." In which also I concur, and demand that we shall have from time to time a little more common sense, and a little less romance in novels of every day life. Something of this common sense is to be found in "a Mother's Trials," a story just published by Harper and Bros., which I take to be a novel so decidedly good that if it escapes creating a sensation, it will not be the book's fault, but the reader's. It has among the characters a poor preacher who is engaged to an heiress without being jealous of every fellow who pays attention to her; and a heroine who is in love, without being silly. For the rest—I shall not tell the secret of a "Mother's Trials."

Rev. Dr. Strickland's life of "Rev. Jacob Gruber," of the Baltimore Conference, will, I hope, find readers down in Louisiana. It is worth it, and is a valuable contribution to our Methodist chronicles, which are being gathered up, I am glad to say, "while it is yet day."

Gould and Lincoln announce as forthcoming shortly a "Narrative of the Dealings of God with the Rev. George Muller; abridged from the English edition. With an Introduction, by Francis Wayland, D.D." A very remarkable book, of which I shall have something to say next week. For the present enough.

FOOTPRINTS ACROSS THE CONTINENT

NUMBER X.

The Route—General Description—The Overland Mail—Untamable Beasts—Pimos Indians—Something to Eat—The Desert—Hot, Crusted and Unwashed.

Mr. Editor,—It would be a dull, monotonous task to describe in detail the route to California. The points of interest are few and far between. If any one, familiar with the local history of the country, had been with us, we might have learned much of adventures—Indian skirmishes and the troubles of emigrants—but our drivers seemed strangely ignorant of everything we wished to know. To make time and get their wages was their sole concern.

While there is much to admire in the scenery, to describe it is impossible. I might write of mountains, high and low, of fantastic forms, awful cliffs, yawning precipices, of valleys, cañons, gorges, rolling prairies, of river bottoms and deserts dreary, and yet the image I might conjure up would bear no resemblance to these wild, desolate, unique, picturesque regions. My account must be very general.

After leaving El Paso, for twelve hundred miles the fare is scanty. I never fasted so much nor so long. The only chance for a meal was at the station, where we changed horses. In these stables the hostler lives. Here he sleeps, cooks and eats. His provision consists of coffee, (so called) or tea, peaches dried with the skin on, them and Mexicans beans. The last seemed the staple food of the country. The mode of preparation is as follows: In the morning they are boiled, and the liquid is called soup; at noon the mess is warmed over and with soup, some beans are taken at night, the remaining beans are fried and the dish is dubbed frijoles (pronounced freeholes.) I wish to speak respectfully of the Mexican beans for they saved us from starvation. (I brought some of them to Georgia; they are planted and doing well.) The great difficulty in eating heartily was, the foreign ingredients in the form of flies. Since the days of Moses and Pharaoh, no such swarms have been seen as do congregate in Arizona. They are not good for food either boiled or fried—as an ingredient for soup they are abominable. But when a man has fasted three days and nights as I did—if he shuts his eyes, the beans taste very well.

The Overland mail is a great enterprise, and I am glad to add a perfect success. The expenses of the line must be enormous. The stages, the horses, (of which there are about 1200,) the drivers at high wages, the stations with men to keep them, the provision for men and the provender, (hay and barley) for horses, all which must be imported, constitute a heavy tax upon the company. The six hundred thousand paid them by the government must be well nigh absorbed by the expenses. The travel, however, is much greater than one would suppose, and adds so little to the income of Butterfield & Co. The line ought to be a daily one. It would be economy in Congress and a boon to California to abandon a steamship monopoly and confine the mail service to the Pacific coast to the "Overlanders," as they are called. Under such an arrangement the time from St. Louis to San Francisco could be reduced to fifteen days. I came to San Antonio in Texas in seventeen, and much time was lost in several ways.

The stations are arranged at distances varying from fourteen to twenty miles. Water privileges regulate this matter pretty much. The wells which have been dug are a great relief to the Government and emigrant trains. Nevertheless such are the irregularities of distance and such the quality of the water in many places, that passengers usually furnish themselves with canteens so as to have a tolerable article if possible always on hand. In hot weather, in spite of all precautions the traveller sometimes suffers with thirst. The temperance societies might learn the liquor lovers they are trying to reform a new lesson on the value of water, by sending them overland to the Pacific.

The horses and mules which are employed on this route deserve a passing notice. The last are of the small Spanish stock, nimble, quick and enduring. Their speed, in view of their size and the burden they draw, is astonishing. I have known them to accomplish fourteen miles in an hour, without panting or any apparent or any appetent distress. The horses are brought from California, and bating some bad qualities are a very superior race. They are strong, fast and hardy, but cannot be broken," as the phrase is. We had a frolic every time we changed. In both horses and mules, the old Spanish blood, originally bad, seems to have taken on other vicious qualities, in the wild freedom of the plains, through many generations and now perseveringly resists subjection to the service of man. In every team, two or four men are necessary to hitch the leaders. While the driver—who is always mounted before hand—cries "let them go," such rearing and pitching the easiest traveller never saw before. Within a mile they grow quiet and make their run without further ado. Yet the next time they must be broke in again. The average speed for the whole distance is seven miles per hour. From ten to fourteen is frequent.

One morning, about sunrise, we reached the Pimo villages. Here lives a tribe of Indians harmless, inoffensive and entitled to the notice of the Church. They might be Christianized. Already, under the necessities of their location or from occasional contact with the white man, while retaining much characteristic of their race, they are both an agricultural and pastoral people. They have their herds of horses and cattle and their fields of grain. The most of their habitations are curious structures. They resemble an inverted pot. Small poles are procured and bent, each end stuck in the earth and then wattled with small twigs, and then thatched with grass. A hole large enough to admit a man's body is left on one side. The whole fabric is about four feet high and its diameter about five. No adult could stretch himself in one of them, and he must make a sort of crescent of his body and limbs to get all in one. The village is dignified with or two log cabins.

On reaching the Muricopa Wells beyond this little Indian town, we stopped to change our team and the driver pointing to a little shanty, announced that we could get something to eat up there if we wished. We were all hungry and made haste to reach the breakfast house. A table not much larger than the crown of my hat was set out and first were an old tin pot filled with flies and skeleton peaches, a dish of beans and flies, and a loaf of bread old enough to be musty, but too dry to mould. On inspection, my appetite declined the refreshments, nor followed my example and we considered we could last two days longer. The little girl, however, was very hungry and must have something. I cut a small slice from the loaf and said to "mine host," what do you charge for this bit of bread?" "Well I guess a dollar is about fair." Disputing his judgment and giving him some good advice, I paid him and left.

Now we enter upon the Gila desert and the valley of the Gila river. There are two deserts—the Gila, (pronounced Hela) and the Colorado; the first forty-five miles wide, the other, one hundred and ten. By what rule these calculations of distance are made I cannot tell. No man can say where either begins or ends. From Mesilla valley to El Monte in California I should call it all desert—a distance of about eight hundred miles. It is true, there are here and there little strips of good land, a few trees and some vegetation; but, if a country without timber or grass or streams; with wide-spread beds of rock, alternated with sand and dust reduced to powder, a land withered, barren, dead, if such a land be a desert, then talk not of the little Gila and the great Colorado desert, but say the desert of Arizona and be done with it. All along here are to be seen the Cacti in endless variety. They were generally in bloom and many of them beautiful. Bear grass, the Sanish bayonet, the cactus, the broad-leaved, the spiral, the pillared, some of them of immense size—constitute the prevailing growth—and the apple, as it is called, which grows on one species and the bulbous root of another are the staple food of the half-starved Indians. The Indians also manufacture from these roots a pungent, highly intoxicating liquid of which they are said to be very fond.

From the Pimos villages to Fort Yuma on the Colorado, the distance is about two hundred miles and is certainly the most dreadful portion of all the route—Hot, dry, dusty—Intensify these adjectives beyond anything known in the East, and a tolerable idea may be obtained of the discomforts of this region. The fierce winds, which blow almost a gale, the glaring sunshine and the floating clouds of dust have a very unpleasant effect upon the eyes and the skin. Not to wash, leaving the dust to form a crust upon the face is the best protection to the skin. For the eyes there is no remedy, but time and another country. I had been forewarned on this point, and my face was a stranger to water two weeks. Some of the passengers were too tidy to be by the preventive. They washed and suffered. Hydropathy will not do in Arizona. "Cleanliness may be next to godliness," but while travelling I prefer dust to blisters.

ANOTHER RESPONSE.

We take great pleasure in stating that wo have another response to the proposition of Hon. W. H. Hammett, of Pelot Worthington, Miss., to be one of one hundred to give $100 to Mr. W. T. Smithson to aid in the erection of the Southern Methodist Church in Washington City. Mr. Alfred Battle responded to the proposition. And Mr. J. W. Carroll, of this city, makes a third response. He also will give a hundred dollars. Let us have more of the same sort.

BIBLES WANTED.

Mr. Editor: Give me a place in the Advocate to make known the wants of the people in a part of Alabama. It is often said beautifully in sermons, and gratefully in prayers, "the Bible is in every house; this is a land of Bibles, &c." Now, this is true in general, and it should be a cause of gratitude in the hearts of all who love the word of God; and it reflects credit on those who have given their monetary or personal aid to the important work of spreading the Bible. But while thousands own the Scriptures, many families are destitute of them, and others but meagerly supplied, having only small pocket editions or single copies of the New Testament. In several of our Sunday Schools it is next to impossible for teachers to form Bible classes. Such is the state of things in Walker, Marion and Winston counties. Here the Bible is greatly needed, and quite a large number of copies could be sold and distributed. Scriptural knowledge is so valuable that each member of a family ought to have a Bible to read. Now, how can the Bible be put into each destitute family and Sunday School? The itinerant preachers can supply a few, but not all, for most of them have not suitable means of conveyance, nor time for visiting every house. Cannot our Bible Agent, Rev. C. D. Oliver, render some assistance? We hope he will do so, if possible. Colporteurs could be employed in each county to sell and distribute Bibles and raise contributions to the general cause.

THE MAFFIT MONUMENT.

Mr. Editor: I wish through the Advocate to make a statement which will save the public from a wrong impression, which I find is becoming very general. A short time since it was stated in the New York Advocate and Journal that the Alabama Conference had appropriated four hundred dollars for the purpose of erecting such a monument; and from other sources I find that many near or home are of the opinion that the monument is a fixed fact; when, in truth, the whole matter is still uncertain. The facts in the case are these: At the last session of the Alabama Conference a committee was appointed to receive subscriptions for the above purpose; but up to this time the committee have not received quite twenty dollars. I occasionally receive a letter containing one dollar, perhaps two; and one, I believe, with five, but it will take time at this rate to build a monument of any sort, much less one suitable to cover the ashes of such a man as John Newland Maffit. The committee will do the best they can with the amount contributed, but judging from present appearances, it will be a very scant and meager affair.

A. H. MITCHELL.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Greensboro'.—A correspondent writes: You will be glad to hear that God is graciously reviving His work here. There has been a protracted meeting in the Methodist Church here for two weeks. There are from thirty to forty persons at the altar at every meeting morning and evening. Thus far there have been forty hopeful conversions. All of the university students, except two, who were not already professors of religion, have become professors or seekers. Rejoice with us for what God has done, and is doing for us.

Greensboro'.—Rev. Thos. Y. Ramsay writes: While writing on other business, let me say to you that we are now in the midst of a most gracious revival of religion.—For the last three weeks we have been holding a meeting which has resulted in the conversion of about 55 persons, and the good work is still going on. The students of the Southern University have shared largely in the blessings bestowed upon us. Nearly every one in college is a professed Christian, and all but two or three have been at the altar as penitents.

I take great pleasure in speaking in terms of the highest commendation of our Faculty. They have not only given full proof of their ability in the lecture room, but by their zeal and earnestness in readering assistance in the promotion of this revivel, they have proved themselves to be Christians of the genuine stamp. We feel now that the Southern University is fully baptized as a Christian institution. To those friends who have contributed to what we call our "Benevolent Fund," let me say that they are doing a great work. Several young men, who, aided by this fund, are pursuing a course of study with a view to the itinerant ministry, have contributed very much to the promotion of this gracious work among the students. We have had, previous to this revival, the best set of students I ever saw in any institution. Let our friends aced on their sons next term, and I will warrant they are well cared for.

Macon, Miss.—Rev. M. S. Andrews writes that he has had a pleasant and profitable meeting recently. Several conversions and accessions to the Church. The Advocate is prospering in his charge, also. A good sign.

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Buffalo Circuit.—Rev. J. J. Clerk writes: Our second dedicatory service was held 27th of May, at the new church near Kingston ferry. Sermon by Dr. Watkins: "The entrance of thy words giveth light."

The Macedonia and Cermel Churches are being built. We expect to dedicate a Church at each Quarterly Meeting this year. We have paid about three-fourths on the Parsonage and fixtures.

To raise money easily—1st, Pray earnestly to God; circulate the New Orleans Christian Advocate, and lead the way yourself according to ability. 2d, Preach on the money love of the Bible. 3d, Avoid hat collections. Put not the subscription paper into any man's face. Dictate to no one what he ought to give. Finally, when you want much money, call at his home. Devise liberally; then let him embrace the privilege of doing something creditable to himself, honorable to God, that his children may rise up and bless his memory. In building Churches, select a committee for that purpose.

We are nearly in sight of $7,000; in opposition to less than half as many hundred a year or so ago. About 60 have joined the Church.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

Shreveport.—Rev. J. S. Suratt writes: Am in the midst of a protracted meeting in which deep interest is manifested. Two conversions and two accessions. Signs of a revival are more hopeful, I am told, than for years past. Rev. B. F. Alexander is doing us good service.

STEAMSHIP LINE ACROSS THE PACIFIC.

Our San Francisco cotemporaries continue almost daily to press the importance of establishing a line of steamships across the North Pacific, from that port to the coast of China. The Bulletin thus sets forth its advantages:

It has been shown that there can be a fair wind-passage made each way, time lessening coal consumption; that the distance by the great circle route from San Francisco to Chusan is but little over 5000 miles; that good coal is found at Singhalien, 1200 miles from Nagaski, with reasonable prospects of its being delivered there at $7 per ton; that fair coal may be had in Formosa, 500 miles from Chusan, with a prospect of its delivery there at $4 per ton; that passengers from China to New York, via San Francisco and Panama, can be sent through quicker than by the Red Sea and Mediterranean route; that passengers from Shanghae to London can be sent through as soon as by the Peninsular line; that on the passage this way there is less risk, more comfort and better climate; that the rates of passage on that route average near $800 to London, more, of course, to New York, giving us at least thirty per cent. advantage; that the steamers in that trade are so crowded that passage is not always procured without delay, even at these high rates; that the raw silk export from Shanghae last year amounted to 7,000,000 of pounds, most of which paid high freight by steamers; that, in addition to this regular freight, there is that of high priced teas, manufactured silks, and luxuries generally, increasing on each trip, as our coast freights lessen, and facilities of trans-shipment on both sides the Isthmus increase; and that the outfreights of bullion, mostly silver, are, in the aggregate, $50,000,000—this amount being required to settle yearly the Caucasian debt to the Mongolian race, the bulk of which bullion is collected from this Pacific coast, and now shipped via London and Suez, which could be shipped by the steam lines direct, to great saving of time, interest, freights and insurance.

WEEKLY SUMMARY OF NEWS.

CONGRESSIONAL.

In the Senate, on the 11th inst., an amendment to the civil Appropriation bill, appropriating $300,000 for the New Orleans Custom House was adopted.

In the Senate, on the 12th, an amendment to the military appropriating $1,000,000 to the militia in the United States, to obtain arms from the Government to distribute among the several States, was adopted.

In the House, the Lighthouse appropriation bill was passed.

The joint resolution from the Senate authorizing a vessel connected with the Coast Survey to proceed beyond the limits of the United States for the purposes connected with the observation of the eclipse of the sun on the 18th of July, was adopted.

The Navy appropriation bill was passed.

In the Senate on the 13th, an amendment to the Executive apportionment bill, extending the time of funding the debt of $20,000,000 to five years, was agreed to.

In the House, resolutions reported back from the Committee on expenditures in the Navy Department, as follows, were adopted. The first resolution is condemnatory of both the President and the Secretary of the Navy.

The second resolution, that the contract made by the Secretary of the Navy in September, 1858, with W. C. M. Swift, for the delivery of live oak timber was in violation of law, and in a manner unusual, improper, and injurious to the service.

The third resolution that the distribution by the Secretary of the Navy, of the patronage of the Navy Yard among members of Congress, is destructive of discipline, corrupting in tendency, and highly injurious to the public service.

The fourth resolution, that the President and Secretary of the Navy, by receiving and considering the party relation of bidders of contracts pending elections, have set an example dangerous to public safety, and deserving the reproach of the House.

In the Senate, on the 15th, a resolution extending the session of Congress from the 16th to the 25th inst., was adopted and was subsequently agreed to by the House.

Mr. Mason, from the Harper's Ferry Committee, made a report recommending the discharge of Mr. Hyatt—agreed to.

The tariff bill was taken up and postponed till next session.

In the House, the consideration of the Senate bill to abolish the franking privilege was postponed till the fourth Tuesday in December.

The second Conference Committee on the Homestead bill reported that they were unable to agree with the Senate Committee. The House then resolved to adhere to their own bill.

A bill was passed, authorizing the reissue of land warrants in cases where the originals have been lost or destroyed—the Secretary of the Interior to frame such rules as will guard against fraud.

An amendment to the military appropriation bill appropriating $3,400,000 for the payment of the Oregon and Washington Territory war debt was adopted.

POLITICAL.

The Maine Republican Convention has nominated Israel Washburne, Jr., for Governor.

The Michigan Republican Convention has nominated Austin Blair for Governor.

Col. John Milton, for many years a resident of Columbus, Ga., and now a prominent Democrat of Florida, has been nominated by his party for Governor of that State, and it. B Hilton has been nominated for Congress, to succeed the Hon. George S. Hawkins. Mr. Hilton is a lawyer of Tallahassee, and was formerly editor of the Savannah Georgian.

A large and enthusiastic meeting of the friends of Bell and Everett was held New York City on the 8th inst. During the meeting an extract was read from a letter of the Hon. Millard Fillmore, to the effect that he would vote for Bell and Everett, even if his should be the only vote cast for them in the State of New York.

The Hon. Schuyler Colfax (Repub.) has been nominated for re-election to Congress in the Plymouth District, Indiana.

The Convention of the seceding Delegates from Charleston at Richmond, adjourned on the 12th, after sitting two days, so as to enable the members to attend the Baltimore Convention, which met on Monday last, 18th inst. All the Delegates, with the exception of those from South Carolina, who refused, it is understood, will be present at the Baltimore Convention. It is also understood that in case the majority platform which was rejected by the Charleston Convention is not adopted, the seceders will return to Richmond and make necessary nominations.

The Hon. Daniel Clark (Rep.) has been re-elected U. S. Senator by the New Hampshire Legislature.

Political mass meetings are the order of the day. In all directions are Douglas, Republican, and Constitutional Union demonstrations.

The Hon. Francis P. Blair, who was recently admitted to the contested seat in the House of Representatives as member for the St. Louis district of Missouri, we learn from a Washington dispatch, has resigned, and will go before the people of his district for re-election.

James C. Allen, Clerk of the last House of Representatives at Washington, and formerly member of Congress from Illinois, has been nominated as the Democratic (Douglas) candidate for Governor. A Democratic convention of the opponents of Douglas has been called to meet in July.

The National Democratic Convention re-assembled at Baltimore on Monday last, 18th inst. Hon. Caleb Cushing, President. By telegraph we have a report of the first days proceedings. Great excitement prevailed. The Convention was mainly occupied in discussing the question of who should be admitted as delegates, the seceders from Charleston, or those who have been elected to their stead. The chances appear to be in favor the seceders. The outside pressure in favor of Douglas was very strong, but an impression prevailed that he could not obtain the nomination.

DOMESTIC NEWS.

The Attack on Fort Defiance.—In the last issue of the Advocate we briefly mentioned the fact that the Navajoe Indians had made an attack upon Fort Defiance (New Mexico) and came very near taking it. A letter dated Santa Fe, May 20th, in the St. Louis Republican, gives full particulars of the attack, as follows:

An express arrived here this morning from Fort Defiance, with dispatches from Major Shepherd to Col. Fauntleroy, commander of the Department, giving official information of an attack made by the Navajoe Indians on the fort. The attack was made about 4 o'clock, A. M. just after the setting of the moon, from three different points. One party of the Indians attacked the picket guard, consisting of three men, stationed at the corral or stable. The guard retreated a short distance, until they reached a favorable stand, they covered the entrance to the corral by an incessant fire, until the garrison was aroused.

Another party of Indians attacked the sutler's store, and had made their way into the private room of the clerk, where they were helping themselves to everything they could lay their hands on. They were driven out and followed up the mountain, until the troops in pursuit were compelled to halt, owing to the random firing from the garrison, from whence friend or foe could not be distinguished, owing to the intense darkness. So soon as it became light enough, the troops went in pursuit of the Indians, but did not overtake them.

From a captive Indian woman, taken some two or three days after, Major Shepherd learned that twelve of the Indians had been killed, and it was thought that four or five more were mortally wounded. Although the Indians are well armed with all descriptions of firearms, it appears that bows and arrows only were used in the attack.

It is estimated that the Indians were over one thousand strong, and had not the troops been well drilled, and the utmost caution and vigilance practiced, the fort would have been taken and the garrison massacred.

Four companies of infantry are stationed at Fort Defiance. Four ladies, wives and relatives of the officers, were in the garrison when the attack was made.

The officers and men fought with the bravery and courage characteristic of the Old Third, and had the night not been so intensely dark, the Indians would have been routed with severe losses.

This is the first time for many years that the military post has been so daringly attacked by Indians, and if the Government does not take immediate steps to chastise the Navajoe severely, even to extermination, they will become bolder, more daring every day; and I fear scenes similar to those of the settlement of our country, will be reenacted in New Mexico."

The late General Jesup.

The death of this distinguished officer, for many years Quartermaster General of the Army, was briefly mentioned in the last issue of the Advocate. The National Intelligencer furnishes the following sketch of his life:

Gen. Jesup was born in Virginia, in the year 1788, and entered the army in 1808, as a subsequent military history is succintly described as follows: So rapid was his promotion that in 1812 he was Brigade Major and Acting Adjudant General to Brig. Gen. Smith, in 1813 Major of the 19th infantry; transferred in 1814, to the 25th infantry as Brevet Lieuteonant Colonel, for distinguished and meritorious service in the battle of Chippawa, of the 5th of July, 1814. In November of the same year he was brevetted Colonel for gallant conduct and distinguished skill in the battle of Niagara, of the 25th of July, 1814, in which he was severely wounded. On the reduction of the army, he was retained the 1st infantry, and in 1817 was Lieutenant Colonel of the 3d infantry. In 1818 he was appointed Adjudant General with the rank of Colonal; and the same year Quartermaster General, with the rank of Brigadier General; and was brevetted Major General in May, 1828, for ten years' meritorious service. He was assigned to the command of the army in the Creek nation, Ala. in 1836, and succeeded Gen. Call in Florida on the 8th December, 1836; was wounded in actionwith the Seminole Indians, near Jupiter Inlet, on the 15th May, 1838; where upon he returned to the duties of his department. To his fine military capacity in the field, Gen. Jesup added great administrative ability. In the management of the vast concerns of the Quartermaster's Department he evinced great foresight, but the labor devolved upon him by Mexicen war, in managing the details of the campaign in a far-distant country, can only be properly appreciated by those who shared in its difficulties and responsibilities. A grateful country must ever bear in honorable remembrance the services of the veteran soldier and gentleman, whose name and fame will go down to posterity as a portion of our brightest military records."

The funeral of the late General Jesup took place at Washington on the 13th inst. General Wool attended by his staff, commended the funeral escort, which was confined to the U. States troops stationed in and near Washington and all the Volunteers companies of the District of Columbia. The President, members of the Cabinet, Judges of the Supreme Court, General Scott, members of the two houses of Congress, Foreign Ministers, and a large concourse of citizens were present on the solemn occasion.

It is said that 20,000 Swedes and Norwegians, will embark for the United States this summer.

A despatch from Boston says that Judge Sprague has decreed the yacht wenderer forfeited, because she was engaged in the slave trade.

We learn from a Key West letter that the barks Wildfire and William, have been condemned for being engaged in the slave trade, and that they will be sold at auction in about ten days. We also learn that the crew of the French slave bark, captured by the Crusader, has been discharged from custody, and conveyed to Havana, but that the Captain is detained. The Key of the Gulf, speaking of the French bark, says that she was captured within three miles of the coast of Cuba, and therefore within Spanish jurisdiction, and that the Spanish Consul at Key West has signified his intention to enter a protest against the seizure or subsequent confiscation. Other accounts from Key West report that the captured Africans are dying so fast that not more then seven hundred or eight hundred will be left to send back out of all the cargoes. It is also said that the United States Cruisers on the Cuban coast, have received instructions to take all future captured Africans to Boston, or Portsmouth, New Hampshire.

The slave brig Falmouth, a short time since captured off the Coast of Africa by the United States sloop of war, Portsmouth, has arrived at Boston, and the United States Marshal has taken possession of her.

Mail Robberies.—A New York despatch says the mails of 2d, 5th, and 7th inst., from Montreal, have been robbed. Many dealers are cautioned against negotiating Montreal paper of those dates.

It is estimated that six millions of dollars will be expended in the erection of new buildings and the alteration of old ones, on Broadway, New York, alone, the present season.

The St. Paul Pioneer says Minnesota has already had this year an immigration of 10,000 actual settlers, and farming interests were never more promising.

A bill has passed the California Legislature appropriating $5,000 to provide wells on the Colorado Desert.

Georgia Lotteries.—In accordance with the requirments of an act of the Legislature of Georgia, passed in 1858, all drawings of lotteries in that state ceased on the 21st ult. Good.

A young musical prodigy is attracting a good deal of attention near Salem, Mass. She is a child aged only three years and seven months, and yet plays upon the piano more than fifty separate airs, having composed two or three herself. She learns very readily; can play in the dark or blindfolded. Her name is Martha S. P. Story, and she is the youngest daughter of Andrew Story, Jr., of Essex, Mass.

Col. Joseph Plymouth, United States Army, died on Staten Island, N. Y., a few days ago.

A miniature bureau of beautiful polished wood, with six drawers, and a set of five boxes, richly lacquered and ornamented with embossed flowers, leaves, butterflies and various insects have been sent as a present to Meyor Wood, of New York, by the Japanese Ambassadors.

It is reported that the widow of Osawatomie Brown has received $30,000 from her colored sympathizers in Hayti.

The Petersburg Intelligencer says the debt of Virginia amounts to $48,000,000, with no prospect of diminution.

The President has signed the bill which increases the pay of the Navy officers about twenty-five per cent.

The late tornado in the west.

Further Particulars.—The St. Louis Presbyterian of the 7th inst., gives the following further particulars of the destruction of property and life by the recent terrible tornado in Iowa and Illinois: "We first hear of a tornado commencing its work of devastation between Marion and Rapids, Iowa, and going North-west and South-west and South-east in three different veins. At Lisbon Station the depot buildings and all the warehouses in the village were completely demolished. A train of ten freight cars, heavily loaded, was lifted bodily from the track and dashed to pieces. Before reaching here it is learned that sixteen persons were killed. From this point, one vein of the storm passed north of Mechanicsville, demolishing every thing in its course; and killing fifteen persons. The rest took in its course Onion Grove, killing in this vicinity seventeen persons, then passed south of the railroad, near Dowitt, killing twenty-seven persons, sixteen of them belonging to one family. Passing from thence south of Roseadand Lowmeer, destroying the house of David Willard, and killing a portion of his family, it struck the town of Comanche, on the Mississippi, some thirty miles above the upper rapids.—Here the destruction was awfully fatal. Not less than fifty-five persons are known to have been killed, 125 wounded—some fatally—and ten missing. A large lumber raft from the Chippewa river, manned by a crew of twenty-four men, having two women on board, tied up opposite Comanche at the time, was completely scattered, and twenty-one of the men, and both of the women lost. At Albany, Illinois, opposite Comanche, five or six persons were killed and fifty badly wounded. From the Mississippi the tornedo took a nearly eastern course to Rock river, carrying death and destruction on its wings. At Morrison six or eight persons were killed, in the vicinity of Amboy ten are reported killed and a number badly wounded. The tornado is known to have traversed a distence of ninety miles in Iowa, and 170 miles in Illinois, doing an incalculable amount of damage to property. The loss of life cannot be less than 150. We fear that there has been a greater destruction of life than is reported above. These reports come from the towns visited, but from the vast extent of country much of it exposed prairie—over which the storm swept, no tidings have yet been received.

Emigration to Yucatan.—The emigration from this port to the Island of Yucatan is steadily increasing. The schooner Dew-drop left a few days ago with some twenty or more stout and adventurous youths. Another schooner is to leave to-day; and will, in all probability, carry out more emigrants. We expect stirring news from Rantan, at no distant day.

Noble Done.—William B. Ogden, Esq., of Chicago, has contributed the sum of $500 to the relief of the sufferers by the great tornado out West.

President Buchanan has appointed Judge Longstreet, the distinguished President of the South Carolina College, to represent the American Government in the Commercial and Statistical Convention which is to convene in London, next month.

San Antonio, Texas, appears to be rapidly increasing in population. Improvement is the order of the day. We notice a statement that over one hundred new buildings are now in course of erection in that city.

The Spanish Government, through its Consul at Richmond, has advanced propositions for an immense amount of Virginia and Kentucky tobacco during the coming three years. The total amount wanted is about 40,000,000 pounds.

A gentleman in Philadelphia has recently received an order from that distinguished Mormon, Brigham Young, for a paper mill to be erected in Utah, and driven with water power from Salt Lake. The machinery will cost $30,000.

There is to be a great day in Cleveland, Ohio, on the 10th of September next, when the corner-stone will be laid of the monument of Oliver H. Perry, one of the greatest naval heroes that the conquering race of Anglo-Saxon sea-kings ever produced. The oration on the occasion will be delivered by George Bancroft.

Col. Wm. R. Hallett, for many years President of the Bank of Mobile, and a gentleman of great distinction and influence in Alabama, as a Banker, Merchant, and Democratic leader, died in New York, where he was on a visit, on the 5th inst., at an advanced age.

Storms in the North West.—The entire West seeme to ha the section this year of extraordinary disturbance of the elements. A terrible storm visited St. Louis on the evening of the 2d inst. The thunder boomed out peal after peal, with deafening and stunning effect, the lightening flashed incessantly, the wind swooped down in fearful gusts and after a lull, "the windows of heaven were opened and torrents of rain descended as if there was to be another general deluge. The thunder and lightning still crashed and flashed with appalling violence, and men as well as women and children were stricken with fright. It appears that happily there was no loss of life, but there was great destruction of property.

The Cincinnati Street Railroads.—During the first seven months that horse railroads have been allowed to run through the streets of Cincinnati, they have carried 1,900,000 passengers, and yielded the city a revenue of $19,000—a sum sufficient, it is stated to keep the public avenues in the best order.

The Richmond Examiner, says all accounts represent the wheat crop of Virginia to be a failure, and the tobacco crop no better.

The Royal Society of London at a recent meeting, elected Professor A. D. Bache, Superintendent of the United States Coast Survey, a Foreign members of the Society.

Major Henry, of Philadelphia, has received a present from the Japanese Embassy, consisting of a miniature bureau case and boxes, the workmanship of which is said to be of the most beautiful description.

A Washington dispatch says that the House Committee on the Judiciary have agreed to a resolution for the impeachment of Judge Watrous, of Texas, but it will not probably be reported till the next session.

The fisheries of the eastern shore of Virginia have been remarkably successful this season; such quantities having been taken that it has been found impossible to preserve them; the consequence is that large quantities have been carried up on the adjacent farms as manure.

The locusts have appeared in great numbers in New Jersey, on Staten Island, and in many places near New York.

We see it stated that the defalcation of Thomas C. Hunt, late receiver of public moneys at Natchitoches, is ascertained to be $85,000. The government will probably sustain no loss as the securities are perfectly responsible.

In ten years, from 1850 to 1860, the city of Memphis has increased in population from 5280 to 35,000.

The New York and West India Steamship Company has been organized. They are to run a regular line of steamers between New York and Kingston, Jamaica. They expect to despatch the first vessel before the end of this month.

Wisconsin has reduced the legal rate of interest from 12 per cent to 10 per cent, and allows two years for the redemption of lands which have been sold out on mortgages.

A letter from Pernambuco mentions the death of Col. W. W. Stapp, United States Consul at that port, on the 8th of April of yellow fever.

On the morning of the 12th inst., a serious accident occurred to the train proceeding to St. Louis, on the Belleville Railroad, by which serious injury was done to about thirty persons, mostly citizens of St. Clair county, Mo., and some of them residents of Belleville. The accident was occasioned by the displacement of a switch, in consequence of which, notwithstanding the unflinching efforts of the Engineer, the locomotive, tender, baggage car, and one passenger car tumbled down an embankment fifteen feet high. The Engineer was terribly scalded, and no hopes of his recovery were entertained at last accounts.

The Postmaster-General announces that after to-day the California mails from this city will cease to be carried via Havana and the Isthmus of Panama. In the absence of legislation by Congress to maintain this mail route, the department does not feel authorized to make further temporary provision to keep it up.

Pensacola and Montgomery Railroad.—The Pensacola Observer says that forty miles of the Florida end of this road is complete and is running order; and that by the 4th of July it will all be done to the Florida line. It is expected, farther, that by the 1st of November twenty-five miles of track will be laid down from the State line towards Montgomery.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The news from Europe, received since our last issue, is quite interesting. We give a brief summary as follows:

Great Britain.

Both Houses of Parliament had reassembled after the recess. Ministers submitted to both Houses the correspondence in full in reference to the late negotiations in China. The correspondence gives full particulars of the ultimatum and the Chinese reply. The ultimatum demanded the restoration of the guns and ships lost on that occasion, the ratification without delay of the Tien Sin treaty at Pekin, and an indemnity of 1,000,000 taels for military expenses for the Canton affair.

The Chinese reply refuses an apology for the Peiho matter; declines to allow an ambassador to go to Pekin, maintaining, that as the place of ratification instead of Pekin, refuses to restore the guns and ships or consider the payment of an indemnity, and refers Mr. Bruce to the regulations carried out at the reception of the American mission. These papers dispel all hope of an amicable settlement, and accordingly we find that the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave notice in the Commons that he would introduce a bill appropriating an additional sum of £500,000 to carry on the war with China. Lord John Russell in reply to a question, denied that the Government intended to postpone the Reform bill till next session. Lord Palmerston said that the Government intended to furnish a necessary number of ships to survey the North seas in connection with the project of laying another submarine Atlantic telegraph cable, via Iceland to America. A company is organized to run steamships between England and India, via the Cape of Good Hope, within 45 days. A furious gale had prevailed all around the English coast. It was severely felt at Liverpool, where it inflicted considerable damage on the shipping. On the eastern coast it was very severe. Eight vessels went down at Yarmouth and forty or fifty lives were lost. The steamship Great Eastern which was to have left Southampton on the 9th inst., for New York, we now learn will not leave before the 23d. (Saturday next.)

France.—The news from France is not of much importance. M. Fould, Minister of State, had been making a speech at an agricultural meeting in which he extolled the moderation of the Emperor, and predicted peace and prosperity from his policy. The Paris Monitour has published another article, asserting the most peaceable intentions of the Emperor Napoleon. The London Times says the article belies itself. Prince Jerome Bonaparte, uncle of the Emperor, was in a dying condition at last accounts. The Emperor and Empress had gone to Lyons to meet the Dowager Empress of Russia. It is reported that the French expedition to China will take possession of, and occupy various forts of the coast during the war.

Spain.—At the opening of the Cortes on the 25th ult., the Queen referred to the satisfactory settlement of the Morocco war, and pronounced the relations with all powers satisfactory. It is stated that Don Juan of Bourbon has published a manifesto, in which he asserts his claim to the Spanish throne, by the abdication of his brother (the Count de Montemolina); but he does not intend to use force to obtain it.

Naples and Sicily.—It is now confirmed that Garibaldi and his forces, after a desperate fight outside the walls of Palermo, in which he completely entered the royal troops, entered the town triumphantly, and in the name of "Victor Emanuel, King of Italy" assumed the Dictatorship in Sicily. It appears by the latest accounts that the Neapolitan troops at Palermo had capitulated to Garibaldi and that the evacuation of the forts from which they had bombarded the city was to commence on the 4th inst. It is reported that the King of Naples has refused to ratify the conditions of the capitulation. Great agitation prevailed in the Court and Ministry at Naples in consequence of stirring news received from Sicily. Ministers tendered their resignation on the 29th ult.

It is said that the Neapolitan Minister at Rome has been summoned to Naples for the purpose of forming a new ministry.—Accounts of insurrectionary movements reach us from all parts of Sicily, and, accordieg to the London Times, since the fall of Palermo, Garibaldi is master of the island.

Mexico.—The news from Mexico is decidedly unfavorable to the Liberal party, and indicates the breaking up of the Juarez Cabinet, and the speedy disappearance of the party. The defeat and total route of the Liberal army under General Uraga at Guadalajara is confirmed, and it is added that Uraga, who was severely wounded, did not escape, as before stated, but fell into the hands of the enemy. It also appears that the Liberal forces in Oajaca have been beaten by Cobos, and driven out of the State.

Austria.—It is reported that the Austrian Army in Italy is to be concentrated in the quadrilateral fortresses.

Sardinia.—The Sardinian Chamber of Deputies has, by a vote of 225 to 33, approved the treaty ceding Savoy and Nice to France. Twenty-three members abstained from voting.

Prussia.—Prince Regent, in speaking during railway ceremonies, said that Prussia would not permit an inch of German ground to be lost to Germany.

Russia.—Advice from St. Petersburg state that the proposed measures for the emancipation of serfs have finally been adopted by a majority of the Assembly of Deputy Nobles.

Turkey.—It is reported that France and Russia have answered the last communication of the Porte, in reference to the numerous complaints made by Christians in Turkey, in their answer they allow the Porte a certain specified time to inquire into the nature of these sufferings. In the British House of Commons recently Lord John Russell said that the Sultan, by the request of Austria, Prussia and England, was instituting an inquiry into the condition of Christians in Turkey, and that France sided with Russia in defending the latter's proposition.

Japan.—Late San Francisco papers contain important details respecting the late attack on the Emperor or Tycoon of Japan. It is confirmed that he was attacked by some of his subjects while going to the palace, but not killed. The latest accounts say that he was improving, and would perhaps recover.

Miscellaneous.—Referring to the approaching visit of the Prince of Wales to Canada, the London Star says: It has been determined, in order to give a greater eclat and importance to the visit of the Prince, that His Royal Highness shall not only be attended by a Secretary of State, as representing the Crown but by her Majesty's first great officer of the household, and one who has been a Lord Lieutenant of Ireland—thus, to a certain extent, representing the Queen herself. The presence of those important State functionaries with the young Prince will give such a constitutional sanction to all the public acts of his Royal Highness, as will almost endow them with the same importance as if performed by the Sovereign in person." The Ottawa (Canada) Citizen says that it is intended that the corner-stone of the Parliament buildings in Ottawa shall be laid by the Prince.

CITY NEWS.

Dr. Delery, President of the Board of Health, on the 13th inst., made the gratifying announcement that "there has not been a single case of Yellow Fever, either in private practice or in the Charity Hospital, during the present year."

On the 13th inst. a fire broke out among the cotton under a large shed in yard No. 2 of the Orleans Cotton Press. The shed, two thousands bales of cotton, and some valuable new machinery for compressing cotton, were destroyed. Loss estimated at $115,000 and covered by insurance. It is said that there are good reasons for believing that the fire was the work of an incendiary.

In the First District Court, on the 14th inst., Eugene Pepo, alias Ademe, convicted of the murder of Michael Dedinger, was sentenced by Judge Hunt to be hanged on such day as the Governor shall appoint.

Matthew Hues, the policeman who was convicted of the murder of young Henry Hymns, on Circus St., at midnight on the 4th of November last, was hung on Friday, 15th inst., inside the walls of the Parish prison. He made a full confession, charging his crime to the baneful effects of over-indulgence in intoxicating liquors.

The work on the City Railroad in Canal Street has been suspended, the contractors as well as the public generally, not approving of the provision requiring the track to be laid within ten feet of the gutter, and hoping that the City Council will revise the Ordinance in that respect, and grant authority for laying the track on the neutral ground, by which all obstruction to travel and traffic on the street will be avoided and the dangers of collision between the innumerable carriages that continually dash along that fashionable thoroughfare will be greatly lessened. We learn from the Delta that the purchasers of the right of way for the city railroads have organized a corporation with a capital of a million of dollars to carry out this great work. The Delta says "the stock of the company was promptly taken by new capitalists, and without solicitation or canvassing. The company will hold the right to twenty-four miles of railroad, and with the extent of their resources will proceed to lay down the whole extent of their contract." The Picayune says "as soon as the fall opens the contractors will put on a force which will ensure the completion of the entire work on the five roads, by the 1st of July, 1861. They contemplate the complete equipment of at least two squares per day along the square block pavement. When contractors for block stone pavement are at work on this route, the railroad track will be built simultaneously. We understand that a probability exists of the main road being extended at no distant day through Jefferson City."

Mayor Stith administered the oath of office to J. T. Monroe, the newly elected Mayor, on Monday. He has appointed Mr. Marion C. Baker, late Reporter of the Delta, his Secretary. No other appointments have been announced.

The Board of Health reports 197 death in the city during the week ending the 17th inst.

Both Boards of the City Council met on Monday evening 18th inst., for the purpose of organization. Mr. Nixon was chosen President of the Board of Aldermen and Mr Bakewell President of the Board of Assistant Aldermen.

A sad gloom has spread over the city by the announcement of the sudden disappearance of Mr. Charles M. Waterman, ex-Mayor. He left his residence on St. Peter St. on Thursday evening, 14th inst., since which time nothing has been seen or heard of him. The Crescent remarks "It will pain the community to know that since Mr. Waterman's disappearance, facts previously unknown to his brothers, sustaining the presumption that under the depressing influence of ill health, and of despondency from other causes, have come to light showing, partially at least, that he meditated self-destruction."

The amount of private subscription to the Fourth District Water Works, $100,000, having been raised, and the underwriters of the city being under a pledge to subscribe a like amount, all that remains to piece this great and most necessary public establishment on a secure basis, is for the city to subscribe the amount which the Legislature charter of the company authorizes. We learn from the Delta that this proposition was to come before the City Council at its meeting last night.

On Saturday last, 16th instant, a number of friends of Mayor Stith assembled at the Mayor's Office, on the occasion of the presentation to him of a magnificent set of silver ware, gotten up at the expense of about a thousand dollars, by some gentlemen for the purpose. In reply to Thomas E. Adams, Esq., who presented the plate in behalf of the subscribers, and who complimented the Mayor upon his administration, and upon the many qualities that have gained him so many staunch friends. The Mayor acknowledged the handsome compliment paid him, in some brief remarks uttered with much feeling. Altogether the meeting was quite a pleasant affair.

Since our last issue the weather has been very warm, although the heat has occasionally been tempered by cool breezes. The health of the city continues good. Business is at a low ebb. Many of our citizens have started on summer excursions, and many more are preparing to go. Meanwhile the can't-get-aways have undisputed possession of the city.

COMMERCIAL.

Business in our general market has been of quite a moderate character, since the date of our last report, and in Cotton we have noticed unusual dulness and depression during a portion of the week. Sugar has been in fair request but operations have been restricted by limited supplies and advancing prices. We have noticed a dull market for Flour, but an active demand for Corn, and moderate transactions in Provisions, for which prices have been very well sustained. Freights and exchange have been firm though without much animation.

COTTON.—With respect to prices, we have to remark that the market closed very heavy and unsettled and prices were too irregular to admit of quotations for the lower grades.

The receipts at this port since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the ar

COMMUNING.

In those blest hours "where spirits blend,
And friend holds fellowship with friend,"
On wing of thought I soar away,
And wander where the absent stray.
There oft from sunny South-land comes,
On daylyrd laden with perfume
Of orange groves and fragrant tree,
Greetings of love and joy to me.

In that calm hour when nature wakes
From night's repose, and morning takes
Her jewel drops to scatter o'er
The forest top and mossy floor—
When the blithe song-bird mounts to sing,
In joyous notes, his matin hymn;
Then takes my soul its wing to rise,
And bear me on to other skies.

And when death golden clouds at eve,
The light of earth doth gently leave
Nature, all draped in twilight grey,
Silently waiting close of day,
I list to catch, soft and low,
Of voices, far away, I know,
That tell of spirit ties that bind,
In sweet communion, mind with mind.

What though our paths are distant now?
What though we gaze not on the brow
Of friend or kindred yet our own?
Together we shall meet at Home,
And in its portals all shall know
The parted ones of long ago,
There evermore to join the band
Gathered within the spirit-land.

BY FANNY SHELDON.

Chapter V.

"Angry words, oh, let them never
From the tongue unbridled slip.
May the heart's best impulse ever
Check them ere they soil the lip."

On entering her mother's room she found her cheerful, though all alone, for little Mary had grown weary and laid down by her mother to rest. Mrs. Elwin had drawn her little cherub face near her own, and by passing her hand gently through the clustering curls had thus beguiled her to slumber, for indeed the darling child had endeavored to keep her little bo-peeps wide open, for "mamma would be lonely," she said, "if Mary went to sleep, and left her all alone."

"I hope you have not been lonely, mamma," said Alline, after she had seen her little baby sister comfortably to rest in her little crib bed.

"No, my child, for our minister called, and spent an hour with me. He no doubt fully merits the many flattering encomiums that have been lavished upon him. His demeanor is mild and pleasant, his conversation earnest and chaste, and such as will render him a valued friend as well as a beloved pastor."

"I am glad you are pleased with him, mamma, and hope he will call to see you often. I have often thought, dear mother," she said, as she seated herself by the low couch of the sufferer, "how much pleasure it would give you if you could go out into the quiet old woods and witness the freshness of all things this beautiful spring weather, for I know you would admire the works of God and humbly thank and love him for all his goodness to us and others. I have often thought, mother, of the pure and good life of those who live for others, and not themselves; this life, with all its trials and anguish, joy and pleasure, is soon passed, and if we have been useful to others and have caused joy and happiness to those around us, how thankful and peaceful must be the close of our lives. A minister, if he fulfil his duties faithfully, must be among the blessed ones of earth; if they keep themselves unspotted from the world, they should be filled with peace."

Mrs. Elwin gazed into Alline's face with fond affection, and sought to read the heart of her patient, trusting child aright. When she had ceased speaking, she laid her hand gently on Allina's head, and murmured, "My good child, may your trusting faith continue with you always," and then, in an inaudible tone of voice, she continued, "It is sometimes all that is left us in this world."

Edgar Glanville, the young minister, had been in the village but a few days; yet he had been intent on finding out those of his congregation who were, from sickness or suffering, unable to attend divine service on Sabbath; he felt these had the first claim on his care and attention, as his mission was peculiarly adapted to such as these; thus had he found his way to the home of Mrs. Elwin.

A few days after the events which have been thus described, as Alline was sitting in her little parlor, her spirits more than usually depressed, her heart sad and gloomy with forebodings of the future, and many an anxious fear for her mother, which only the holy, genial influence of religion could soothe or render endurable, she was interrupted by the entrance of Anna Leslie.

"Good morning, Alline. I have not seen you lately, and should have thought your mother's health was much worse, to closely have you kept yourself; but I heard you were out the entire evening one day last week, and that since then you have been entertaining young gentlemen with so much success that you have acquired quite a reputation for agreeableness."

"What do you mean, Anna? I really do not understand you. I entertain young gentlemen! You cannot believe this, for you know mamma's health has prevented me from receiving company for some time; and had I been so inclined, there are many who, like yourself, think Alline Elwin too poor in her altered circumstances to seek her society but with an unkind purpose to wound her feelings, and add one more drop to the cup already so full."

"Well, do not get angry, for indeed I heard that Mr. Glanville had called and spent an evening very agreeably, and that he had repeated his visits frequently. We have all conceded to yield you the prize, for there is not your equal in piety and consistency among us."

"Anna, you do not believe me capable of what you accuse me, and this ironical way of speaking to me is not only unkind but insulting. You know that I am incapable of trying to win the attentions of any one, or to attract notice by a display of my religious feelings. You are indeed greatly mistaken, or you have come here this morning purposely to irritate and wound my feelings. I know not why this should be, but it is most certainly the case, or you are grievously mistaken. I have never seen Mr. Glanville at all. He did call once last week, but I was not at home; he spent an hour by my mother's sick bed, and has not as yet repeated his visit. I should have saved myself the trouble of explanation, as I deem those who have uttered such ridiculous reports and the reports themselves as beneath all notice; for, living within my own home almost entirely, I have learned to care little for the opinion of those who are indifferent to me, and love for those I know to be my enemies."

"It seems strange, Alline, that you should have been absent on this particular evening when you must have known that he would call, for Ellen Carlton told me he had sent a message to that effect that day. Your business from home must have been urgent indeed to have induced you to have lost so good an opportunity of making a favorable impression; he must have thought you very neglectful of your duty to have left your mother when so ill all alone."

"Anna, I care little what he or any one else may think of my feelings or actions. I am accountable to no one but my God for these, and question the right of any one to interfere with them. I see you are anxious to know how and where I spent that evening, though I cannot tell in what is concerns you to know. Suffice it to you that it was spent with a friend, and in trying to comfort and soothe a heart that your imprudence or direct unkindness had wounded and distressed almost past endurance."

"Ah, indeed! and who could this have been? I am not conscious of having offended any friend of Alline Elwin's."

"Anna, this conversation has lasted long enough. I am weary, and must attend to the wants of my mother; so you will please excuse me now."

"You are excusable, Miss Elwin. I know of whom you spoke just now, but really I was not aware that you were a friend of Miss West, or I should certainly have been more cautious how I spoke of her, and perhaps I should not have thought of influencing my brother from so desirable an alliance."

Alline had tried to control her temper, and to be as composed as possible during this unwelcome visit; but as soon as she found herself alone, her bosom heaved with suppressed emotion, and tears of bitter anguish began to fall over her pale face as she exclaimed:

"I had thought that my home would have been at least sacred from the intrusion of such as these. I did not believe that any one would seek me here at the couch of my dying mother to afflict and distress me. But, oh, God! give me strength to bear with patience and resignation all that it may be my portion through life to endure."

Children's Column.

QUASHY QUANDO.

Let me lay a detaining hand upon the skirts of the fast-retreating past, and chronicle a few of the sayings and doings of Quashy Quando.

Of my hero's parentage and ancestry I can say nothing, for they are involved in obscurity as black as his own skin; in this connection his biographer can only vouch to two facts—viz., that his birth-place was the Guinea Coast of Africa, and that he had a mother; for in his softer moments old Quashy would often tell of the hot summer morning when his "mammy," placing a calabash in his hand, bade the little naked urchin bring her some cool water from the spring; and how he, hastening upon his errand, reached the fountain, stooped, and was about to dip his gourd in the clear water, when he started at the sight of a fierce bearded face reflected up into his own, and turned to find himself in the grasp of a kidnapper.

"Poor old mammy done wait long'nough for dat yere oal'bash o' water!" Quashy would add, with a sigh, as he finished the simple story.

Brought across the ocean, the little fellow (who had been upon the passage treated more as a plaything than a slave) was sold to the head of a New England family (for this was while slavery was tolerated at the North), who bestowed upon him the name of Julius Cæsar; but whether from doubt of his own ability to support this illustrious cognomen, or from attachment to the name of his infancy, the wild little barbarian would never reply to either command, summons, or request made in this name, but would sit or stand staring at vacancy with a stolid expression of indifference on his unconth features, or at most with a sullen twich of the shoulders, defying alike coercion or flattery. But let the summons be changed to "Quashy," and the perverse little creature would spring to obey with pleased alacrity. So the point was finally conceded; and although the experiment was occasionally renewed during the course of his long life, it was always with the same result.

Quashy did not love work, and infinitely preferred basking at full length in the July sun to hoeing corn. This peculiarity occasionally brought him into difficulty; on one occasion was made the subject of severe comment by his master, who was a physician in good practice. Quashy listened patiently to the lecture, and when it was finished asked, dryly.

"Work so good for nigger, why no good for white man? Why you no work massa?".

"I! I do work, Quashy—I work hard."

"What work you do, massa? you no hoe corn."

"No, I don't hoe corn; but I work, Quashy—I do head work," replied the good-natured Doctor.

"Head-work—oh yes, I know him; he berry hard tink," suggested the other, with a look of intelligence; and shouldering his hoe, marched off to his labors.

Later in the day my ancestor returning from his round of visits, passed his corn-field, and beheld Quashy seated on a great stone, his chin resting on his two palms, ruminating in the full heat of the noontide sun.

"Hillo, you lazy fellow!" shouted the Doctor. "Why ain't you at work?"

"Am, massa, hard to work; doin' head-work."

"Head-work, you fool! What head-work are you doing!"

"Tell'ee, massa. See dem two blackbirds on big apple-tree?"

"Yes, I see them, boy."

"Well massa, I tinkin' 'pose I trow 'tone an' kill one bird. how many bird be lef' on tree. "'Pose massa can tell right off?"

"Certainly you simpleton. There would be one left. Couldn't you tell that for yourself?"

"Hi! hi! hi!" laughed Quashy, rolling on the ground in ecstasy. "Poor nigger do head-work better dan white gemman! Dere be none lef', massa, 'couse t'oder fly away!"

Some years later, Quashy, returning from the field one evening, was informed by Venus, the black cook, that Miss Patty had got a bean, and that they were "sparking" in the "square room."

"'Pose you kerry in dis yer urmful of wood, Quash," tinued she, "an'take a look ot the gemman?"

Quashy accepted the errand, and after a short absence returned to the kitchen with an approving expression on his broad black face.

"Berry good-lookin' young massa," reported he.—"What he name, Venus?"

"Dat him? Now, Venus, dis nigger is tickled—tickled mos' a dot to tink de Lord get ooo o' massa children, for I swear I 'frald de debbil get all 'e rea' li'."

Another of Quashy's witticisms was perpetrated upon a brother of his master's, one of those orefless genial individuals, nobody's enemy but their own, who usually win more love than respect from their inferiors and dependents.

This gentlemen standing in his door-way one day observed Quashy staggering by with a great bag upon his back, and evidently a little the worse for liquor.

"Hillo, Quashy, what have you got in your bag that makes you reel about the streets so? What's your load?"

"Load, Massa Billy," repeated Quashy, without looking up or pausing, "load 'nough for sartin, but 'taint nuffin you need begrutch to ao ole nigger; 'taint nuffin but rheumaty an' poverty, and you got heaps o' dem yer a'ready."

Another of Quashy's repartees was at the expense of a certain Judge Payne, a gentleman more celebrated for the fortiter in re than the suaviter in modo.

Standing on the steps of the court-house in company with some other lawyers, the judge was saluted by Quashy, who was passing, with the query:

"How you do, Massa Payno; tell an ole nigger what'n de las' news goin'?"

"News?" growled the judge, surlily; "news is that the devil's dead."

"Ah, is dat so? Dead, poor fellow; well I know he been in Payne dis long time, but I nebber know he dead," remarked Quashy, with an air of great concern, as he passed quietly on.

SOLID OIL IN THE SHAPE OF COAL.

We have been favored with a small specimen of coal from the neighborhood of Cairo station, Ritchie county, Virginia, on the North-western Virginia Railroad, which is of a peculiar quality. It has been tested by various chemists, and has been found to be as it were crystalized mineral oil, being without stratification, and free from any foreign substance. The tests have shown that it will yield one hundred and sixty-five gallons of crude oil to the ton. After one refining process eighty-two per cent. of refined oil was obtained; after a second distillation, sixty-one per cent of the whole amount was obtained in pure oil, and thirty per cent. of lubricating oil and paraffine. By taking a portion of the coal and laying it on a hot stove or shovel, its extraordinary quality is obvious. It melts and runs like wax.

We learn by the latest arrivals from the oil region, that a Pittsburg company has commenced pumping one of the finest wells yet opened. The firm is Phillips, Frew & Co., and their location is on the Alleghany river, seven miles above Franklin, and nearly opposite the mouth of Oil Creek. The principal vein was struck at a depth of 199 feet, and at last accounts the yield was forty-two barrels of pure oil, of a superior quality, every twenty-four hours. Judge McCalmount, of Franklin, after visiting all the best wells yet opened, and witnessing the operation of this one, expressed the opinion that it was decidedly the best discovery yet made.

THE TURKISH QUESTION.

No one who has watched the condition of the Turkish Empire during the last four years can have doubted that the time must shortly come when its affairs would once more engage the attention of Europe. All that the last war effected was to preserve the actual territory of the Sultan from the grasp of Russia; it changed nothing, reestablished nothing, made no reconciliations between rival creeds, gave no securities for justice on the part of the rulers, and weakened in no way the animosities of the governed. The Sultan has gained something by the weakning of his antagonist; Sebastopol has been dismantled, the Black Sea Fleet destroyed, and Russia is bound by treaty to advance no farther than the Pruth, and has given up her Protectorate over Servia. But, on the other hand the Mussulmans have lost their fleet, their army which it took so many years to create has been sadly diminished, the credit of the State is hardly sufficient for another loan the ruling race is discouraged, and would undergo anything rather than invite again the assistance of its Western allies, while the Christians, both Catholic and Greek, are more than ever emboldened to throw off the authority of their masters.

It may be that what seems a decay is in reality but progress, that the best thing that can happen is for the Turkish domination to pass away, and be succeeded by a community of more active and civilized Christians care. It has been announced that at St. Petersburg the principal members of the Diplomatic Corps, with the exception of the Turkish Minister, were a few days since convoked by Prince Gortschakoff, who declared that the position of the Christians in Turkey had become so intolerable that Russia was on the point of addressing strong representations to the Porte in favor of them, and hoped to obtain the assent of the other Powers. Such a move on the part of the late adversary of the Sultan is certainly not without its importance.

THE LAST POPE.

The following may be brought under the by no means novel caption of "Curious if true:"

There is, and has been for years, a curious tradition in regard to Pius the Ninth should he be the last Pope and in illustration of this, I will repeat an anecdote related to me by a friend of mine. Several years ago, in the Pontificate of Gregory XVI., this gentleman was in the Cathedral of Sienna, looking on the busts of the Popes that are placed, after their deaths, in a niche devoted to that purpose. Two empty niches then remained.

"Why," said my friend, "there is only room for two more busts; you will have to make some niches for those of the future Popes."

"O no, signore," replied the cicerone, "they say that after these two we shall never have any other Popes."

Gregory's bust now stands in one of these niches; the other is still empty.

STARTLING PHENOMENON.—On Saturday night, March 10th, a phenomenon occurred over Drogheda, Philadelphia, which for some time struck with the deepest terror those who happened to be outside doors. The moon shone out clearly, the atmosphere was calm, and the sky was dotted over with stars, when, about nine o'clock, a rumbling noise was heard above, and suddenly the heavens seemed to cleave asunder, when a ball of fire, the most brilliant that fancy could imagine, rolled along the blue vault, and appeared to descend with the most fearful rapidity. For a few seconds the entire town was lighted up so intensely that many females shrieked, some fainted, and others ran off the streets breathless and in the greatest trepidation into the nearest shops. Any thing of the kind was never known here before. It was a length of time before parties who had sought refuge in their fright could be persuaded to return to their homes.

A CASE OF MONSTROUS CRIME.—The men Kirby, who killed his father and brother in Pickens county, Ala., about one year ago, was recently tried at the Fayette county Circuit Court, and convicted of murder and sentenced to be hung on the 16th of June. After the commission of the horrid crime, it may be remembered, he fled towards Mississippi, and being pursued was come up with at a house, where he had stopped for the night, near Starkeville, Miss. He fled the house, and, gaining the bushes, attempted to commit suicide by cutting his own throat, which he had nearly done. His moans attracted his pursuers to the spot where they found him nearly lifeless from the loss of blood. By medical attention he was resuscitated, and cured of his wounds, and now the law is about to be vindicated in taking the life which he failed to wrest from the gallows by self-destruction.

The last meeting of the Methodist Conference of Providence was remarkable for the presence of a very unusual number of old Methodists, both preachers and laymen. Rev. Mr. Snelling was there, who saw Washington and Hancock at their last meeting. He assisted in carrying the table to Boston Common and placing it under the Old Elm, that the celebrated Jessie Lee might stand on it while preaching. Father Snelling is the only survivor of the first Methodist class formed in Boston. There, too, was the venerable Rev. Daniel Webb, who, at the ripe age of eighty-two, is still on the effective list. He is probably the oldest Methodist preacher still engaged in the regular duties of the effective minister. And the lady were headed by William Pearce, of Bristol, who entertained Bishop Coke on his last visit to this country.

Tribute of Respect.

Resolutions passed by the Quarterly Conference for Cayuga Circuit, Mississippi Conference:

Whereas, In the providence of God he hath taken from our midst our beloved brother, JAMES S. WINTERS; therefore, be it, resolved,

1st. That we mourn his loss as a steward to the Church, and as an active, benevolent, and useful member of this Quarterly Conference, imbued with charity and liberality, and as one whose loss will not only be felt by this Quarterly Conference but by the community at large.

2d. That the community in which he lived has lost a good citizen, a kind neighbor, and a true friend.

3d. That we condole with his family in their bereavement.—He was an affectionate husband, a kind and indulgent father, and a good master, and to those dependent on him his loss cannot be repaired.

D. A. J. PARKER, President.

S. O. CAPERS, Secretary.

MRS. NANCY SPANE was born and raised in Richmond county, North Carolina. Moved to Mississippi at the age of 20, in 1812. Died in Yazoo county, Miss., on the 19th of April, 1860. Mrs. Spane had been for many years a member of the Presbyterian Church. She died in peace, and we hope our loss is her eternal gain.

F. M. FEATHERSTON.

MRS. NANCY FAITH died on the 6th of May, 1860, in Carroll parish, La., in the 55th year of her age. She made a profession of religion in early life, and joined the M. E. Church, and was a uniform Christian without guile. It was her misfortune to lose her companion fifteen years since, which forced her from woman's retirement. In her new sphere she exhibited a high order of mind, in all things was tempered by religion, and came to be a woman of marked ability. A kind and loving mother, a tender hearted mistress, an excellent neighbor, and an ornament to Christianity. She died as she lived, in the true faith. She leads her children, friends, and servants a long adieu, and soared to realms above.

W. G. M.

MRS. ELIZABETH YOUNG died on the 24th of May, 1860. She was the daughter of Snowden Kirkland; was born in Wilkes county, Ga., April 8th, 1818; joined the Methodist Episcopal Church at the age of 20 years; was married to Mr. Archibald Young, May 24th, 1835; and just 25 years after, died in the Lord. Her death was triumphant; her end was peace.

Shreveport, La., May 25, 1860.

MRS. EMILY STOCKMAN died in Ouachita county, Arkansas, May 29th, 1860. She was born August 9th, 1809, in the State of Georgia, and when a child her father removed to Alabama. She was married in Alabama to Mr. Henry B Stockman, who survives her. They emigrated several years ago to Arkansas, and lived in the community where she died. Mrs. S. made an early profession of religion; joined the M. E. Church, and for forty years sustained an unblemished, Christian reputation. As a wife, mother, mistress, and neighbor, she was a worthy example. For several months previous to her departure she was the subject of painful affliction, but patiently suffered the will of God. Her last hours was a season of holy triumph. Death had no sting, and her redeemed spirit triumphantly ascended to the "palace of angels and God."

MRS PRISCILLA LEAVEL, consort of T. T. Leavel, died at Goodman, Miss., June 9th, 1860, in the triumphs of faith, and satisfactory assurance of her acceptance with God, in whom she put her trust; and is safely housed in Heaven, through the atoning blood and merits of Jesus Christ her dear Savior.

T. T. LEAVEL.

MRS. PRISCILLA VAUGHAN, wife of Robert S. Vaughan, Esq., died in the parish of West Feliciana, La., 11th May, 1860, in the 50th year of her age. Gentle, quiet, true and faithful in all the relations of life, her memory is blessed. She was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, thirty-five years, and adorned the doctrine of God her Savior. Her final affliction was protracted and severe. She bore it patiently, trusting in the Lord. When about to die, she had the servants called from the field, and exhorted them one by one to meet her in heaven. She bade her husband, and family and neighbors farewell with appropriate remarks, and messages to each one, in reference to their salvation; and then arranging things as if for a pleasant journey, she fell asleep in Jesus. We should bless the Lord for the knowledge of such a life and such a death.

MRS. CHARITY PEAVY, wife of Michael Peavy, died at Cottage Hill, near Mobile, on the 27th of April, 1860, after a short illness. She was the daughter of Emory and Charlotte Odam; born on the 18th of January, 1830; married on the 20th of January, 1848; joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in 1854, of which she continued an exemplary member until her death. Her death was so sudden and unexpected, and her disease of such a character, that but little conversation was held with her in regard to the state of her mind. In what she said, however, she gave evidence of a firm confidence in the merits of her Redeemer.

R. SPENCER.

MRS. RARITY DUNN died in pence, at the residence of Thomas Lemuel Lewis, in Marion county, Mississippi, April 10th, 1860, in the 58th year of her age. She was the daughter of Benjamin and Celia Ann Lewis, born in Lenoir county, North Carolina, January 28th 1802. She was married to Needham Barfield; embraced religion, joined the Methodist church, and lived a consistent member until death. About the year 1831 she, with her husband, emigrated to Hinds county, Miss., where she lived until she became a widow the second time. She often expressed a willingness to depart and be with Christ. She was an affectionate step-mother, an obedient wife, and one of the best of neighbors, and a devoted christian.

MISS MILDRED M. WERPINGER died on the 3rd inst., at her father's residence, near Gloucelle, Miss. She had not embraced religion up to the time of her sickness. During her affliction she constantly sought and obtained peace with God. A few days before she died she called her parents, brothers and sisters, and the friends present to her bedside, and exhorted them to meet her in heaven. She died in great peace. I have rarely witnessed a more triumphant death. Her affliction was long and severe, but she has gone where

No chilling winds nor poisonous breath
Can reach that happy shore,
Sickness and sorrow, pain and death,
Are felt and feared no more.

PROGRESS OF PROTESTANTISM IN MISSISSIPPI AND THE SOUTH-WEST.—No. XX.

Mr. Editor—I think we may learn lessons of useful instruction by briefly tracing the history of some of the early Methodist preachers of Mississippi and Louisiana. While we shall find much worthy of admiration and imitation, we shall find some things to regret and even censure. In we will not find fault with them merely for the sake of variety in our sketches, nor to gratify a fault-finding disposition. Our object shall be to trace the disastrous effects back to their producing cause, that we may see, in order to avoid them. We have stated already that Moses Floyd was the second Methodist Missionary that came to Mississippi. I think he was raised in Georgia, where he entered the traveling connection in 1800, and was appointed in charge of a circuit called Richmond, with Moses Black as his colleague. In 1801 he seems to have traveled a circuit in North Carolina, and in 1802 somewhere in the Holston country, within the bounds of the Western Conference. But it is extremely difficult, and in many instances impossible, to locate the circuits of those days from the names by which they are called in the printed minutes. It is a misfortune to posterity, that so many of them were named after obscure creeks or something else, not known on the maps of the country. Wherever it can be done with propriety, our districts, circuits, and other pastoral charges, should be named after a city, county, or post town, or some place that can be found on an ordinary map. This would give them "a local habitation," as well as a name. It was perhaps late in 1802 that Tobias Gibson, our first Missionary, went in person to the Western Conference to solicit additional help for the Natchez country. Such were the sacrifices to be made, and the difficulties to be surmounted, in order to cultivate and extend this far off missionary field, that Bishop Asbury declined sending any one by the mere exercise of his Episcopal prerogative, but stated to the Conference that he wanted a suitable volunteer for the Natchez work. After some deliberation Moses Floyd offered, and was accepted. He was advanced to the order of Elders at the end of his third year, in view of being more fully prepared for his missionary work. As Tobias Gibson was now a superannuary, Mr. Floyd was placed in charge of the Natchez mission in 1803, and was continued in the same relation in 1804. But his race as a travelling preacher in Mississippi was short, and his after life was strongly marked with care, and toil, and disappointment. He had not been long in the country before he made a matrimonial engagement with Miss Hannah Griffing, daughter of John Griffing, Esq., and on the maternal side a descendant of Rev. Samuel Swayze, heretofore mentioned as the first Protestant minister in the country. Miss Griffing is represented as having been beautiful in person when young, deeply pious, and every way worthy and well qualified to be the wife of a minister. But Mr. Floyd had fallen into bad health, was poor, and engaged in a calling which promised but little pecuniarily, which occasioned her father to take a firm stand against the consummation of the engagement, and as matters turned out afterwards, his parental feeling and forethought for the comfort and support of a favorite daughter was commendable. The young people, however, were not to be thwarted, and as Miss Griffing had attained the age of majority, they concluded to meet at the house of a friend and have their engagement completed. "Honor thy father and mother, that it may be well with thee, and thou mayest live long on the earth," is the first commandment with promise. But whether Miss Griffing's disrespect for the opinions of her parents in this matter, and violation of their wishes, was the precursor of her life of poverty and affliction, I will not venture to assert. That the young minister and his affianced were devotedly attached to each other there was sufficient evidence, and that they lived together ever after "in perfect love and peace," there was no doubt. No one out of the immediate family attached much blame to Mr. Floyd for getting married under the circumstances, but those in authority in the church thought that the supremacy of the disciplinary law which interdicts the marriage of "a Methodist preacher" to a woman without the consent of her parents, ought to be maintained, and accordingly suspended him from the exercise of his ministerial functions for a short time. He was however soon restored, and such was his prudence, and gentlemanly and Christian bearing, that he retained the confidence and affections of the people generally to the close of life. Mr. Floyd's educational advantages were above mediocrity, but whether he had studied medicine before he entered the ministry or not, I am not informed. He, however, entered upon its practice soon after his location, and thenceforward was known as Dr. Floyd. He settled for a short time at St. Albans, on Big Black, in Claiborne county, but soon thereafter removed with several families of the Griffings and settled in Prairie, Jefferson, in what is now Morehouse Parish, La. He remained there a number of years, cultivating a little farm, practicing medicine, and preaching as a local preacher. He was generally esteemed by the people in all his relations to them, but everything seemed to operate against his success in life. His constitution was feeble; the population of the few settlements in reach was sparse and poor, so that he realized but little from his profession; the country was now and very remote from commercial advantages, so that he found it impossible to keep up with the current expenses of a rapidly increasing family. Finally, the various interdicts laid on commerce during the war with England, so deranged all the finances of the country, especially in those remote settlements in northern Louisiana, that Dr. Floyd and several other families determined to return to Mississippi. He was not able to sell what little property he had acquired in the way of land and stock, but had to leave it in the care of a relative who died soon after, in consequence of which the property was alienated from the family, and ultimately became the source of a vexatious lawsuit, which was of very little advantage to the heirs.

Dr. Floyd came to the vicinity of Natchez, and engaged in teaching school and practicing his profession, first on Pine Ridge and afterwards in the city of Natchez, where, in 1814, he died from the effects of measles, leaving a wife and five children in a state of dependence on others for the necessaries of life. He was buried on the top of the hill in the old city burying ground, now just in the rear of the Cathedral, but his grave was not marked, and the most diligent search twenty years afterwards was not successful in identifying it. Doctor Floyd maintained his respectability as a consistent christian and minister to the end of life, and his death was much regretted, especially by the infant church in Natchez. My personal recollection of him is that he was very mild and affable in his intercourse with society, and his style of preaching was more doctrinal than pathetic. The history of no Methodist preachers family has ever made such an impression on my mind as that of Moses Floyd's. Mrs. Floyd was my mother's sister, which gave me an opportunity of knowing it in all its details. I presume, however, it would neither be interesting or profitable to your readers to rehearse the ever changing fortunes of her widowhood for thirty years after the death of her husband. From that sad event she was indeed "a stranger and pilgrim on earth," and had "no certain dwelling place." She lived some time in Natchez, awhile in the vicinity of her father's, near Selsertown, then in various outhouses and vacant tenements in Jefferson county, near her three married sisters, neither of whom were in a condition at that time to do much more than to supply her and her helpless family with shelter, food and raiment, and to assist in the education of her children. At a later period she returned, for a short time, to her former residence, in Prairie, Jefferson co., and afterwards lived awhile with her son-in-law, William Bolls, in Hempstead county, Arkansas. Finally, after all her children had grown up and left her, she found a home of peace and plenty in the family of her brother Rev. John Griffing, of Claiborne county, Mississippi, where a few years ago she closed her life of poverty and suffering in christian confidence. Through a long life of dependence and perpetual change, Mrs. Floyd maintained her christian integrity, and her position as a talented, influential, and useful member of the church. Like most of the members of her father's family, she was gifted in public prayer, and had a voice so sweet and pathetic, that it united into the soul like the most inspiring strains of sacred music. "By the sadness of the countenance the heart is made better," is the language of inspiration, and the sanctified afflictions of this good woman imparted to her that tenderness of heart that enabled her to weep with all who wept, and to rejoice with all who rejoiced in the Lord. She was a safe and useful counsellor for seekers of salvation and young christians generally. No one had more to do in leading me to a correct knowledge of our doctrines and discipline, and confirming me in the assurance of my interest in Christ, and urging me on in the "way of holiness," than aunt Floyd. This she did, not only by her sanctified conversation, but by loaning me books suited to my grade of knowledge and experience. I was converted alone in the woods, and before I had an opportunity of telling any of my fellow christians what great things the Lord had done for me, I was betrayed into the most perplexing doubts as to the genuineness of the work, and concluded to say nothing to any one about it. But a few searching questions from this "old disciple" defeated my situation, and a few words of explanation and exhortation led me "into the glorious liberty of the children of God." Aunt Floyd was theoretically and experimentally well posted on the doctrine of entire sanctification, and for more than twenty years before her death was an humble and modest professor of that state of grace. She seldom did more in the public assemblies of the church than make a short reference to this part of her christian experience, but in private circles, where she found earnest christians anxious to know the way by which the Lord had led her on, she would tell of the time and place where she lay prostrate under the power from on high," while she felt the Holy Ghost pervading her whole being, and diffusing throughout spirit, soul, and body the spirit of holiness and perfect love. While she was literally poor in earthly substance, she was rich in grace, and held her title to "an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for her." Notwithstanding my high appreciation of her christian character, I have long believed that there was a radical defect, or rather indiscretion in her family government. One of her five children died soon after her husband, leaving the remaining four, the eldest and youngest being daughters, as her all of earthly inheritance. It was very natural for her to dote on her children, and to place a high estimate on their gradually maturing physical and mental developments. She gave way to the motherly feeling that they were extra in the way of original smartness, and incautiously got into the habit of relating to visitors, in their presence, all their pert sayings and doings. This indiscretion of a fond mother never seemed to have any bad effect on the oldest daughter, but it evidently led her other children "to think more highly of themselves than they ought," so that by the time they were fifteen they were too self confident; and believing they had got quite in advance of their mother, threw off their allegiance to her to a great extent, so that the bitterest ingredient in her full cup of sorrow was the way her sons turned out in after life Salina Eunice, the eldest daughter, was one of the most exemplary girls I ever knew, being remarkable for her docility and gentleness of spirit. While growing up she was often for weeks together an inmate of my mother's family, and such was her faultless deportment, that I had accustomed myself to look on her as one of the most pure and innocent of human beings. I was greatly surprised when she was about sixteen to witness her flowing tears and deep sorrow for sin as she knelt at the altar of penitence and prayer, and to hear her incessant and bitter cry of "God be merciful to me a sinner." Up to that date I was in my native darkness of sin and unbelief, and it had never occurred to my mind that one apparently so innocent, could be esteemed a sinner. But the light of the Holy Spirit had revealed to her the pollution of her unrenewed heart, and made her feel that sin in all its forms and degrees is "exceeding sinful," and led her to groan for redemption in the blood of Christ. The hour of her deliverance soon came, and she was numbered among the happy young converts. It was witnessing the scenes of penitence through which she passed just before her happy conversion that proved the means of my awakening, and set me out on a course which, thanks be to God for his sustaining grace, I have been enabled to keep ever since. She was soon led to see that there was a higher state of grace for her to enjoy, and became very much interested in studying the scriptural theory of entire sanctification, and in seeking an experimental knowledge of "the great salvation." After seeing, like Hester Ann Rogers, what roots of bitterness remained in a heart not yet "cleansed from all unrighteousness," and wholly consecrated to God, and after an earnest struggle of several weeks, as she knelt one day in private prayer, these words of the Saviour were powerfully applied to her heart: "Now ye are clean through the word which I have spoken unto you. Abide in me, and I in you." With this came the evidence that "the blood of Christ had cleansed her from all sin," and that she was now wholly consecrated to God. Like her mother she was modest in professing this state of grace, but it was delightful in private circles to hear her tell every item of her experience on this point. She afterwards married William Bolls, a widower, and considerably her senior in years, but an excellent Christian man. Some years after their marriage they moved to Hempstead county, Arkansas, where Mr. Bolls died. I have understood the family met with pecuniary reverses, which left the widow almost in a state of destitution. I have never heard of her death, and the probability is she is yet alive. If so, it would afford me the greatest pleasure to meet her again on earth, and compare notes after we have been journeying heavenward for thirty-nine years. The youngest daughter, Lucinda Vernera, grew up to womanhood, and during her mother's last residence in Prairie, Jefferson, married a man by the name of Williams, and died in a few years. I trust she died a christian, though she had not given such evidences of experimental piety, as were manifest in her older sister.

Ubilieu Laoumi, the oldest son, was a wayward youth, and before the middle of life came to a tragical end. He seemed to become infatuated with the idea early in life that there was a fortune for him somewhere which he could gain without work, and he engaged in sundry wild speculations, some of them not at all creditable to himself, and deeply mortifying to his relatives. About the time he was fully grown he became deranged and wandered about the country in that state for some time. It gradually wore off, after which he engaged in blacksmithing, in Natchez. So far as I know, after this he had the reputation of being industrious and honest, though he kept at a great distance from religion. If he came to church at all it was to sit in the gallery or elsewhere remote from the pulpit, as though he were only an idle spectator. Whether she became addicted to drinking, or had a return of insanity I cannot tell; but about 1840, he became despondent in regard to all his earthly prospects, and deliberately contrived to blow out his brains, in his bedroom. This occurred somewhere in the vicinity of Natchez, where he was temporarily in charge of the plantation of some absentee. He never had a family, and died without hope; a sad end for a child of prayer, and the son of a Methodist preacher.

Advillo Ashury, the second son, never married, and though I do not know that he ever became outwardly vicious, he kept away from the Church, and became a sort of wild man of the woods on Bocuff River, in Louisiana, where he spent the last years of his life as a hunter and landjobber. It seemed to become a matter of indifference with him whether he lodged in or out of a house, whether he traveled a road or course; it through the woods, or whether he could ford or had to swim the stream in his way. The last time I ever saw him in our vicinity he came forward as a penitent for an interest in the prayers of the Church, and many and persevering were the prayers offered that day for the salvation of the son of our second Missionary to Mississippi. Whether he continued to seek or not I am not informed. He returned to his wilderness home on Bocuff River, where he soon afterwards died.

I hope your readers will excuse this long article. The history of Mr. Floyd's family has been one of sad, but profitable remembrance to me. What could have caused so much evil to overtake this once consecrated family? Uncle Floyd had admitted his divine call to the office and work of an Evangelist. He had, after sufficient time for mature deliberation, taken upon himself the vows of the holy christian ministry, vows which pledged him to the work as the main business of his life. Was it because he located and left the regular pastoral work that the hand of Providence seemed to be against him? How much worse would either himself or family have fared pecuniarily if he had remained in the regular work to the close of life? I will not attempt to answer these questions now: I may hereafter.

J. G. Jones.

THE STEPMOTHER.

BY LUTHA FONTELLE.

Judge Firmly and his wife drove round early to pass the morning with us. How admirably they were suited to each other! He is like the strong and noble pillar that supports the sheltering home; she, the blooming vine which adorns and brightens it. He is a gentleman of rare worth and purity of character. Ten years ago he won the flower of our parish, Ellen Grey, and with joyful pride made her mistress of his new and elegant villa.—No one murmured then at his choice, for they had loved each other from the days when they rode side by side to the country school-house. Their parents had removed, before the children entered upon their teens, from the same county of Virginia, to one of the richest parishes of Louisiana, and belonging, as they did, to the F. F. V.'s, were regarded as two of the most aristocratic families of the neighborhood, and nothing was considered more natural than that the manly, intellectual heir of one should wed the graceful, lovely heiress of the other. The years glided by, giving to their love and care a son and daughter. So satisfied was Richard Firmly with the quiet joys of home, that the lofty ambition that had filled his soul—that stirs more or less strongly, more or less purely, the soul of every thoughtful, energetic man, folded its strong pinions in his bosom, and slumbered there. His father sighed as he saw all his brilliant gifts, which had been cultivated with great care, confined to so narrow a sphere of action. But his talents were not buried; they were not idle. As far as his efforts extended, he left nothing incomplete. He had borne off the highest honors at college, and not only those. Never was student more warmly loved, and, at the same time, honored by his class mates. Never did one win the fuller confidence, and higher regard of the faculty. He stood first among those admitted to the bar, and a brilliant career was expected by all who had marked the severe discipline to which he had subjected himself. But when he took his stately, but gentle wife to his own home, he gave his undivided attention to its happiness and embellishment, and to the improvement of his large plantation. Every thing flourished in his hands. Love, and joy, and trust, took up their abode with him, and scattered fadeless roses in his path. His firm, but not rigorous discipline, was effective, and his servants obeyed his lightest wish with a devotion that developed all their skill and energies. His vigorous mind found ample scope in the application of science to agriculture. The exhausted fields were renovated; the waste lands were converted into fruitful soil; and the entire plantation, instead of gradually wearing out by culture, like those around it, became every year, by wise and scientific tillage, more productive and valuable.

But, in the midst of all this prosperity, his wife died suddenly. He sank under the terrible blow, and after a severe illness, unable to endure the scenes which had witnessed his unclouded happiness, he placed his children with his parents, and passed two years on the eastern continent. Not idly. He studied in the English, French and German Universities, and in the intervals of intense application gratified his aesthetic nature by searching out every where the grand and exquisite productions of nature, art, and genius. He returned with his mind stored with rich and varied knowledge, and soon after opened his office in the city. He was early engaged in several important cases, in which he was distinguished for his legal acumen, his clear and simple style, his convincing oratory, and general forensic ability. In time, he became no less marked for his strict integrity and the purity of his private life. He made his mark on the age, and the age strove to repay the debt by making him a lion. The journals, in many a sounding paragraph, styled him the lion of the times. The lawyers and great men about town quoted him as the lion of their city. And the ladies, in their graceful hero-worship, crowned him the lion-king of their exclusive circles. He slept; one night, a judge, and woke to find himself—the fashion. An ancient name that had thrilled the world for ages was revived for the occasion. Men, wore lion-heart vests, and boys shouted proudly, as they waved their caps of the latest style—lion-heart! And the ladies, excelling all in their apt devices, wore sets of ruby lion-hearts. Woe to the poor lady that could not afford the costly jewel!

"And the poor Lion?" He never lost his identity.—Engrossed in his earnest, noble purposes, he passed so calmly on his way, wrapped in the simplicity and power of a truly great soul, that they found it impossible to lionize him, personally. He often visited his children and overlooked his plantation, and very strangely, never forgot to call at Terre d' Amour. He and aunt Grace had been for years like brother and sister. They corresponded in his absence. How we all enjoyed the reading of his letters, so full of incident, of thought and feeling! Ruth, an orphan niece of aunt Margaret, valued them almost as highly as aunt Grace did. They would grieve together as they noted a shade of sadness in his most cheerful pictures, and amid his brilliant imagery. It was very evident that his regard for aunt Grace continually augmented. He always asked for her, sat near her, read to her, sought her counsel, her sympathy, her approval. He was just the man to satisfy her exigent heart. So we thought, children as we were. Aunt Grace met him in the same kind, sisterly way; looked always with the same frankness into his beaming, tender eyes; and let him go away without recalling him by a single glance. Did aunt Grace love us all so very much, that she could love no one more? It was a happy thing for us, for me, but poor Richard! Must his heart be torn again? Did not aunt Margaret pity him? "Pity the judge? O no! He had a brave, strong heart, and would do very well." And so we were forced to think, when aunt Grace told us, with a rejoicing face and voice, that our dear Ruth would bless his widowed home.—After that, we understood something of the timid humility of love. We wondered that we had not sooner read Ruth's avoidance, blushes and silence. We thought she had come to dislike him. Truly, love was a mysterious thing, and we shook our young heads gravely.

He bore away from us the Madonna-like face, with the pure, strong, loving spirit shining so clearly through it, and the city beaux and belles made another failure.

About six months after, aunt Grace and I were to pass a few weeks with them. One morning I was copying a head of Raphael's that Judge Firmly had brought from Europe. He had given his young wife the usual caress before going out, and passed into the library for his papers. Lucet climbed up into a chair by the east window, and for a long time amused herself by vain efforts to catch the sunbeams. "Now I dot it! No, it don. I held oo tight dis time. How did oo det away?" At last, reaching too far, the chair tipped over, and screaming, she would have fallen, had not Ruth caught her. Ruth took the frightened child to her bosom, and her fond caresses soon won a smile, and then an earnest entreaty for the nursery song—"Dod is dood!" which Ruth had composed for her. She returned the loving kiss that preceded, and followed the oft-repeated request. Then Lu folded her dimple hands, and with a rapt expression, gazed up into the tender eyes that met hers, and during "ma's own song," as Willie called it, the child was in a quiet rapture. Now and then the large eyes seemed too full of happiness, and a cry of joy was hushed between the close-pressed rosy lips, lest a note should escape her. When Ruth finished, Lu kissed her repeatedly, murmuring, each time, "my sweet ma! my sweet ma!" Then she laid her bright head on Ruth's bosom, for a moment, and with another look full of loving trust, returned to the sunbeams. "I doth I, det it now, don't oo mamma?"

Ruth was taking up her pen again, when Willie came flying in, and running up to her, cried, "mamma, mamma! cousin Eddie just told me that you were not my ma, that my ma is dead, and that I have no mamma no more! O say you are my dear own mamma! Papa said you were." "Papa is always right my child," she said, as she parted his dark locks, and gazed with earnest love into his eyes. "And you are my dear mamma! I knew you were, or you would not have stayed with us so long, and make us all so happy. And you will stay here always, dear mamma?" She smiled an answer, though a pensive shade passed over her face.

"But why did cousin Eddie say you were not my ma?" continued Willie.

"What led him to say so?"

"Why, you see, we were flying our kites, and mine always would rise highest, though I tried hard to make his go up as far, when he laid it down and seemed grieved about it."

"That was right, my noble boy."

"But it would not, and then I told him we would sit down and see what was the difference. Well, he said my kite was the prettiest, it ought to go up higher, but he didn't see why Katy couldn't make as nice a one. 'O she is not your mamma!' said I. 'It takes mammas to make pretty kites, and my mamma is so good.' 'And mine would be,' said he, 'but she is most always sick, shut up in her room where we can see her only once in a while, and then we go in very softly and say, good morning, mamma, or good night, mamma; and she kisses us and puts her soft, thin hand upon our heads, and seems to say something to God about us, she looks so solemn. I wish mamma was well,' he said after a little 'but perhaps she will die and go away into the cold grave; so Katy says when we make much noise, as your ma did.' 'But I have got a mamma still,' I said. 'O, she is not your own mamma; your ma is dead!' And I cried, and ran here to ask you."

"Eddie was right," said Ruth, gently.

"O mamma! mamma!" he cried again, in sorrow, and burying his face in her lap, then suddenly raising it, he cried through his tears. "But you said you were my mamma, and papa said you were, and you say pa is always right!"

"Yes, my child," and Ruth drew him closer to her bosom, and pressed a kiss on his open brow. "You would not let me tell you. Both are right." Willie looked excitingly puzzled. "Do you notice my hair is dark, and I am not very tall, not near as tall as grandma?" Willie gave undivided attention. "And do you not remember, my Willie, when you was a very little boy, before you could fly a kite, or keep a hoop rolling, it would fall over so strangely, that I was not here then?"

"Yes," said he, pensively.

"And a tall, beautiful lady, with sunny hair like our little Lu's, walked quietly about, or reclined on the sofa." Willie grew sad. "And surely you remember that every night you went to this sweet lady, and kneeling by her side with clasped hands, said, softly, the little prayer she taught you?" Willie wept. "Well, love," said Ruth, very tenderly, "this good, this lovely lady was your own precious mamma! She died, as Eddie has told you, and we shall see her beautiful face here no more. But, Willie, dear, she is not in the cold grave. She is in heaven, with God. She is one of His angels, and has a bright, golden harp in her hand, on which she sings, O more sweetly than you can imagine, and she wears over a pure white robe."

"And has she wings, and does she fly?" Ruth smiled. "Do you always mean yes when you smile so, dear mamma?" and he stopped suddenly at the word, and his eyelids drooped, and a tear fell.

"And so, Willie, you must never forget this tall and lovely mamma, with golden hair, like a halo about her sweet face, who was here a little while to love and bless you, and who has gone home to be with God forever." I wish I could describe Ruth's glowing face and the inexpressible tenderness of her manner, while she said this. "But after she became a winged angel, God gave you another mamma."

"And that is you, dear, dear mamma, my own mamma forever! O God is good!" said he, adding to the nursery song, and he kissed Ruth's lips and cheeks and eyes.

"So you see, you have too mammas to love you, but the one in heaven is the best."

"But you will not go away to heaven and leave us here alone?"

"God will take us all home some day, if we are good."

"And pa and Lucet, and you, dear mamma, and your own Willie, all of us will go together some bright day, up to heaven, to see God and that other mamma, and the angels. How happy we shall be!" and he danced around the room. Going near the mirror he glanced in and his dark hair caught his eye. He stopped, looked at it, then at Ruth's, and returning to her, began: "But you said Lu's hair was sunbeams, like my angel mamma's, and mine, you see, is dark, like yours."

"You have papa's hair," she replied quietly, and passed her hand caressingly through his locks.

Just then a hand was laid very gently, as if in blessing, on her own fair head, and rising impulsively, she was clasped to her husband's heart. When he could speak, he said in a tone of tender reverence: "God has indeed blessed us. He has given us two angels. But may we, love, go home together." My copy had the true Madonna expression.

THE SOUTHERN METHODIST CHURCH IN WASHINGTON CITY.

Mr. Editor: Having recently visited Washington City, I have had opportunity to become more thoroughly acquainted with the wants and claims of our Church there. I confess that I feel now towards that enterprize as I never felt before. I am satisfied now, not only that it is the duty of Southern Methodists everywhere to contribute to that enterprize, but that they ought to do so liberally and promptly.

In a few words this is the state of the case: If we had a larger and better located church building in that city, we should soon have a much larger membership there, a much larger congregation. Southern Methodists and the friends of Southern Methodism, who go to Washington as members of Congress, as Cabinet officers, as clerks in the Departments, and as visitors, instead of straying off to other Churches, or declining to go anywhere, would attend our own Church, and Southern Methodism and Southern interests would be much more honorably represented and upheld. And yet it is unquestionably true that among our permanent membership in Washington, and those there who feel permanently identified with the Church, there is not strength enough to purchase the lot and to erect the building.

Although in the division of the Church, Washington City fell within the Northern Church, still, as I was informed upon the most reliable authority, had there been a Southern Church house there at the time of division, of proper size and location, there would have rallied to it a numerous and highly respectable society, of material which, in the then confused and disorganized state of things, ultimately returned to the world, or scattered into other communions. The Southern Methodist Church has always had a class of friends and supporters in Washington City; at least enough to justify the belief that under proper advantages, and free from circumstances calculated to embarrass and hinder, there is the amplest room for our Church even among the more permanent resident residents there.

The present Southern Methodist Church in Washington is a very inadequate building, located on one side of the city, remote from the great thoroughfares, and especially from the head-quarters of strangers and that specific class of persons who, under other circumstances, we could rely upon to attend that Church. And yet from a handful it has grown to be a very respectable membership; from an attendance that was very small it has grown to have a large congregation, made up of Cabinet officers, members of Congress, their wives and daughters, distinguished strangers, and a number of residents of the highest respectability and character.

Now, if under all the disadvantages of such a building and such a location, we have done so well, it is obvious that vastly more could be done could we once have a building there more central and accessible, and in size and finish in keeping with such a city. This any one cannot fail to see who is on the ground, and has opportunity to know the facts.

As rapid and as encouraging as has been the growth of the membership and of the congregation, yet we have not anything like the membership or the congregation that we ought to have there, and would have did we not labor under these embarrassments of location and building. Many Southern visitors, Southern officials and residents who affiliate with the South and sympathize with Southern Methodism, do not go to our Church there, but wander off, simply because (and this they will tell you) of the inconvenience and inaccessibility of our church.

Two facts impressed me as being unquestionably true while in Washington: First, that the Southern Methodist Church there had nothing like the membership, the congregation, the prestige, the influence that it would have, provided it had the proper location and building. Second, should the time soon come when it will have the proper location and building, it will not be long before it will be the most attractive and the most powerful single Church in Washington City.

Nor can it be said that it would be building up a great affair in the metropolis, which, without spiritual light and life, is to be a mere monument of pride and vain glory. If this were all, no one would oppose the whole enterprise with more determined hostility than I. That Church belongs in a regular way to the Virginia Conference. That preacher preaches our doctrines, maintains our forms, and administers our discipline. Go there and you will feel like you are in a Methodist Church and among Methodist people. I was there during a sacramental season; and God knows if I ever experienced profound religious emotions, and if I ever felt I was among God's people, it was on that occasion. God is among that people, I verily believe; and if you were to build up that church to any size, he would still, as I believe, be there owning and sanctifying his saints.

But while it is true that the Church in Washington must have a new location and a better building in order to its proper expansion and growth, and to the full development of its capabilities of usefulness, yet it is but of the question that the people in Washington, or, I should rather say, the parties interested there, should, without great assistance from abroad, be able to accomplish these results.

Who now are the parties in Washington that might be expected to contribute to this object? They are, first, the permanent residents of the city who are in the habit of attending that church; and second, those persons from the South who, not claiming Washington as a permanent home, have but a temporary connexion with the congregation. Outsiders, and persons not connected with the congregation, are, at least for the most part, in sympathy with the Northern Church; and but little is to be expected from them. But of this first class, namely, the permanent residents of the city who attend that church, there is scarcely a man that is able to contribute anything like a telling amount. If I was correctly informed, while there are a number of this class who are intelligent and highly respectable gentlemen, yet most of them are dependant for support upon their daily exertions; and Brother Smithson, without being perhaps a very rich man, is the only man among them in highly independent circumstances. Of this second class, namely, those who are but temporarily there, it is hardly to be expected that any one will feel that profound interest necessary to prompt them to large donations. Most of them are men of the world, and all of them feel that they are but temporarily there, that they have not much more real interest in the enterprise than hundreds of thousands of other Southern Methodists; that they have to pay to the support of the preacher there, and to meet the current annual expenses, and that, in doing this they have about met the additional responsibilities they incur in being temporarily connected with that congregation. It is true that there are exceptions to this statement.—Some of our Southern representatives did nobly when Gen. Pierce; and a strong call made now upon them, in the right way, in behalf of the Southern Church, would doubtless be responded to. But still it is very evident that if the effort to raise the means for a new and better church in Washington is restricted to the corporate limits of that city, the likelihood of success is extremely remote, is indeed out of the question.

It follows, then, that if the church is ever built, it must be by help from without, by help from all over the Southern Church; for if you once leave Washington for help, the claim becomes exclusively a Southern and a Southern Methodist one, and applies just as pertinently and forcibly to one portion of Southern territory as it does to another.

As then the erection of the church cannot be secured but by the co-operation and help of Southern Methodists generally, the question of their obligation to render this co-operation and help turns simply upon the further question, is it a matter of great importance that the Methodist Church South should have such a church in Washington city? When I consider the benefit that would accrue to the South and to the Church South by our being properly represented there; the fact that we have a people there, either permanently or transiently, who in sentiment are ours, and ought consequently to be provided for by us; the fact of the moral impress we could make there—a moral impress which by reason of the representative, influential character of the population would really in its effects every precinct of the entire South; the fact, in short, that Washington is the great representative city of the Union, and we who constitute so large a portion of the population of the Union ought to be represented and felt there,—I, for one, am satisfied that it is a matter of the very gravest importance not only that we should have a church there, but one of such character as will give it every advantage and facility for the greatest possible power and influence. My opinion is, that a Southern Methodist who wishes to do good with his means and lay up treasure in heaven, could hardly make a more judicious investment than to contribute something to this cause.

Brother Smithson informed me that the present building can be sold; that he had already selected a lot in the very best part of the city for the new building, and that he was only waiting for the funds to enter upon the execution of a plan which would give our Church every possible advantage in the Metropolitan City. Should any body feel disposed to do something for God and his cause in this direction, let them forward at once to Brother Smithson. You can rely upon him. Few men are so worthy. None have a better claim to the reputation of sound christian character and active benevolent enterprize. The book of Southern Methodist sermons and the great Picture, now soon to be forthcoming, are enterprises gotten up by him to aid in the erection of that church building; as the net proceeds are all to go in that direction. Remember, then, that in patronizing those, you are doing that which will help to build a Southern Methodist Church in Washington city.

A SOUTHERNER IN NEW YORK CITY.

If I could procure from any of the merchants, great or small, in this great commercial emporium of the Western world, a pair of boots such as I read about in my boyish days, it would do me good to make my escape for a while from the dust and din, the hurry and bustle of great Gotham, and take a rapid walk to that beautiful suburban home in the Crescent City, where my good brother and sister F. so hospitably entertained me not long ago, or into your pleasant sanctum, where, from day to day, you are so busily engaged in getting up a first-rate paper for the South and South-west, shall I say? Nay, verily; but for all who belong to brother Jonathan's growing family, and all over whom the keen old gentleman chooses to extend his fostering arms.—Looking over the whole realm of the Anglo-American language, you stretch out your editorial arms, and exclaim:

"No pent-up Utica contracts our powers,
But the whole boundless continent is ours."

So mote it be. And as I cannot find the seven league boots, I have made up my mind to have a talk with you and your readers in another way, if you can spare me one of the columns of your excellent paper. I shall not soon forget the happy expression of your face when you spoke of your large and increasing circulation, but I will not mention what it is in view of the fact, that a Northern pictorial paper has just been put into my hands which boasts of a circulation of 341,000! Look at that, will you? Think of the power of the press, and then ask Southern men and women to see too it, that the South has a literature of its own, which shall not only command the patronage of Southerners, but force itself into the "regions beyond."

Volumes of interest might be written upon the multitude of things that press upon the attention of a stranger in this great commercial emporium of the Western world. The thought presented to my mind every day, while, in danger of life or limb, I work my passage through its narrow streets and crowded thoroughfares, is that the city is too big, and the people have too much to do. Why cannot much of this business be transferred to Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, Richmond, New Orleans, and other places to which it naturally belonged.—But if the South won't have it, let them petition Congress, or some other power, to see that more room is made for the accommodation of the swiftly increasing business of the "Empire City." The wear and tear of men of business is great, and one who looks on cannot help being amazed at the great rushing on every side after the riches of earth. And the way that the poor are crowded together in the narrow, filthy streets, courts and alleys, is enough to sicken the heart of every one who has the common feelings of humanity. There must be a wondrous fascination in city life which annually leads thousands of poor emigrants from the old world to settle here, when they see so many squalid hunger-bitten, beastly looking men and women, white and black, in these dens of pollution and misery, while millions of acres of fertile lands are still unoccupied, and there is abundant employment for all who choose to labor in various parts of our national domain. Much has been done already to alleviate the condition of these wretched children of "free institutions, but if much more is not speedily done, the time is not far distant when the wise men of Gotham will be compelled to turn their attention from the slaves of the South to devise some means to defend themselves from the hordes of semi-barbarous "freemen" congregated in the very heart of their centre of civilization. Let us turn from this subject to a more pleasing one, and look for a while at a large and commodious building, erected by Mr. Peter Cooper of New York, and "devoted to the moral, intellectual, and physical improvement of his countrymen." It covers a whole block, having a front on Third Avenue of 195 feet; on Fourth, of 195; on Eighth street, of 143; and on Seventh, 86. The cost of the building was $300,000. The annual income from the rented parts will be from about 25,000 to 30,000 dollars, which is all given to the Directors for the use of the Institute. My first visit to the Union was to attend a political meeting which was held by the friends of Douglas in the lecture room in the basement, 125 feet long by 82 wide, and 21 high. Instead of benches, the people are provided with easy sitting chairs; a very pleasant arrangement, which prevents the crushing process so common at these public gatherings. All the seats were occupied; the aisles were crowded with people standing, and often the whole room was packed full; there were crowds about the doors who could not gain admission. Some five or six speeches were made, all of them pointing to the "Little Giant of the West" as the man raised up by Providence to meet the want of the times, and to save the Union. I do not meddle with politics, as you know, nor is this paper a vehicle for political discussion, but I may be permitted to say here that this was a very large, enthusiastic meeting, conducted with good order, and that the speeches were much more favorable to the South than I expected to hear in New York.

My next visit to the Union was to hear one of Mr. Milburn's popular lectures. While passing to and fro through the crowded avenues of the city, my attention had been frequently arrested by large placards, headed "Roars of Laughter!—Rev. Wm. H. Milburn's Lecture, —What a Blind Man saw in England, etc." This, alongside of flaming show bills about Heenan and Sayers, and other pugilistic, quack medicines, the circus, the theater, and other truculent excitements of the hour, did not seem to be quite in keeping with the character of a Methodist preacher. But I presume Mr. Milburn had nothing to do do with the advertising part of the performance. He is employed, I believe, by the Directors to lecture for $50 a night, and the remainder of the proceeds goes to the Institute. If so, they must have reaped a golden harvest that night, for the spacious room was again filled, though not crowded as at the political meeting where the seats were free. I have not room even for a brief abstract of this very amusing lecture, which occupied about an hour and three quarters in delivery, and was received with great applause. It was quite complimentary to England and Englishmen, and on the principle that fun is better than physic, it afforded a profitable evening's amusement to the crowd. As an artistic performance it was quite creditable to one who has been styled the "blind man eloquent;" but it seemed to me rather strange that a Methodist preacher, the pastor of a flourishing church in Brooklyn, should have confessed, as he did, that the man in whom he felt the deepest interest of all the great men of Great Britain, was no other than Thomas Carlyle, the Scotch infidel! It reminded me of one of our literary preachers in the Old Dominion, who, when asked how it was that he had no Methodist books in his room, pointed to two books lying on his table, and said, "There are my Methodist books;" one was Plato's dialogues in Greek, and the other was a work by Carlyle—one a pagan and the other an infidel. Take this, Mr. Editor, as one of the signs of the times. It struck me also that while some of his caricatures of English and American manners "brought down the house," and produced roars of laughter and rapturous cheers, such exhibitions were more in keeping with the character of a comedian, or such an inveterate scoffing humorist as Dean Swift or Sidney Smith, than that of an evangelical minister of the Gospel.

In the vicinity of the Cooper Union, situated on Lafayette Place, I found a stately edifice of brick, ornamented with brown stone in the Romanesque style of architecture, filled with treasures of learning and wisdom. Ascending by a flight of 38 marble steps to the second story, I found myself in a splendid hall richly decorated with fourteen piers, finished in imitation of Italian marble, over which are galleries ranged on either side with enclosures of gilt iron railings. These upper galleries are reached by eight spiral stairways. This is emphatically the library of the American continent, originally founded by the munificence of the late John Jacob Astor, who endowed with the sum of $400,000. It has been further enriched by the munificence of the son of the founder. It contains upwards of 110,000 volumes, a vast accumulation of costly works in all the departments of human knowledge. OPINIONS OF THE PRESS ON THE NEW CHAPTER.

The first opinion which we give is from the Baltimore Christian Advocate. This paper is edited by Dr. Thomas E. Bond, a son of the celebrated Dr. Bond who, in his life-time, so long edited the Christian Advocate and Journal. He is thoroughly acquainted with the controversy, and with the bearing of every question, measure, and vote connected with it. He is located in the midst of the region most affected by the new Chapter. He is an enlightened man, and a very able writer, and his opinion is entitled to great weight on this subject. We are glad to see that he is pursuing such a manly and straightforward course. He speaks out without reserve, though his paper is the organ of two or three Conferences of the Northern Methodist Church. He says:

At first sight many will think that the new chapter is weaker than the old, and that the General Conference has made concessions to the Border—but a little careful consideration will vindicate the majority of the Conference from the charge of extreme stupidity involved in such a conclusion. That body knew what they were about, and when they urged this chapter as a progressive action on the Slavery question, they were not so silly as not to comprehend its meaning. It is artfully constructed.—The barb is carefully covered by the bait, but a moment's examination bares the steel.

The old chapter declared Slavery to be a great evil—but carefully abstained from calling it a sin. It forbade a slaveholder to have official station in the church, but qualified the prohibition so widely as to leave obedience to the precept almost optional with a society. In fact it was a sort of sliding scale of officiality, to be worked by the sentiment of locality. The chapter also forbade traveling preachers to hold slaves—but it did not place the prohibition upon moral grounds. It left room for the explanation that the "evil," in the case of preachers, was in the embarrassment of their work.

The old chapter also directed our preachers to enforce upon our members the necessity of teaching their slaves to read the Word of God, and allowing them to attend upon the public worship of God on our regular days of divine service—but even this, the preachers were instructed to do "prudently." As an answer to the Titantic question—what shall be done for the extirpation of Slavery? the old chapter was as the mewing of a kitten to the crash of thunder. So far as our private members were concerned, it only required them to listen to a "prudent" suggestion on the part of the preachers to teach their slaves to read the Bible and let them go to church on Sundays. A suggestion which probably was never offered, simply because it was not needed. Our members, under the old chapter, were permitted to hold slaves, with no other restrictions than those enforced by their own consciences. The church threw the responsibility upon them. The relation was not declared to be sinful, but only "evil." The church might have said as much of Malaria. The character, degree, determination, remedy of the "evil"—of all these the church said nothing. In fact, the church might as well have said nothing at all, for there was no practical use in what it said.

The new chapter declares that the buying, selling, or holding of human beings as chattels, is inconsistent with the law of Christ, and with that rule in our discipline which requires all who remain among us to to "do no harm."

This is a plain declaration, that slaveholding is a sin against God and the Discipline—a singular duality in which we would suppose the latter element superfluous; did we not perceive the necessity of looking to some other quarter than revelation for support of the declaration.—The word "sin" is carefully excluded—the idea is conveyed in the circumlocution inconsistent with the "golden rule." The distinction "as chattels," is introduced with the evident purpose of creating ambiguity, and shading the meaning of the precept. This law term is not commonly understood. The people have been led to confound "chattel" with "cattle," or something of that kind. They suppose that by holding slaves as chattels, is meant holding them with the same views and feelings as they hold brutes; and dealing with their servants as though they had neither mind nor soul, thought nor sensibility. It is in this sense, the term is often tauntingly used towards them. Now, in truth, "chattel" means nothing but moveable or personal property—something else than real estate, and unless a man holds slaves as real estate, he must hold them as chattels. The committee on Slavery intended, by the use of this word, to exclude from censure such slaveholding as they described in their report as tolerable, that is, purely benevolent slaveholding—over the young, rearing them for emancipation—over the old, providing for their infirmity—and over all to whom bondage is a legal necessity during their transit to freedom. Such cases, the committee intended to exclude, by using the word chattel, but in their ignorance they have brought even the benevolent class of slaveholders under condemnation, and declared them sinners before God, if they avail themselves of their legal authority over their servants, for none of them have a real estate in a negro.

All Slaveholding is, by this chapter, declared to be a sin. It effectively creates a new term of membership in our church, for it declares all cases of Slaveholding to be amenable under the General Rule, forbidding "all harm." After having laid down this rule, the General Conference proceeded to "admonish all our preachers and people to keep themselves pure from this great evil." What more could they have said about Mormonism?—and "to seek its extirpation by all lawful and Christian means." What more could they have said of any sin? Having declared Slaveholding to be a sin, the Discipline calls upon preachers and people to seek its extirpation by all means except such as are lawless and wicked. The word "affectionately" sounds sweetly, but it is not applied to qualify the manner of the "extirpation," but only the tone of the admonition. The inquisitors used even more kindly words when they surrendered the victim to the "secular arm"—as they benignantly styled the executioner.

Such, then, is the present Discipline. It condemns all Slaveholders by rule, and by commentary excuses only in such cases as we have mentioned. Real Slaveholding it concludes to be a sin against God, and a violation of the Discipline of our Church. The chapter is advisory, but advisory of action against Slaveholding members. It advises preachers and others to deal with such as immoral, and violators of our Rule, and extrude them by the "lawful means" provided in the Discipline.

Can we remain in a connection where we must live in perpetual rebellion against its law? Can we honorably continue in a fraternity of churches when our only right to be in, is the impossibility for the others to put us out? Can we obey the present Discipline? Can we remain in connexion with the other churches and disobey it? Will it be for the glory of God to submit to the present chapter and try to practice upon it? These are questions for our readers to answer—and we hold this paper open for them to express through it their opinions, freely and fully.

The General Conference refused to pass an amendment to the chapter making it only advisory. Had they done so, it would have been really unchanged—because the advice would have been to the executors of the Discipline to execute it. After this refusal, however, the Conference did pass a resolution declaring the chapter to be "advisory"—but this will not constitute a part of the Discipline. It was probably intended to avoid the charge of unconstitutionality, in creating a new term of membership in the chapter, and to give ground for difference of opinion and dissension among ourselves.

Now let us hear what another Baltimore paper says. The Methodist Protestant, the organ of the Methodist Protestant Church, and a very able and impartial journal says:

The General Conference itself seems to have been startled at its own act, and in its trepidation resolved to undo, so far as any obligatory force was concerned, what it had just done; for the records give us the following resolution as subsequently passed:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this Conference that our present chapter on slavery is declaratory of our principles, and advisory in its application."

Others think it is an adroit scheme to entrap the border. The resolution that it be not mandatory, when proposed to be inserted as a part of the chapter itself, was negatived by a large vote. It was adopted as a simple resolution of the General Conference; but it is not a part of the chapter itself, and therefore will not be inserted in the Disciplines with the chapter. So far as the book itself will show, the chapter will stand upon its pages as an authoritative enunciation of principles. It declares to the world that to use a slave as a personal property, for that is the meaning of the world chattel, is contrary to the laws of God and man. It virtually declares that if a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church should hire a servant from his owner, and so use him when hired, paying his master for his services, such member is guilty of a sin against God and nature. How can a conscientious minister, bound to execute church law against those who violate its moral teachings, satisfy his conscience in failing to act by arraignment and trial? Is it allowable for him to put his own construction on law, or to suffer his own feelings to control his official decisions? If the above view be correct, then indeed does the new chapter most seriously interfere with the rights and privileges of the border Conferences, most seriously obstruct them in their efforts to preach the Gospel and administer discipline among the people, and we are not surprised that the excitement among them is up to the fever point.

Hear also what the Northern Christian Advocate, published at Auburn, N. Y., a strong abolition sheet, has to say, and the conviction cannot be avoided, that the majority themselves regard the new Chapter as having the force of law. He says:

The action of the Conference on the Slavery question is to the effect of striking out the Chapter on Slavery, and substituting the one we have already published, which in declaratory of the principles of the Church, and advisory in its application. It is our own opinion that the present new chapter takes the right position as in Disciplinary attitude. With this action must come peace. It is precisely what the leading anti-slavery brethren have recommended, and in this all parties have concurred. Under this chapter the moral attitude and sentiment of the Church is explicitly defined and set forth, and a principle laid down which must explain all law on the subject. The administrator has as much authority under the Discipline as it now stands, to enforce law against slave-holding, as he could have under any term of law. All sin whatsoever which connects with the act of slave-holding is put under the law of Discipline, and the principles of humanity and religion are as perfectly enthroned as any term of words can do it. We repent it, with this ground-work of principles, the administration of Discipline has all it requires to rest upon, and we must now trust to the administration to do its duty. As to the General Rule, we are not of the number who believe its change is a fundamental condition of extirpation.

The New York Independent, Beecher's paper, the bitterest abolition sheet, of the religious class, in the United States, had a correspondent at Buffalo of the abolition stripe, who knew what he was talking about. We suppose him to be Dr. Curry, who was formerly in the South, and stationed at Columbus, Ga., at the time of the division in 1844. He says:

The action reached is considered by its promoters at once unobjectionable in its term, and yet thoroughly "extirpatory" in its character and necessary tendencies.—Though the "General Rule" remains unchanged, the proposed amendment received so large a majority vote as to give it immense moral power—a vote that fixed the anti-slavery position of the great Methodist body beyond the possibility of mistake or misconstruction. But it is the action upon the secondary portion of the Discipline—the "Chapter"—that is especially valued by the progressives. Instead of the formerly-existing rule regulating, and ostensibly but not really limiting slave-holding among official members of the Church, and so by implication allowing it among all non-official members, and by further limiting that limitation by the State laws through which the restriction became almost wholly nugatory, they have now a clear and concise recognition of the "sinfulness of holding human beings to be used as chattels," followed by a solemn admonition to all the ministers and members of the Methodist Episcopal Church "to keep themselves pure from this great evil, and to seek its extirpation by all lawful and Christian means." This "Chapter" is in form declaratory and advisory, but by its direct reference to the admonitions in the "General Rules," which enjoin the "doing no harm," and the "avoiding of evil of every kind," it has also a general administrative character and application. Now, for the first time since nearly half a century ago, the Book of Discipline of the great Methodist Church contains an outspoken recognition of the sinfulness of American slavery.

Now hear the Northern Independent, an independent Methodist paper, published at Auburn, New York, a rival of the General Conference paper, the Northern Christian Advocate, because the latter, though abolition, was not ultra enough. It is the most villainous sheet that ever shamed the name of religion. It says:

We have, at last, a revised chapter on slavery—that portion of the majority report relating thereto, having passed, without material alteration, and by a decided vote. Considered as a finality, the alteration is anything but satisfactory; but if we regard it merely as a beginning, it may have some importance. It is hoped the Border will, for once, be true to its professions, and leave on the occasion now furnished. Those chivalrous, slave-growing Methodists profess to go for the Discipline as it is, and threaten to secede if we make the slightest change. An opportunity is afforded them by this action of the Conference, to make their words good—they have leave to retire, in conformity with their character and intentions. Should this alteration have the effect to rid the Church of its incurably diseased Southern limb, the blessing would be inconceivably great. Many who have had good opportunities to judge of the result of the present action, express themselves confidently, that the South will go, and that this partial amendment will just as effectually cause them to slough, as would the most stringent prohibition. Should the anticipations of these brethren be realized, we shall rejoice; but we have our fears that they may not be so easily disposed of. Should they stay, however, until absolute prohibition compels them to leave, we think they will not have to wait more than another four years. Change, once begun, cannot fail to advance, to the wholesome and decent point of entire interdiction

MOVEMENTS IN THE NORTHERN METHODIST CHURCH.

The Baltimore Christian Advocate says:

It has been suggested to us by many of our friends—preachers and laymen—that steps be immediately taken to call a Convention to consider the recent action of the Conference. We think this eminently proper, and trust that the Presiding Elders will adopt the advice. It is their place to take the lead, and we defer to them. Some common understanding must be reached. Let a Convention be called, the Chapter discussed, and a final determination be had. We pray our people not to act hastily or in small bodies. Let us have time to come to proper conclusions, and so act as to preserve our unity.

It may be well to wait until our delegates shall have returned from the General Conference, and make their report to the Church—if they shall see fit to make one. When all the facts shall be before us, we can act prudently and conclusively.

A correspondent of the same paper says:—

It is now a "fixed fact" that we need a new Sunday School Advocate in the bounds of the Baltimore Conference. The communications in this paper on the subject, before the session of the General Conference, were all favorable to the enterprise; and now that the General Conference has, by formal and emphatic votes, sustained the course pursued by Daniel Wise, and re-elected him to a position where he can indignantly despise and repudiate the Border Conferences, it is time that we should at once provide our Schools with a paper suited to our position, and free from the abomination of Abolitionism.

At the last session of the Baltimore Conference, a resolution to authorize the establishment of a Sunday School Advocate was referred to the Publishing Committee of the Baltimore Advocate. Now that, through the rural districts of our work the Sabbath Schools are re-opening, we could wish to learn the decision of that committee.

We propose, therefore, that each Sabbath School, through its proper representative, shall signify to the committee, T. H. W. Monroe, Chairman, the number of papers it could take, in the event of the establishment of a Sunday School Advocate. There are in our Conference 337 Schools; in the East Baltimore Conference about 500. Were the great body of these to speak encouragingly, and indicate the portion of responsibility each would share, there would be no longer hesitancy concerning the enterprise.

According to the latest data I have before me, the Cincinnati Conference patronizes more extensively than any other the Sunday School Advocate published at New York. There are about 30,000 scholars within its bounds, and about 10,000 papers taken;—one paper for every three scholars. My belief is, if we had a paper we could endorse, we could equal this proportion of subscribers. At present we have 23,000 scholars, and 2,600 papers taken;—one for every 10. East Baltimore Conference about 33,000 scholars, and 3,600 papers taken;—about one for every 9. It is fair to presume that the extent of patronage of the New York Sunday School Advocate shows the extent of its endorsement; and if so, there is but little difference between the two Baltimore Conferences, and therefore nearly the same necessity for the existence of a newspaper. And when we recollect that the Baltimore Advocate has secured a circulation in less than two years, which has exceeded the calculations of its warmest friends, we may, not without reason, hope that a Sunday School Advocate would meet with like success. Suppose, then, we could get a proportion of subscribers to such a paper, in our Conference, equal to the proportion of subscribers to the New York paper in the Cincinnati Conference, we would have near 8,000. The same proportion in the East Baltimore Conference would give 11,000—in all 19,000. Deduct the number of subscribers in the two Conferences to the New York paper, 5,900, and we have left 13,400. And can we expect no patronage from the Philadelphia, Western Virginia, and other conservative border Conferences? Some of the Western border Conferences have no subscribers to the present paper; would they not rejoice in the establishment of one which they could cordially recommend to the Schools under their care?

In some places on our Virginia border, we take the Sunday School Visitor published by the M. E. Church, South, at Nashville, Tenn. Did the Editor of the Nashville Advocate, and other Southern Methodist journalists manifest no sympathy with the unrighteous warfare against our church, carried on by Rosser, Brownlow and Co., we could with more consistency encourage the periodicals of the Southern Church. We find as it is, no material objection to the Nashville Sunday School Visitor, and in the absence of one issued by our own Conference, give it a preference. In other places, the Sunday School Banner and other publications of the American Sunday School Union are used in our Sunday Schools in Virginia. We always have some fear of the American Union publications, because they are prone to be more or less impregnated with Calvinism.

We must say, in all good feeling, that this writer has gone far out of his way to find an objection to the Sunday School Visitor. With the exception of the purely local controversy between the Richmond and Baltimore Advocates, and which nearly every Southern Methodist paper deprecated, there is not a particle of excuse for the insinuation as to the "Editor of the Nashville Advocate and other Southern Methodist journalist." We wish to see Baltimore and the border have fair dealing, and charitable treatment, and we claim the same things for ourselves.

A correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial writes as follows in regard to the action of the Methodist General Conference North, in turning out some of their conservative editors, of whom Dr. Stevens was the widest known:

The conservative portion of the Methodist Church in this city, embracing by far the largest part of its intelligence and wealth, are quite free in expressing their disgust at the general tone of the proceedings of their late quadrennial conference at Buffalo, and especially at the action they took on the slavery question, and the turning out of four of the editors of their official organs. The Rev. Dr. Abel Stevens, who for four years past has had editorial charge of the Christian Advocate and Journal, published in this city, and who is conceded their ablest historian and editor, was removed from his position on the simple ground of being too conservative, though the removal, curiously enough, did not take place until some days after Dr. S. had peremptorily declined a reelection. Within ten days past, Dr. Stevens has had offers of the presidencies of three colleges, two editorships, two churches, and two professorships. His choice, whatever it may be, will be subordinate to his projects of authorship. It is now proposed by several of the most prominent Methodists of the city, to start a paper to compete with the Christian Advocate and Journal, and that it shall, in size, capital and ability, distance that paper. It is quite likely that the management of this paper will be entrusted to Dr. Stevens.

THE WASHINGTON CITY CHURCH.

We learn that Rev. C. K. Marshall, D.D., Rev. R. Abbey, and Rev. N. B. Raiford, of Mississippi, have responded to the $100 proposition. Let us have responses to fill up this proposition, and let those who cannot give so much give what they can, down to $10 and $5. The Bishops, in their annual meeting at Nashville, in April, cordially sanctioned the enterprise, and recommended the quarterly meeting conference of the city of Washington to appoint Wm. T. Smithson, N. M. McGregor, H. F. Zimmerman, A. L. Edwards and S. H. Latimer, Esqrs., and Hons. T. Polk, Jas. Jackson, David Clopton and Robt. Hatton, a Board of Trustees to receive funds and superintend the building of a Southern Methodist Church in the city of Washington; and when appointed, they recommend their cause and their agents to the Methodists and people of the Southern States. They have, accordingly, been appointed.

In this connection we recommend all our people to send to their respective depositories, and procure a copy of Mr. Smithson's book of Sermons. The great Picture will be ready in the autumn.

POINT WORTHINGTON, JUNE 9th, 1860.

DEAR SIR,—The day before yesterday I wrote to my friends and merchants in New Orleans—Messrs. Ward Hunt & Co.—to purchase a bank check on New York for six hundred dollars payable to your order, and to enclose it, by mail, to your address. This is to meet my part of the two propositions I made through you to assist in building your great church for the South. I send it now, without waiting for the action of others, because I know you not only require money, but that you require it now.—What your friends intend to do, they should do quickly.

Persevere in your great work. Never despond, for your hands will be held up by the great Methodist Church South, and by the patriots of the South as certainly as were the hands of Moses held up in a great struggle.

W. H. HAMMETT.

NEW YORK LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE.

There seems so little to speak about, that I find a mind not to write to you this week, but habit (for it is now getting a habit) prevailed. Books, except our political books, with which I have nothing to do, thank Heaven, are getting less plenty as the canvass advances. In a month or two we shall all drop reading, I suppose, for the season, and take entirely to "hurrahing."

Did I speak in my last about Anthony Trollope's "West Indies and the Spanish Main," just published by the Harpers? I think not. It is one of the few books of travel which I have found rendable, lately. It is thoroughly enjoyable. The writer is a man who is in good humor with himself and with the world, who has determined to be bored, and disgusted, and pleased, and delighted, all without losing either his temper or his common sense. Only philosophers ought to travel, and certainly your most enjoyable traveller, to read, is your Epicurean. Such I take Mr. T. to be; he is a stout, comfortable looking gentleman, with a good deal of hair, little twinkling blue eyes, loose easy-fitting, rather jauntily cut clothes, and the air of a Cockney man of the world. Such he was at least when he visited New York, on his return from the West Indies. A man who was not easily surprised, I judged, from an attentive survey of him; and one who knew how to turn off a practical joke, if any West Indian planter had tried one on. A lazy man to look at, but a most industrious man in reality, I must believe, from the way he turns out novels and travels—none of them stupid—all above the average.

I advise every man who wants to know about the British West Indies, and about Cuba, to read this book. Mr. Trollope is a business man; he evidently had no particular theory to bolster up, but was content to present facts, to which every man is at liberty to fit his own theory. And surely facts were never presented in a more agreeable guise than in these travels.

The Trollopes are a writing family. Mr. Anthony T. is an author; Mr. Thomas Adolphus T. is another author—so has the "Italy of the middle ages" in his especial charge; and Mrs. Trollope—do we Americans not know, to our cost, that she is an author?—She, who abused us, before Dickens, and even before Marryatt or Hall? The old lady is still living. I suppose she will never die. It must be at least five or six hundred years ago now since she came to Cincinnati to civilize the people there; built a barbarous building which she called a Bazaar, if I remember right (it is so long ago), failed to pay the uncivilized brick-layers, who have remained uncivilized ever since, and finally left the Porkopolis of this Continent disgusted and in disgust. Mr. Anthony Trollope pays his bills, so far as I have heard, but then he don't build bazaars, nor extend the area of civilization, which is, under the most favoring circumstances, an expensive work.

Another family of authors are the Bulwers. I suppose few of your readers have read the ill-natured books of Lady Bulwer, who delights to present her noble husband, under the thinnest veil of fiction, as doing all those things which only the meanest of men could even think of without blushing. Lady Bulwer writes the best Billingsgate I know of, but she is fearfully dull for all that. She has only one idea—hate of her husband. Lately it has become known that "Owen Meredith" was the nome de plume of the son of this happy couple. Young Bulwer published some years ago a book of poems entitled, "Clytemnestra and other Poems," which was thought to give promise of a brilliant poetic future. His second volume is just out, and published in this country by Ticknor and Fields. It spoils his mess completely. "Lucille" is a novel in verse, a novel of high society—a very snobbish novel indeed; while it shows some brilliant versification, it is so full of sham sentiment, of the very worst sentimentalism, that it must remind his father, the elder Bulwer, disagreeably, of his own early novels, which I take it he would, on some accounts, rather forget now. Indeed, "Lucille" is only an echo of the sham sentiment which made the father's "Eugene Aram" so very mischievous a work.

"There is a Duc de Luvois, so exceedingly chivalric and high-minded, in consequence of being related to the Bourbon family, that he can follow no other profession but that of systematic Sedition. His vices, our author confesses—

> From their earnest intense prosecution,
> Appeared almost (!) criminal. Nevertheless
> What in him gave to vice, from its pathos and stress,
> A sort of antiquity, might have, perchance,
> Had the object been changed by transposed circumstance,
> Given vigor to virtue.

The 'circumstance,' however, not being 'transposed,' this gentleman remains an unmitigated sensualist.

There is a Lord Alfred Vargrave, one of those magnificent young gentlemen in high life who can do anything if they choose, only they never do choose, and can accomplish the very grandest acts, only they are not necessary.

This Byronic, Lytton-Bulweresque young gentleman is the hero, and at first in love with either of the young indies, according to 'transposed' circumstances—that is to say, with whichever happens to be nearest at hand—but when he marries Matilde, his affections are, of course, thenceforward wrapped up entirely in Lucille.

Besides these characters, there is a not very funny cousin of Lord Vargrave's and a Scotch Baronet, who is the person of lowest rank admitted into this very exclusive drama of modern life. There is nothing vulgar—if what is titled is scenes from that dreadful adjective—from the first line of this poem to the last. A guide, to be sure, is casually spoken of, and well described. But it must be remembered that this guide only attends upon the very highest class of continental travellers, and is not to be considered as a type of or to be in any way confounded with, the lower orders. Social position is never lost sight of for a single stanza, not even when the gentleman, who is all passion, is making love to the lady, who is all sentiment.

> 'It is not [says he] the Duke de Levois that here kneels
> To the Countess Lucile. 'Tis a heart that appeals
> To a soul,' &c. &c.

Are Dukes and Countesses so exceedingly snobbish as this? How very odd such a statement, at so tender a moment, would sound in the mouth of one of the middle classes: 'Forget that your father keeps a green-grocer's shop in a leading thoroughfare; forget that I own a mill. 'Tis a soul,' &c. The egotism, the blind selfishness, the entire absence of any thought of making themselves useful or beneficial to others, that pervade all these noble persons for 260 pages, would gladden the soul of Mr. Bright. They make love to one another indeed (whenever it is clearly wrong and vicious so to do), but never with such an enthusiasm as causes them to forget themselves.

Harper's Magazine for July will contain the following articles: A Trip among the Nail Makers, (Illustrated) by Chapin the Artist. "Before the Mirror," a poem, by Mrs. Stoddard, the wife of the Poet; Ancient Monuments in the United States," by E. G. Squier; "A Plea for a Monster," by Charles Nordhoff; "The Cruise of Two Deacons," by Fitz Hugh Ludlow; "Sentimentalism," a very excellent Essay, by Henry Giles—caustic and just; "A Voice from the Street," a poem, by L. A. Bargil, Esq., of Louisiana; "Wild Cattle Hunting on Green Island, N. C." by M. Hallock, of the N. Y. Journal of Commerce, a very promising young Magazinist; "Slightly Deaf," a story, by W. W. Sykes; "The Merchant's Lesson," by T. S. Arthur, Esq.; "When I came back from Sea," a poem, by Fitz James O'Brien; "Lovel the Widower," Mr. Thackeray's story, is concluded.—The Table is on "Our American Manners," and is excellent. It is a very good number.

The Cornhill Magazine for June is just over, and has the following list: London the Stronghold of England; Lovel the Widower; The Maiden's Lover; The Portent; Stadies in Animal Life; Framley Parsonage; William Hogarth—Painter, Engraver and Philosopher; An Austrian Employee; Sir Self and Womankind, by William Dathie; The Poor Man's Kitchen; Roundabout Papers—No. 4, On some late Great Victories.

By way of Copenhagen comes the following notice of a new publication: "In the colony of Godthub, in Greenland, a small printing office and a lithographic press were established last year, and the first fruits of their labors have been published a short time ago. The title of the first book printed in Greenland is, 'Kaludlit Okaluktualiallit.' It contains a collection of Greenland popular legends, written in the Greenland idiom, and printed by Greenlanders. The book is illustrated by ten woodcuts, likewise the work of the natives, who are said to be very clever in mechanical things of the kind. A very interesting and original division of the book is formed by eight Greenland songs, the music accompanying the words. A second volume is in prospect."

NEW ORLEANS TO MONTREAL.

Ride on our Rail to Cairo—Illinois Central—Chicago—Detroit—Grand Trunk Railway—Falls—Toronto—Memorable Battle Scenes—Lake Ontario—Kingston and Cobourg—St. Lawrence River and Scenery—Thousand Islands—Rapids—Brockville and Ogdensburg—Montreal, &c.

MR. EDITOR: The time is close at hand when many of your readers will start on a pleasure tour to the North. Permit me to mark out briefly a new route of travel, comparatively, from New Orleans to Montreal, Quebec, Portland, etc., via Cairo and Chicago—at least one not usually selected by Southerners. It offers rare attractions and is full of historic interest. The recent opening of steam navigation between Quebec and Liverpool, in connection with the Grand Trunk Railway, has already attracted the attention of merchants in New Orleans because of the superior inducements offered to importers, is another reason for commanding the attention of your readers.

It is pretty generally conceded in these days of fast traveling, that steamboats are too slow when cars are available. Then the risk by fire, explosions, and sinking of boats is so great that travelers are willing to forego the comforts usually obtained on first class steamers, and suffer some inconvenience. Well regulated roads carry hundreds of thousands of passengers without the loss of one life, while on the other hand accidents occur by which scores and hundreds of lives are destroyed. Accidents of this kind are of frequent occurrence on the river.—There is danger on railroads, but accidents occur seldom, and are rarely disastrous.

So, dear readers, let us take the cars of the New Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern Railroad at the corner of Calliope and Magnolia Streets, New Orleans.—This road extends as far as Canton, Miss., where it connects with the Mississippi Central R. R. Twenty-six miles this side of Canton is Jackson, where a branch road runs to Vicksburg. The Mississippi Central connects with the Mobile & Ohio road at Jackson, Tenn.

Thence you go by this line to Columbus, a short distance below Cairo, Ill., the terminus of the great Illinois Central, where a steamer is waiting to convey you to the latter place. The route we have briefly described has but recently been opened for through travel. The route has strong competition, but the mails and passengers are put through far in advance of the Southern route, by way of Mobile. Under the direction of Mr. Bently D. Rusell, Chief Engineer and General Superintendent, the road ought to be successful, and doubtless will be. Time from New Orleans to Cairo, 48 hours. The cars of the Illinois Central are near the landing, Cairo, and in twenty-four hours you are whirled at a lively pace into Chicago. This road passes through some of the most fertile and beautiful prairie country in the West. Cities and towns are springing up all along the road, and no wonder, as the Company are offering their lands at such prices as attract purchasers. The handiwork and policy of the capable Superintendent, Mr. W. R. Arthur, is seen in the admirable working of this immense corporation.

The traveler cannot fail to perceive—if he keeps his eyes wide open—that the dwellers in this sturdy lake city are a live people. Those who do not keep step with the rapid pace of the Chicagoians will soon fall in the rear, and had better leave for other places. It is questionable, however, whether there is much real comfort to be obtained in a city where there is such strife for a living, compared with the pleasure found in the quiet ways of steady-going cities of equal size and note. Chicago within a few years has advanced with wonderful rapidity. The improvements recently made and those going forward, are calculated to astonish the visitor.—The temporary buildings erected within a few years are fast giving place to more durable and beautiful structures, and put to blush older and wealthier cities. The wickedness of the wicked is proverbial and keeps pace with the rapid strides of improvement.

At this point (Chicago) you take the cars of the Michigan Central, which starts from the same Depot where you leave the cars of the Illinois Central. This road reaches to Detroit, Michigan, a distance of 284 miles, and passes through some of the most beautiful, clean, and thrifty cities and villages that are found in the West and North-west, such as Michigan City, Niles, Kalamazoo, Galesburg, Ann Arbor, Ypsilanti. Indeed, these towns present an air of solidity not found generally in the West. Having passed down this road twice in two different years, both times when the weather was sultry and the roads dusty, it is due Mr. R. N. Rice, the capable Superintendent, and his associates in the management of the road, to note the admirable arrangement of having dusters on either side of the passenger cars and at the coupling of the cars and the roof above the platform, by which the dust is prevented from rising and annoying passengers. To prevent collisions, warning is given just before the train approaches a crossing, and a full stop made at that point. It is proper in this connection to notice, found incidentally in a Chicago paper, that, according to the last report of the Superintendent, (Mr. R. N. Rice) not one passenger was killed or a passenger car broken up during the past year.

Let us linger awhile at Detroit. This old city is the most important, in many respects, in the State of Michigan, and is located on Huron river, near Lake Erie and the little Lake St. Clair. The population is near 75,000. The principal streets are wide and attractive. The residences on the fashionable streets are usually built apart, and many of them very costly. Quite a number of beautiful churches may be seen. A noticeable feature is the beautiful and costly finish of the hall doors of the private dwellings of the better class. Each seemed to vie with his neighbor. Gen. Cass' residence is an object of interest to travelers. The old fashioned mansion is in the heart of the city and well located on the corner, and presents an air of comfort, notwithstanding its battered condition by Old Time. Here you enter the cars of the Grand Trunk Railway. Something over ten hours of brisk traveling brings you to Toronto, Canada West.

Toronto is situated on an arm of Lake Ontario, and was formerly called Little York. It is said the population has grown from 1,200 in 1817, to about 60,000.—The city contains a number of fine public buildings and places of interest, among which we name, the new University, nearly finished, and said to be the finest building in America; cost $3,000,000. The Insane Asylum, Knox College, English and Catholic Cathedrals, Crystal Palace and grounds, St. James' Cemetery, Parliament buildings, and Governor General's residence. Considerable stir prevails in the harbor. Travelers will notice here the striking difference between the Canadians and Americans in their appearance, habits, etc. The police are in uniform, and look bulky and awkward, but withal fail not to inspire terror to evil doers, as we had ample evidence on one occasion in the case of some wild chap who received the particular attention of an officer.

Those who wish to see Niagara Falls and the noted places in that vicinity, can easily do so without the loss of much time. One hour and thirty minutes ride in the cars from Guelph, on the Grand Trunk road to Harrisburg on the Great Western, and thence two or three hours travel over that railway, and the Suspension bridge is reached. The Falls is also accessible by rail from Toronto. It is vain to attempt a description of Niagara Falls. This wonderful creation must be seen to be fully appreciated.

Once there, and its sights seen, let us return to Toronto and finish our journey. The Erie and Ontario Railroad, several miles long, runs from Chippewa to Lake Ontario, Canada side. Chippewa is located two or three miles above the Falls. It is a town remarkable because of the bloody battle which occurred there on the 6th of July, 1814. As the train whirls you along near the mighty cataract, near by is the scene of the bloody action, known as the battle of Lundy's Lane. General Scott achieved great military glory at Chippewa and Lundy's Lane. The field is easily distinguished by the monument which marks the spot. The historian says: "During the six hours in which the parties were engaged in close combat, heightened by the circumstance of its being in the night, afforded such a scene as is rarely to be met with in the annals of slaughter. The evening was calm, and the moon shone with lustre when not enveloped in clouds of smoke from the firing of the contending armies." Passengers usually get on the train at the Clifton House at Suspension bridge, and the train backs up to Chippewa, and then starts from that point to the Lake.

Queenston, seven miles below the Falls, is the next place of importance that this road passes through, and nearly opposite the town of Lewiston on the American side, and head of navigation on lower Niagra river. The river is spanned here with a beautiful suspension bridge of 1045 feet. Here a battle occurred in the war of 1812. General Brock's (Commander of the British forces) Monument stands on the Heights of Queenston, and is one hundred and eighty-five feet high. The monument is quite visible from the cars.

Fifty-five minutes travel brings you to the terminus of the road, the town of Niagra on Lake Ontario, formerly the capital of the Province. Fort Massassauga is located on the Lake side of the town. Nearly opposite, on the American side, and near Youngstown, stands Fort Niagara. There is a remarkable history connected with this fort. It is said M. De Salle, an officer in the service of France, enclosed the spot with pallisades in 1679.—The fort was built in 1725, and taken possession in 1759 by the British. In 1796 it was surrendered to the United States. This old fort is as much noted for enormity and crime, as for any good ever derived from it by the nation in occupation.

On the arrival of the cars, the steamer Timmernian steams you across Lake Ontario to Toronto in two hours and a half. This sheet of fresh water is over two hundred feet above the level of the sea, mean depth five hundred feet, nearly two hundred miles in length, and average width forty miles. Toronto again.

Here is a choice in the mode of travel to Montreal, either by the Grand Trunk Railway, or steamers.—Tickets of this company, we believe, are good on the boats. Experience has taught us a lesson: We made choice of the Lake boat, and while out on that treacherous body of water, encountered a gale which was not without imminent peril of life. It is not uncommon for fierce gales suddenly to sweep over the Lake and destroy life and property.

The Grand Trunk passes through a number of thriving towns, such as Port Hope, Coburg and Belleville, before you reach Kingston at the foot of the lake. Coburg is a place of some importance, and is noted in the Methodist world as being the seat of Victoria College, and a Theological Institute. The students have the hearty look of English students. On the American side of the lake are the towns of Charlottville, the port of entry for Rochester, seven miles distant; Oswego, a beautiful and flourishing place of 15,000 inhabitants and historic fame, and also Sackett's Harbor, about twenty miles from the St. Lawrence river. Here a battle was fought in 1813, and is now the seat of a military post, called "Madison Barracks."

Kingston is an important military post, and contains about 11,000 inhabitants, and is located just at the entrance to the St. Lawrence. This place was called by the Indians "Cataraqui," a settlement, and was begun by the French in 1672. Among the attractive features of this route, is the passage down the St. Lawrence, through the "Thousand Islands." Travelers can take the steamer at Kingston for Brockville, forty miles, and pass through these "emerald gems in the ring of the wave." It is said, there are no less than 1800, from the islet of a few yards square to miles in length, and from an elevated point one hundred islands can be seen in one view. These islands, it is said, afforded an admirable retreat for the insurgents in the last Canadian insurrection.

Brockville, named in honor of General Brock, is situated at the foot of the "Thousand Islands," where passengers can resume their seat in the cars. The steamers from this point to Montreal pass through Long Sault, Cedar and Lachine Rapids. The passage through these difficult places is not freed from danger, and then the boats are not very comfortable and seen-worthy.

The next place of importance is Prescott, and contains 3,000 inhabitants. Ogdensburgh is on the opposite (American) side, and is a flourishing town, and one of importance for manufacturing purposes. During the war of 1812, a sharp conflict occurred between the British and Americans, in which the former succeeded in doing considerable damage to public and private property. The road passes through several small thrifty towns, and places of interest of historic character, such as Windmill Point and Christler's Farm. Towns are located here and there on the American side, ending at St. Regis.

The scenery along this route is picturesque and grand, and unlike the scenery usually on rivers. The river is unlike any other, and hazardous to navigate. The main way that runs alongside of the river is well named—Grand Trunk. There is an air of solidity about the construction much in keeping with the staunch English railways. The road appears well managed, and has admirable arrangements for supplying the physical wants. But here we are at the solid city of Montreal.

We propose to rest at this point and view the city at our leisure, and may be will give our impression of men and things. Let us anticipate points beyond, for the information of those who may wish to hurry on to Quebec, or the White Mountains, thence to Portland and Boston. You can go by steamer or rail to Quebec. If by the latter, you take the cars of the Grand Trunk and cross the great Victoria bridge, and run out to Richmond, and from thence—100 miles—to Quebec. Those en route for the White Mountains and Portland take the same road to Richmond, and continuing on the main road to Portland a distance of 292 miles. It may not be amiss to state, in this connection, that a powerful company are associated with the Montreal and Liverpool Ocean Steamship Company, whose arrivals are so frequently chronicled in the telegraphic dispatches of the papers. These steamers run weekly to and from Cork and Liverpool and Montreal, in connection with this railway, and arrangements are perfected whereby passengers are ticketed from Great Britain to leading points in the West and South. This grand undertaking will be a formidable competit of the Bible, was so rampant as now. The recent anti-slavery legislation of the Northern Methodist Church, making non-slaveholding a test of Church-membership, is palpable violation of both Apostolic precept and example, is a case in point. The ultra-independency of the Baptist Church, which has recently divided it, virtually, into two parties, is another. Under these circumstances, we are glad to find on record, in one of the leading quarterlies of the time, an earnest appeal to the scriptures. Whether we can agree with the writer or not, we heartily second the appeal to the only infallible standard. The question is too grave and momentous to give, in a short notice like this, a decided approval or disapproval. The writer himself, earnestly searching, as he does, for the authoritative truth, as this is his first essay on the subject, may, when the opposite side is presented, see cause to modify his views. We rather think he will. We urge him not to fall into the temptation of partisanship in defence of his views, but to preserve his present mental attitude and temper—that of a seeker after the truth. We agree with him that the Constitution of the Church is the Bible, and is not to be amended, and that, in this sense, there should be no such thing as Church legislation. We agree with him, also, that there is, in the popular sense, no such thing as "representation" growing out of "sovereignty." We agree with him, also, that the ministry are the divinely appointed interpreters of the doctrines, and administrators of the laws of the gospel. But there is such a thing as legislation, in the way of statutes, founded upon the Constitution; and, that the ministry should be, at the same time, the sole legislature, judiciary, and executive, we are not prepared to admit. The recent tyrannical action of the Northern General Conference is, also, a pregnant fact against such a view.

The fourth paper, on Hymns and Hymn-Writers, is highly valuable in itself, and more so, relatively, in view of the fact that the Hymn Book is now a part of the course of study for ministerial under-graduates in all our annual Conferences. None of these, especially, should fail to read the article, and, for all our people, no article could be more timely or beneficial. None who wish to understand our excellent Hymn Book should neglect it.

The fifth article, on the Greek Tragic Drama, is from the pen of a classical scholar, and will be a treat to all of that class especially.

The sixth article is from the pen of Rev. William A. Harris, President of Martha Washington College, Va., on Sasnett's Discussions in Literature and Religion, and reflects great credit on both the author and writer. We are glad that Dr. Sasnett's book has been reviewed in the Quarterly, and that it has had the good fortune to find such an able and appreciative critic. The book is well worthy the high praise which it receives.

The Brief Reviews of the editor are admirable. No department of the Quarterly is more valuable to our people.

HARPER FOR JULY is so well "done" in the letter of our New York literary correspondent, that we only need, in this place, refer our readers to what he says. He gives a better analysis of it than we can. It is enough to say that Harper is as good as ever. It is a great success, and is worthy of that success.

THE ECLECTIC MAGAZINE FOR JULY is one of the very best numbers of this monthly we have seen. It contains the best articles of the current numbers of the foreign quarterlies and monthlies. We have Macaulay and his Writings, from the London Review; Papal Rome, from the National Review; Solar Phenomenon, from Chambers' Journal; Darwin on the Origin of Species, from the British Quarterly Review; Preaching and Preachers—a review of Caird, Guthrie, Spurgeon, and Robinson—from the London Eclectic Review; the State of Europe, from the North British Review; Orators and Oratory, from the British Quarterly Review; and John Wycliffe, an interesting paper, from the London Eclectic.

WEEKLY SUMMARY OF NEWS.

CONGRESSIONAL.

In the Senate, on the 14th, Mr. Gwinn offered a resolution that the President be authorized to ask the British Government to enter into a convention to make provision for the return of each captured African as long as the 8th article of the Ashburton treaty remains in force; and if the British Government refuse to enter into such a convention, then the President shall satisfy the wish of this Government to have that treaty abrogated. This resolution was rejected.

In the Senate, on the 18th, the amendment to the Naval appropriation bill, providing for three steamers to suppress the African slave trade, was lost.

In the House, the resolution reported from the Committee on Elections, declaring that Mr. Anderson was entitled to retain the seat he now occupies as representative from the Fourth Congressional District of Kentucky, was adopted.

In the Senate, on the 19th, the House resolution to reduce the price of public printing 40 per cent, was amended by striking out 40 and inserting 25, and in that shape was passed.

The Committee of Conference on the Homestead bill reported that the House receded from its amendments, and agreed to the Senate bill, with certain amendments. Mr. Johnson explained that the Senate bill was not materially changed. The report of the committee was concurred in.

In the House, the Senate bill relative to the Hennpas land grant was passed.

In the Senate, on the 20th, Mr. Toombs, from the Conference Committee, made a report on the Civil appropriation bill, stating that an agreement had been arrived at on the amendments of both Houses, except one of the Senate appropriating $300,000 for the New Orleans Custom-house. The Senate receed from their amendment.

The resolution which provides for the postponement of the tariff bill till next December was taken up and reconsidered on motion of Mr. Bigler, of Pensylvania, and Mr. Lane moved to amend the bill by re-enacting the tariff of 1846. Debate ensued but the Senate adjourned without further action.

In the House, Mr. Davis reported a bill authorizing a loan of $21,000,000 for the redemption of treasury notes.

The House refused to suspend the rules in order to take up the River and Harbor bill.

The House passed the resolution for the final adjustment of private land claims in Florida, Louisiana, Arkansas and Missouri.

In the Senate, on the 21st, the House bill to establish a mail six times a week overland from San Francisco to Portland, Oregon, was passed.

Mr. Mallory, from the Conference Committee, made a report on the Naval Appropriation bill, in relation to the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, which was agreed to. The House having also agreed to the report, the bill is passed.

The report of the Conference Committee on the civil Appropriation bill was agreed to.

In the House the Senate amendment to the bill punishing Marshals and deputies who permit the escape of prisoners in their custody, was concurred in. The bill authorizes a fine not exceeding $2,000, and imprisonment not exceeding two years.

Among other Senate bills passed, was a bill carrying into effect the provisions of treaties between the United States and Japan, Spain and Persia, giving certain judicial powers to the Commissioners Consuls, &c.

In the Senate, on the 22d, the $20,000,000 loan bill was passed.

In the House the Post Office and Post Roads Committee reported a bill authorizing a postal contract from New Orleans or Mobile, around the Mexican Gulf, touching at twelve ports, according to Mr. Butterfield's proposition, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union. The $20,000,000 loan bill was passed.

Mr. Washburne, of Illinois, from the Committee of Conference on the Post-office Deficiency bill, stated that they were unable to agree, and asked to be discharged from further service, and that the House insist on its amendments, with verbal alterations, restoring the inland service, discontinued March, 1859, except where the same expired by limitation or improved the service furnished by railroad or otherwise, retaining the Isabel steamer contract clause; the Postmaster General to be debarred from discontinuing or curtailing the service in accordance with the existing laws. Motion agreed to.

In the Senate, on the 23d, (as we learn by Telegraph) a message was received from the President, returning the Homestead bill. The message was debated at considerable length, but no conclusion was arrived at.

In the House, on motion of Mr. Banham, the President was requested to furnish the House, at its next session, all obtainable information in regard to the disposition by the British Government of vessels engaged in the slave trade, captured by the English navy, and its disposition of the officers and crew of slavers thus taken.

In the Senate, on the 25th, the post route bill, which was amended by authorizing the Postmaster General to contract for a temporary steamship service to California, &c., was passed.

The resolution of the House reducing the price of public printing to forty cents a thousand was passed.

The consular bill from the House and the mail route bill between the United States and Mexico were laid over.

A proclamation for an extra executive session on the 26th was read, and the Senate adjourned sine die. The extra session is, it is said, for the purpose of taking action on the Mexican, Central American and Indian treaties.

In the House, the Senate's request was agreed to for another conference on the post-office deficiency bill.

The President sent a message recapitulating the grounds of his protest of last March against the action of the Covode committee, solemnly protesting against their unconstitutional proceedings. The message was referred to a select committee.

The House killed the post route bill by refusing to suspend the rules for its consideration.

A despatch says that the President signed the Civil appropriation bill, with a protest against Capt. Meigs superintending the expenditures of the Washington aqueduct.—Also that the business of Congress was, as usual, very hurried at the close, and that in the confusion the Post Office deficiency bill, the bill providing for mail service to the Pacific after the present contracts closed, were lost.

POLITICAL.

The Hon. Reuben Davis, Member of Congress from Mississippi, declines a re-nomination.

The Hon. John Galbraith, formerly member of Congress from the Erie District, Pensylvania, and for some years past the presiding Judge of the Sixth Judicial district of that State, died on the 15th inst., at his residence in Erie.

The National Executive Committee of the Union party, at Washington, holds meetings daily and are making preparations for a vigorous prosecution of the canvass.

Judge Semple Orr, of Springfield, has announced himself as an independent candidate for Governor of Missouri.

Active measures have been taken in Arkansas to organize for the support of Bell and Everett. A State Convention of the Constitutional Union party was to be held at the Hot Springs on the 21st inst., and it has been recommended that a thorough organization be made, and candidates for all offices be nominated.

The National Democratic Convention, which assembled at Baltimore on the 18th, was the scene of great excitement, during its tumultuous session of six days. After much discussion, the Convention decided to reject the Delegates who seceded from the Charleston Convention, and to admit certain new delegates from some of the Southern States, in the interest of Douglas, and declared by the old delegates to be bogus and irregular. As soon as this decision was announced, there commenced a stampede from the convention, Virginia taking the lead and being closely followed by North Carolina, Tennessee, and the whole South, and delegates from Oregon, California, and other States of the North. This was on the 22nd. On the morning of the 23d, the Convention having reassembled, the Hon. Caleb Cushing resigned his office of President, and Col. Todd, of Ohio, was chosen to succeed him. On the same day, the Convention nominated Senator Douglas for President, and Senator Fitzpatrick, of Ala., for Vice-President. The convention then adjourned sine die. A despatch from Washington states that Fitzpatrick has declined the nomination for Vice-President, and that the Douglas Executive Committee has substituted in his place the Hon. Herschel V. Johnson, of Georgia. The Picayune, in an article on the split in the Convention, very properly remarks:—"Ostensibly, the platform and the candidates had no part in the dissensions, which culminated in breaking asunder of the body. The apparent question was solely one of the right of membership, who should and who should not be members from the States which had seceded from Charleston. No vote on platform or candidate, was reached before the climax of disruption was reached. But really, the candidate and the platform appear to have guided the votes more than the inquiry into the regularity of the applicants under the usages of the party, and as representing the party organizations in the several States. The majority of the convention appears to have made it a rule that conformity to the platform, as adopted at Charleston, is the supreme title to membership wherever the doubt is raised; and the contested seats were parceled out upon the claimants on this principle."

The seceding delegates from the National Democratic Convention assembled in separate convention, in Baltimore, on the 22d, and made quick work of their business. Delegates from twenty-two States were present, viz: all the slaveholding States, California, Oregon, Massachusetts, New York, Pensylvania, New Jersey and New Hampshire. The Hon. Caleb Cushing, (who, on resigning the Chair in the other Convention, said that a majority of the States, in whole, or in part, had ceased to participate in the proceedings of the Convention, and it had lost its character as National Democratic Convention,) was elected President. The Committee on Platform reported the platform adopted by the majority of the committee at Charleston, which was re-adopted with great enthusiasm. The convention then proceeded to ballot for President, and on counting the votes it was found that John C. Breckinridge, of Kentucky, was nearly unanimously nominated. The nomination was subsequently made by acclamation. The Convention then proceeded to ballot for Vice President, when it was found that Gen. Joe Lane, of Oregon, was nominated. The convention then adjourned sine die, amidst deafening cheers for Breckinridge and Lane. It is understood that these nominations will be accepted

DOMESTIC NEWS.

EXPEDITION TO DISCOVER A NEW ROUTE TO EL PASO.—An expedition started from San Antonio on the 11th for the purpose of endeavoring to discover a new route to El Paso and other points. It consisted of a party of infantry under the command of Lieut. Holman, a number of wagons and some twenty camels laden with materials for the support of the expedition. Lieut. Eckles, of the corps of topographical engineers, accompanied the expedition. Sanguine hopes are entertained that a much nearer route than the one at present in use will be discovered.

A WEALTHY MAYOR.—The New York Express states that in 1848 Mayor Wood bought three acres of land at Bloomingdale for $7000, and that the property is now worth $200,000; also that the Mayor owns three hundred Central Park lots, valued at $10,000 each. If these figures are correct, Mayor Wood is worth $3,200,000 in landed property alone.

THE MORMONS.—The St. Louis Democrat states that Brigham Young proposes to the Government to sell the Salt Lake property, as he intends evacuating the Territory of Utah, and going with the Mormons to the Pacific coast. The bark Alacrity arrived at Boston on the 15th inst., from Cape Town, Cape of Good Hope, having on board eighty-seven Mormon passengers, men, women and children. They are bound to the great Mormon City of the West.

THE MONUMENT TO THE SIGNERS OF THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.—We learn from the Philadelphia papers that the Commissioners from the original thirteen States have chosen a site for this monument in Independence Square, also that the Commissioners have adopted an address to the Legislatures of those States, stating that the monument will cost not over $150,000, and suggesting that the sums to be contributed by the States shall be in proportion to the number of Representatives in Congress of each; that the material shall be granite, and the design distinguished for simplicity. The monument, it is said, will be so constructed as to admit of an appropriate inscription upon it by each of the original States, and the corner stone will be laid July 4, 1861, if the necessary amount shall be previously subscribed.

THE BENTON MONUMENT.—We learn that the gentlemen constituting the committee on the erection of a monument to the late Senator Benton, in St. Louis, have decided on a bronze statue, and selected the celebrated Miss Hosmer as the artist.

The Grand Duke Constantine of Russia has presented to Mr. William B. Webb, of New York, the builder of the war steamship General Admiral, a massive diamond snuff-box, as a testimonial of his personal esteem.

THE JAPANESE EMBASSY.—The Japanese arrived at Philadelphia on the afternoon of the 9th, and had a fine reception.—They remained a week in the city, seeing the sights and enjoying hospitalities, and on the 16th arrived at New York, where they were received with great enthusiasm. The military display on the occasion is said to have been one of the finest witnessed in that city for years past. The procession itself occupied several miles. The Japanese are quartered at the Metropolitan Hotel.

Col. Riply, of the Ordnance Department, has been authorized by the Secretary of War to make an extensive official tour of foreign countries, for the inspection of their various arsenals and armories, and means of defense generally.

UTAH.—Late accounts from Utah represent that the Indians in the Territory are still very mischievous, and not a day passes without some report of an attack upon emigrants and their trains coming to hand.

CARSON VALLEY.—Advices from Carson Valley state that the greatest excitement prevailed throughout the country regarding Indian hostilities. An army of Indians, reported to be over 15,000 strong, had stationed itself in the vicinity of Pyramid Lake. Six hundred hunters, under the command of Col. Hays, and two hundred troops at the head of which is Gen. Stewart, had gone in the direction of Pyramid Lake to attack them.

A terrific hail storm passed over Albany, New York, on the 17th, lasting half an hour, and doing great damage to property.

A municipal census of St. Louis has just been taken, with the following result: White males 73,320; white females 68,346; total whites 141,666; slaves 1245; free colored 1019; total population 143,930.

The New York Journal of commerce says it has been shown from reliable data that "if the entire products of the vineyards of Europe were exported to supply the natural trade of the city of New York alone, it would not be sufficient." These French are compelled to resort to imitations to supply this deficiency, and the consequent result is that but few brandies exported to this country from France are free from adulterations. "The city of New York alone sells three times as many pure imported brandies, annually, as all the wine-producing countries of Europe export."

The San Antonio (Texas) Ledger says that a committee of citizens recently waited upon General Shields, who was sojourning in that city, and requested that he would attend a public dinner to be given in testimony of appreciation of his gallant services. The General, wishing to live retired, declined the invitation.

HOUSTON AND NEW ORLEANS RAILROAD.—The Beaumont (Texas) Banner is of opinion that the portion of this road from Houston to the Sabine will be completed by August next, and that in about fifteen months the whole route from Houston to New Orleans will be opened.

The Claiborne Mercury gives very favorable accounts of the South Carolina rice crop. The rice is very handsome and pure and there is a good prospect that the crop will be the largest ever made.

Chicago, by a recent census, has a population of 150,000. It has increased rapidly within three years.

ACTIVITY OF THE LOWELL MILLS.—The Lowell News says the mills of that city are all running to their utmost capacity, and are turning out an immense amount of cloth.

Crowds of industrious German vine-growers and farmers are immigrating from Germany to Missouri. Some three hundred have already reached St. Louis.

We learn from a despatch that the brig Mariquita was seized at New York on the 2th inst., on suspicion of being a slaver.

THE JULY ECLIPSE.—The first of the American expeditions for observing the solar eclipse of July 18th, left New York on May 21st, in the steamship North Star, for Washington Territory. The others are about starting for Labrador and Hudson's Bay. The party for Washington Territory is under the direction of Lieut. Gillis, of the United States Navy, a practical astronomer. He has with him two assistants and a sufficient number of voyageurs—old employees of the Hudson's Bay Company—to cut a path through the forest and properly take care of the pack animals. They expect to be some twenty days absent from Steilacoom, where the party will land.

SUPPOSED SLAVER ON THE COAST OF TEXAS.—The Matagorda Gazette, of the 13th inst., says: "It is rumored that a Baltimore clipper, commanded by Spaniards or Mexicans, and having a very suspicious appearance, was seen off Passo Cavallo last week. She appeared to be trying to get a pilot, and at the same time avoid a group of vessels lying at anchor, just outside the bar, among which she seemed to suspect the existence of a revenue cutter. She is described as being a very trim and neat looking vessel, and decidedly the fastest sailor that has been in those waters for a long time. After some time spent in peering into our pass, and satisfying herself that there was nothing dangerous about our quiet bay, she sailed in the direction of Pass Aranasas."

Count de Gabriac, French minister to Mexico, and family, were in New York a few days ago, on their return to France.

JOSEPH BLUNT, Esq., a distinguished member of New York Bar, died in New York on the 14th, aged sixty-five years. Mr. Blunt enjoyed extensive practice. In politics he was of the old Whig school, and a devoted adherent of Adams and Clay, whose confidence he enjoyed. Mr. Blunt was a straightforward man in action and speech, both in his political and social intercourse with his fellow men. In addition to his legal learning, Mr. Blunt's literary attainments were of a high order.

Prof. I. N. Urner, who has been for some years officiating as Chairman of the Faculty in Mississippi College, was, at the last meeting of the Board of Trustees, elected President.

The New York City Council has appropriated $7000 for the Fourth of July celebration.

It is reported that Thomas R. R. Cobb, Esq., of Athens (Ga.,) has been appointed to fill the vacancy in the Supreme Court of the United States, caused by the death of Judge Daniel. Mr. Cobb is said to be an able lawyer. He is a younger brother of the Hon. Howell Cobb, Secretary of the Treasury.

ARIZONA.—A letter from Tucson says, "accounts of gold discoveries, in the vicinity of the Santa Rita copper mines, have reached us, which, if but true, will cause Arizona to divide the tide of emigration with the Pikes Peak country. Great excitement exists and our citizens are awaiting further reports in suspense. The new diggings, which were discovered by a party of experienced California miners while out prospecting, are on Bear Creek, some eighteen miles from the copper mines. The Arizonian publishes the following extract from a letter written by one of a party to a leading citizen of this place: 'We have found mines of gold and silver. The gulch in which we struck the gold is very rich, paying on the average twenty cents per pan, some of the pans paying even as high as a dollar. The section of gold-bearing country is extensive, and thousands of poor men can find employment.'" Arizona, throughout its length and breadth, is a gold-bearing country, and nothing but the scarcity of water in the auriferous regions has hitherto prevented it from rivalling California."

"CALIFORNIA.—Late accounts from California state that a meeting had been called in San Francisco to raise supplies for volunteers preparing for a campaign against the Indians. The Indians are seriously hostile about Pyramid Lake, and numbered from 1500 to 3000 warriors. In consequence thereof, 7000 to 8000 of the Washoe region miners had concentrated within a small space. The accounts from Washoe and other mining districts are of a most cheering character. The weather was somewhat milder, and the miners were in a good working condition.

We have favorable accounts of the crops in Oregon and Washington Territory.

The Japanese Ambassadors have declined to visit Boston. It is announced that they have determined not to leave New York until they sail for home.

The Hon. John Schwartz, member of Congress, from the Berks county district, Pensylvania, died in Washington a few days ago.

OHIO.—The Cleveland Democrat says: "From the returns already in, it is feared that the population of Ohio, instead of advancing, has slightly decreased within the last ten years by emigration or otherwise."

Great feeling has been excited in St. Louis, by the discovery that a member of a prominent mercantile house in that city, which lately failed, was a director of the State Bank of Missouri, and that he was indebted to that institution to the amount of $104,000.

A correspondence has taken place between the New York City Inspector, Mr. Delavan, and Archbishop Hughes, in regard to a requirement of law on the subject of the registration of marriages. The statutes require that clergymen, magistrates, and others who perform the marriage ceremony in the city of New York, shall keep a registry of the same, giving the names, etc., of the parties married. The penalty for neglect to comply with the provisions of law is fifty dollars for each offence. The Archbishop declines to comply with this requirement.

STEAMBOAT EXPLOSION AND LOSS OF LIFE. A despatch from Memphis states that the Memphis and St. Louis packet Ben Lewis exploded her boilers and burned to the waters edge on the morning of the 23th; also that Captain Holmes, Munson Harris, second clerk; Arthur Sharer, second engineer; and Frank Deylin, steward, are missing, and that P. S. Marshall, first clerk, and McGinnis, first engineer, were slightly scalded.

DREADFUL CATASTROPHE AT SEA.—A despatch from Cape May says that the United States surveying steamer Walker, which has been in service during the winter on the Florida coast, was run into the morning of the 22d, by an unknown schooner, off Absecom, and that the steamer sunk in thirty minutes. The Captain, officers and forty men were saved in boats. About twenty of the crew, at last accounts, were missing.

About 500 Mormons, who arrived in the ship Wm. Tapscott, from Liverpool, left New York on the 21st, on their way to Lake City. A large proportion of them are women, mostly of English birth, the remainder being Welsh, Germans and Scandinavians.

The Prince de Joinville, on his return from Canada, passed some days at New York and visited the Brooklyn Navy Yard where he was received in the most courteous manner and escorted by the Commodore over the yard and through the various works and shops, and on the Niagara, on board of which the distinguished visitor stayed some time, closely inspecting the machinery. On his departure the marines gave him a military salute. The Prince returned to England in the steamship Africa.

There is a report from Denver city that Fowler, the defaulting N. Y. Postmaster, has been seen and identified at Pike's Peak. Doubtful.

THE OGELOOSAS RAILROAD.—The Franklin (St. Mary Parish) Banner says the work on this road is progressing rapidly; and with good, favorable weather in the future, it is expected the cars will be running from Berwick's Bay and that point on or before the first of January next. The whole line between Berwick City and New Iberia, and even ten miles beyond that point is now under contract.

The Supreme Court of Missouri has pronounced a final judgment establishing the validity of the will of the late Judge Bryan Mullanphy, which has been in contest since 1831. The will, among other provisions, gave to the city of St. Louis one undivided third part of his whole estate, real, personal and mixed, in trust to constitute a fund to furnish relief to poor emigrants and travellers arriving at St. Louis on their way bona fide to settle in the West. The value of the real estate subject to this provision is estimated at two millions of dollars, one third of which goes to this trust.

FOREIGN NEWS.

We have room for only a brief summary of the interesting news from Europe received since our last issue, as follows:

GREAT BRITAIN.—In the House of Lords, Lord Brougham had characterized the bombardment of Palermo as the most atrocious act ever perpetrated. Lord Teynham had moved a series of resolutions virtually endorsing the doctrine of universal suffrage; but the proposition was ridiculed and negatived without a division. In the House of Commons, Mr. Cove having called attention to the message of President Buchanan, relative to the slave trade, and asked for information on the subject, Lord John Russell said it was unfortunately true that the slave trade prevailed extensively in Cuba, partly on account of the difficulty of searching vessels bearing the American flag, and partly from the defects of American law with respect to vessels fitted out for the slave trade. He said the British Government had proposed to the United States that they should act jointly, so that one vessel of war might deal with vessels hoisting the American flag, and the other with those fitted out as slavers. Owing to the obstructive policy of the Opposition, the Reform bill introduced by Lord John Russell, has been withdrawn by the Government. The latest report as to the steamship Great Eastern is that she was to sail on the 16th for New York. If this be correct she is now fully due.

FRANCE.—It is stated that, immediately after the formal annexation of Savoy and Nice, France will address a note to the European powers notifying the fact, and demanding a reply as a recognition of the annexation by Europe. The health of Prince Jerome Bonaparte had so far improved that no bulletins were issued. The 54th and 79th Regiments of the line and the 12th battalion of Riflemen, forming part of the garrison of Lyons have received orders to hold themselves in readiness to march to Annecy, in Savoy. Recent storms are reported to have done a great deal of mischief to the young wheat. It was stated that the French Government was about to increase its squadron on the Neapolitan station, in order that all French subjects residing in Naples might be taken on board.

PORTUGAL.—The Portuguese Government has received 20,000 Minie rifles, and has ordered 20,000 more. The Lisbon arsenal has been supplied with machinery for rifling cannon.—It is said that the Government has determined to fortify the country, and will commence by repairing the famous lines of Torres-Vedas. The Minister of the Interior has brought in a bill for abolishing the use of passports throughout Portugal.—The vines were looking very well. Many new vines have been planted, and when there is a cessation of the disease a large quantity of wine must be made.

ROME.—Fresh bands of insurgents were menacing the Roman frontier, and Gen. Lamoriciere had sent troops to check their progress.

SARDINIA.—The Sardinian Senate has approved of the cession of Savoy, and Nice by vote of 92 against 16. It is stated, in a letter from Genoa, that the Piedmontese Government, in order to be prepared for possible eventualities, is continuing its warlike preparations. The army placed on a war footing comprises at present an effective force of nearly 241,000 men; 116,000 infantry of the line, 17,000 cavalry, 19,500 riflemen, 6000 artillerymen, 3000 engineers, and a reserve of 45,500.—Letters from Turin state that the Sardinian Government will have to support Garibaldi, and therefore go to war with Naples or it will have to put down an insurrection at home, so excited is public opinion becoming in Piedmont. It was reported that, as a kind of half measure, Cavour was about to send a Commissioner Extraordinary to Sicily. Orders had also been given to prepare for sea all the men of war at Genoa and Spezzi.—The recent embarkation of 800 Chasseurs of the Alps at Genoa to reinforce Garibaldi, was effected without any possibility of the Government offering any resistance, as it was known that if troops had been marched down to stop the shipment of these auxiliaries the soldiers would have commenced going on board themselves.

NAPLES.—The Cologne Gazette asserts that the Queen Mother has been formally requested by her son to withdraw from Naples.

SICILY.—It is now stated that the capitulation of Palermo had been signed by the King, that the royal troops had evacuated the city, leaving Garibaldi master of the place. That shortly after the evacuation Garibaldi formed a Provisional Government, that he had issued a decree calling Sicilians between seventeen and fifty years of age to arm the vessels of war laying in the harbor of Palermo; that he would not undertake anything in Sicily for some days, being engaged in organizing his reserve; and that he was endeavoring to effect a loan for Sicily. Further it is stated that the King of Naples had invoked the intervention of the five great powers to guarantee the integrity of his dominions, and that they declined doing so; also that all the Sicilian garrisons had been ordered to concentrate at Messina. It is also stated that an English steamship had arrived at Marsala, from Queenstown, conveying 60 volunteers, 4000 rifles, and £1000 for Garibaldi, and that recruits were flocking to Garibaldi's standard from all parts of Sicily.

AUSTRIA.—It is reported that Austria is to increase the strength of the second army stationed in Italy; also that a corps of cavalry is to be collected in Italian Tyrol.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY.—A letter from Warsaw speaks of the concentration of Russian troops on the frontiers of Turkey as an undoubted fact. The Porte is at the same time using every effort to form a numerous army, in order to prevent Servia and the Danubian Powers conquering their independence. A letter from Odessa states that Pilgrims from Bosnia, Montenegro and Servia are travelling through Russia proclaiming the sufferings of the Christians in Turkey, and have excited among the Russian population an incredible hatred of the Turks and desire of revenge.

INDIA.—The Bombay Times says the Cholera is committing fearful ravages in some parts of the country and that the troops are suffering comparatively little.

NEW ZEALAND.—Advices from Melbourne state that several engagements between the British troops and natives in New Zealand had taken place.

THE FEJEE ISLANDS.—Intelligence has been received from Australia that the British Government has accepted the tender of the Fejee Islands made some time since.

It is reported that the English ship St. George, 90 guns, will accompany the fleet of the Prince of Wales, and that it will bring over the Prince Arthur and suite, who will travel with his brother while in this country.

Every drop of milk brought into Paris is tested at the barriers by the lactometer, to see if the "iron tailed cow" has been guilty of diluting it—if so the whole of it is remorseless thrown into the gutter—the Paris milk is very pure in consequence.

Intelligence has been received of a fearful tragedy which occurred on board the American ship Messenger on her passage down the China sea, laden with Coolies for Havana. According to these accounts, upwards of a hundred Coolies were shot before the mutineers were overcome.

AMERICAN INDIANS ENLISTING IN THE BRITISH ARMY.—A Canadian paper says that at a dinner given by the chiefs of the Six Nations, in honor of the birthday of Queen Victoria it was stated that a number of Indians of the Six Nations had enlisted into the 100th or Royal Canadian Regiment, and were arquitting themselves as regular soldiers with much credit. This is probably the first instance of North American Indians appearing in the ranks of the British army as regular uniformed soldiers.

The Emperor Napoleon, under the guise of a company, with a Government guarantee, has entered into arrangements to have ten new iron paddle steamers built in Great Britain, ostensibly for commercial service between France and the East; those steamers to be of ten thousand tons each, or just about half the size of the Great Eastern, being more than double the size of the Persia, the Adriatic, or the Vanderbilt.

The English papers announce that the Duke of Portland will probably be the purchaser of Newstead Abbey and the adjoining estates, the property of Lord Byron. It is thought that some interesting papers relative to Lord Byron will now be given to the world, Lady Byron having during her lifetime flung out this hint once or twice.

A large Crystal Palace on the model of the London one, is about to be erected at St. Petersburg, Russia. It is intended for a permanent exhibition of flowers and plants.

WEST AFRICA.—The country east of Liberia, Africa, has been penetrated, under the encouragement of the government, for 370 miles. The territory is found to be a beautiful, well-watered region, and many towns exhibit cleanliness, industry and economy. In some of the towns, of from 2,000 to 4,000 inhabitants, there were many looms; cotton was abundant, and iron manufactured by the people from the ore.

M. Augusto Meriotte, en eminent French archaeologist, writes from Egypt that he has discovered the remains of a large palace in granite in the immediate vicinity of the Sphinx. He takes this palace to be that of Chephrem, who built the great pyramids. No less than seven statues of this prince have been found in the palace.

The English papers state that, in compliance with a suggestion contained in a letter from the Lord Chief Baron, a committee is in course of formation for the purpose of collecting a fund for the erection, in Trinity College, Cambridge, of a statue of the late Lord Macaulay.

The completed portion of the new Westminster Bridge, London, England, has been lighted by the new lime light, which is of a pure white color, and of dazzling brilliancy, making all the old gas-burners appear like so many farthing candles.

The group of Isles on the French coast, opposite and within an hour's sail of Jersey, are to be strongly fortified and rendered capable of sheltering a fleet which may be kept for any emergency.

One of the effects of the late treaty of commerce with England is already visible in Paris. Several shops are crowded with English porcelain of very superior quality to that hitherto used in France.

The venerable Lord Lyndhurst completed his 88th year on the 21st of May, the day on which he made his great speech in the House of Lords in opposition to the repeal of the paper duty, and especially in defense of the right of the House to reject a money bill, which this was, it forming a part of the budget.

The Paris papers announce the marriage of Prince Poligune with Nille Mires, daughter of the Hebrew speculator and capitalist, and proprietor of the Constitutionnel. This marriage has excited considerable conversation in what is called society in Paris, as the Polignacs are of the purest blood, and but a dozen years past M. Mires was a vendor of old clothes about the streets of Bordeaux.

IMMENSE TARTAR EXODUS.—The Paris correspondent of the London Globe says: "A most important announcement reaches us from Moscow (dated 4th May) referring to a movement of a whole people, inferior of sloth to the hordes of Goths and Vandals made an exodus. A body of 300,000 Tartars, principally from the Crimea, abandon en masse the Russian territory, and seek to emigrate into European Turkey; being Mahommedans they had hoped, at the fall of Sebastopol, that the Sultan was to reign over the Chesonesus, or that the ascendancy of Islaam was somehow to follow. They have now made up their minds to go to Mahommed as Mahommed won't go to them; they have omitted to sow corn, or, indeed, make any arrangement for this year, and all these nomadic tribes are now striking their tents for the road, if there be one. Russia lets them go. It will create famous confusion on the lower Danube."

The immense traffic in London is proved by the fact that the granite pavement on Fleet street, which, when it was laid down in 1846, was nine inches in depth, was found, when it was taken up a short time ago, to be reduced to four and a half inches, having been ground or worn down four and a half inches in less than fourteen years.

The New Italy, a French journal published at Milan, states that the tunnelling of the Simplore is about to be accomplished by the Railroad Company of Italy.

The London papers announce the death of Lord Heytesbury, one of the oldest English diplomatists, in his eighty-first year. His diplomatic services extend over nearly sixty years. In July, 1841; Sir Robert Peel, then Premier, appointed him Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, which office he filled until Peel quitted the Government in July, 1846.

Mr. W. Parker Snow has written a letter to the London Daily News in relation to his proposed expedition to the Arctic regions in search of some additional information in regard to the Franklin Expedition. The route he proposes taking is around the Cape of Good Hope, and thence to the Arctic regions by the way of China, returning through Baffin's Bay, and thus making the circuit of the globe. He expects to direct his search particularly to determining the fate of the 105 men who landed at Point Victoria.

We learn from the English papers that the Birkenhead Commissioners have agreed to the introduction of horse railways through the principal thoroughfares of that town, on a plan proposed by Mr. Train of New York.

The London Times says that the British Government has granted the steamship Bulldog for the purpose of making a complete survey and soundings of the proposed route for a line of telegraph to America, via the Faroe Islands, Iceland, and Greenland, and that Sir Leopold M'Clintock has been appointed to the command of the Bulldog. The preparations for the departure of the expedition will be entered upon forthwith.

The English language has, of late, become a compulsory branch of education in the public schools in Norway.

LITERARY ITEMS.

The London Court Circular states that D'Israeli is busily engaged on a new edition of his popular novel, entitled, Sybil; or Both Nations.

A new and striking work by the author of The Natural History of Enthusiasm, (Isaac Taylor,) entitled, Ultimate Civilization, is in press in England.

The versatile Miss Strickland has found a new idea for an historical work—The Bachelor Kings of England.

The Hon. Edward Everett's Mount Vernon Papers in the New York Ledger will soon be published in book form.

Putnam announces that the biography of Washington Irving, including his literary correspondence, by Pierre M. Irving, Esq., his literary executor, will be published as soon as practicable, and will probably be completed in three volumes of the size and style of Irving's works.

It is said that the Emperor Napoleon is about to publish a History of Julius Cesar, in two volumes octavo, a work of great research, and on which he has been employed for some years.—The character of the Roman Dictator is said to be the object of the highest eulogy on the part of the imperial biographer.

The London Athenæum announces a curious discovery recently at Berlin. It appears that Frederick the Great had a splendid edition of his works prepared for publication, and then suddenly altered his mind, since when the edition has disappeared. Lately, some building repairs being necessary in the palace, certain nailed-up boxes were found, which turned out to contain the long missing edition.

Col. J. F. H. Claiborne, having completed his "Life of Quitman," has now in preparation the "Life and Journal of the Hon. George Poindexter." It is said that the work will contain a full account of the rupture of the first cabinet of President Jackson, as noted by Senator Poindexter, and in three letters from the Hon. Samuel D. Ingham, written just before it occurred and immediately thereafter.

Thackeray is about to publish his famous lectures on the Georges in the Cornhill Magazine, which he edits. He purposed, at one time, coming to this country in the Great Eastern, but was compelled to give up his intention in consequence of the additional labor forced upon him in preparing notes and supplements to the lectures.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

The Primitive Methodists of England now number 123,863 members, 5,343 chapels, and 610 traveling preachers. We see it stated that all the preachers are required to abstain from the use of intoxicating drinks and tobacco.

The Roman Catholic Church is putting forth great efforts to diffuse its religion throughout the East, where it formerly had very flourishing missions. The whole peninsula of India, Siam, Pegu, Ava, and the Malayan peninsular, are divided into 20 dioceses, in which are 22 bishops, 803 priests, and a nominal Catholic population of 908,656.

THE REV. DR. SCOTT AND THE LADIES OF HIS CONGREGATION.—A San Francisco paper, after referring to the absence of the Rev. Dr. Scott (formerly Pastor of the Presbyterian Church on Lafayette-square, in this city) on a visit on church business to the East, says: "Some days ago, his family started on a trip of a fortnight to the country. In their absence, the ladies belonging to the Doctor's congregation invaded his temporarily vacant residence, had all the interior of the house repainted and papered, and besides newly carpeted the floors of the parlors, library, etc. When the family of the Doctor get back, it is doubtful if they will recognize their own house, so completely has it been metamorphosed and rigged up. Dr. Scott is expected back by the 4th of July. He will come by way of the Salt Lake, or Central Overland route.

The Right Rev. Antony Blanc, Roman Catholic Archbishop of this diocese, died on the 20th inst., at his residence in this city, and was buried on the 22d, with the imposing ceremonies of the Romish Church. Archbishop Blanc was a native of France and came to the United States in 1817. He was consecrated Bishop on the 22d of November, 1833, was appointed Archbishop in 1854, and at the time of his death was in his 68th year. The deceased Prelate was highly respected.

We learn from the English papers that the Hon. and Rev. Dr. Henry Montague Villiers, Bishop of Carlisle, has been nominated for the Bishopric of Durham, in the room of Dr. Longley, who has accepted the Archbishopric of York. Dr. Villiers is the fifth son of the late Hon. George Vill

BY FANNY SHELDON.

Chapter VI.

"There is a sound of laughter light and gay,
And hurried welcomes, as of joyful greeting;
The stir and murmur of a holiday,
The grouping of glad friends each other meeting."

"Well, mother, cannot we plan some way for you to make a visit to aunt Margaret's. It is not so very far, and I know it will give you pleasure and improve your health," said Alline, one day.

"I do not know, my child," answered Mrs. Elwin; "it has been so long since I left home that it seems like a great undertaking; still I should like to go. But who is to go with me—your father cannot leave his business, and who will keep house for him when I am gone?"

"I have thought of all this, mamma. I must remain at home to see to the comfort of father. You are so much better now that you will not need my nursing care, and you know our cousins will give you all the attention you will require. You can get cousin Alfred Owen to take you and Mary in an open buggy, and the drive will refresh you so much."

"I am afraid that it will rather fatigue me," answered Mrs. Elwin, "for you forget, Alline, that it is twelve or fifteen miles to your aunt's; nevertheless, I am inclined to go, if it be can arranged as you think."

Alline soon had all arrangements settled for the departure, and on a bright morning a day or two after the visit was thought of, Alline and Mr. Elwin placed the invalid in the buggy with Mary, and after charging the young man to take care of his wife and child, Mr. Elwin added to the somewhat wild but kind Owen, in a playful tone, half in jest and half in earnest,

"You had better not come back, Fred, if you kill my wife and child."

The young man laughed cheerfully, and in a careless, defiant manner, cracked his whip, and the spirited horse moved rapidly off, and Mrs. Elwin waved her handkerchief in a last adieu. Mr. Elwin stood looking after them with an anxious gaze, and not till they were out of sight did he turn away to the cares of business. Alline missed her mother and little sister very much, and as each day came and went, she comforted herself that, however long seemed the time, it was surely rolling on.

Mrs. Elwin had gone a week, and this was the period fixed upon for her return. It was Saturday morning, and Alline rose earlier than usual in anticipation of the arrival; her toilet was soon made, and hastening to the breakfast-room, she met her father as he took his seat at the table with much cheerfulness.

"What time to-day," she asked, "do you think mamma will get home, papa?"

"I have been thinking, my dear, that she may not come at all to-day," answered Mr. Elwin, "and almost hope Owen will not try to come," he added, much to the surprise of his daughter.

"Why, father, I thought you were as anxious to see her as I could be," she replied, in a tone of disappointment.

"And so I am, my child, and shall rejoice to have them come to-day, if I thought it would be safe for them to travel; but, Alline, you know it has rained incessantly almost every day since they have gone, and Black Creek is to cross, and I fear that Owen may venture in though there may be danger, for he is willful and persistent at times. I have wished since they left I had not committed your mother and Mary to his care. However, cheer up, all may be right. I rely much on your mother's judgment and experience in being them safe."

The day wore slowly on, and though Alline had endeavored to be patient and to employ herself in some way that the time might pass swiftly away, she accomplished little, and found that toward evening she grew restless and anxious. At dinner her father appeared to be more cheerful, and remarked—

"Well, Ally dear, I have thrown off my anxiety, but yours seems to have increased. You must shake off your fears, and bear your disappointment bravely. I have no idea that they will come to-day. Perhaps they may start to-morrow, though it would be wiser in them to wait till next week."

"If there is danger, father, I too wish they may not come."

As evening closed in, Alline did not regain her usual spirits, but after tea retired to the window, and drew the curtain about her person to shade herself from the light within the room. She sat long looking out into the silent night; the moon was rising, shedding her misty rays far up the misty depths of the blue vault; one by one the brilliant stars came out to gem the scene, till the jeweled canvass glowed with sublime beauty. The brightness of the picture upon which she gazed calmed the troubled heart of the sweet, gentle girl; and as thoughts of this world and its trials faded slowly from her mind, her soul anticipated and was filled with that peace which is promised to those who find a home far beyond the starry skies. Night was far advanced when she arose and sought her chamber.

Quite early on the next morning she sprung lightly from her bed, and throwing open the blinds of her window, she was greeted by the rising sun; the dew glistened upon the grass and flowers, the birds hopped from tree to tree, warbling their sweet notes in hymns of praise. The fresh morning air, as it lifted the disheveled hair from the fair face of Alline, invigorated while it added a glow to the pale cheek of our heroine; and as she stood contemplating the grandeur of the scene and the majesty of the God of day, slowly and reverently her lips parted, and "great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty," was the utterance of a heart grateful for the impress of divinity which it saw in all the works of nature. The tones of her own voice roused her from her revery, and she hastened to perform her toilet, which was never at any time very elaborate; and this morning she was robed in a plain snowy morning wrapper, confined at the waist by a blue cord and tassel, with flowing sleeves, from which gleamed the fair white arms; her dark hair was braided with care and taste. Her father's eye rested upon her as she entered the room and presided at the morning meal with fond admiration, and pride swelled his heart as he continued to gaze upon the pure brow where not only beauty but goodness had set its seal. It was the Sabbath day which had dawned upon the world again in its calm beauty. The church bells rang out their solemn chime, calling the inhabitants of the village to their morning service, and reminding them that on this day God had not only rested from all his labor, but that he had sanctified and blessed it. Many hearts were filled with that peace which passes all understanding within that little fane, but from none did there arise a purer or more heart felt prayer than from the bosom of Alline Elwin, as she walked slowly on with those whose feet went up to the worship of God. The murmur of prayer and the hymn of praise arose on the still air, and drawn on by its sweetness, she soon stood among that humble christian throng; but Alline's devotional thoughts were interrupted as the form of the minister arose in majesty and beauty before her; his dark eyes were lit by the fervent emotions which swelled his soul; his voice was eloquent in its tone, and as his text fell upon the ears of his congregation, it sank with the sweetness of manna deep into each heart, and every one felt that he brought a message to their souls. His own heart glowed and expanded with his subject, his tones grew more and more impassioned, and with hands clasped and eyes raised toward heaven, he ended as he had began with his text, "Glory be to God who giveth us the victory over the world!"

Alline owned as much the charm of the eloquent being before her as she appreciated the glory of the subject on which he spoke; not that she loved the minister, for it was the first time she had ever seen him; it could not be friendship, it was not love. Define it she could not, yet it was only that strange, rare sympathy which one sometimes meets by the wayside in its journeyings through this strange land, like the little fountain which ripples and gurgles along its pebbly bed, and wonders of what use it can be so deeply, darkly hidden in the dell where no eye may admire its beauty, no joyous children play by its side, or toss its sparkling drops in glee; and yet, little stream, you may meet the wants of a thirsty traveller once in long years, and the fervent "God be thanked!" which shall spring from that heart, shall be grateful incense offered up to you and your Maker which shall repay you for your seeming neglect, and teach you that God does all things well. It was not friendship, nor yet was it love, but it was the sympathy of one good heart for another. Alline felt that if there was any one who could understand and appreciate her self-sacrificing disposition, her passionate longings and bright hopes, it was this man of God; yes, like the fountain in the wilderness, the stream in the dell, when he least expected it he had met the requirements of one poor young heart. He had often wondered why he, so lonely and desolate, should still live on. Was it to bring peace and comfort to Alline's young heart that he had been spared through so many trials? And what had she to give in return for this rare sympathy of souls? He could sympathize with and understand her—he could love her, perhaps, and what had she to give him in return for this oneness of feeling which she prized so much? Only the "God be thanked!" which the thirsty traveller gave to the hidden brook. This was all Alline had to give. The day had begun in disappointment, and was passing away, but she had ceased to feel her disappointment; her mind was occupied with the scenes of the day, what she had seen and felt, and seated in her little room, we will leave her for a while.

Mr. Elwin had thought that Frederick Owen would not attempt to travel while the roads were in such a bad condition; but he was mistaken. Owen had made up his mind to go home, and overruled Mrs. Elwin's objections by urging that he had business to attend to which required his presence, and, accordingly, on Sunday they commenced their journey. The rain had ceased, and the sun shone with unclouded splendor; but the road was very heavy, and the horse found some difficulty in getting on, owing to trees and brush which had fallen or washed upon the road. It was mid-day when they arrived at the creek. Mrs. Elwin remarked to him, as they came in sight of the water, that the bridge had been washed away," and," she said, "see how the water has risen since we came over a week ago. It is certainly dangerous to venture in; let us return."

"Oh, no," answered the young men, "do you not see the wagon tracks which have been made since the rain; others have passed over, do not be alarmed, I will take you through safe," and urging the horse on, they entered the swollen water.

But scarcely had the animal's hind feet left the bank, when Owen rose hastily to his feet in the buggy, crying out in great alarm—

Mrs. Elwin clasped her little Mary closely to her breast and showing that presence of mind which she knew was all that could avail them in their perilous situation, she tried to encourage the young man, for she saw he was losing all command of himself and of the horse also. She told him to cheer the animal by kind words, but to control him by firmness and judgment, and pointing out to him the direction of the current, and the lowest and only place where they could expect to pass out on the opposite shore, she bowed her head on that of her child, and tried to commend herself to the care of heaven.

Owen still stood upright, with the reins in his hands, urging and cheering the noble animal, which bravely and faithfully struggled through the deep, rapid current. The water rose around Mrs. Elwin and her child, sweeping through the open vehicle with such force that she with difficulty retained her clasp upon her little one; but she spoke not, save only to encourage Owen, till the opposite bank was reached, and the horse, frightened and almost exhausted, struggled up the high and slippery bluff.—Then indeed she spoke—the sincere, heartfelt gratitude which filled her bosom. Owen, like most men, was ashamed of the fear which he had exhibited, and began to laugh and ridicule their appearance; but it was of no use, for, as Mrs. Elwin remarked, his face was literally purple with fright.

The horse was scarcely able to reach home, so great was the exertion he had made. Mr. Elwin had become very restless and anxious toward evening, and was not a little relieved when he at last saw them come in sight.

Alline's revery was broken by the tones of the child, as she tried to tell her father of the big well into which her mother, cousin Fred and herself had fallen; and hastening out, she fondly welcomed them home.

Mrs. Elwin's health suffered from the excitement and bath more than was anticipated; she grew more feeble each day; her cough increasing, soon terminated in a hemorrhage, which alarmed her friends very much.

HISTORY OF A SUNDAY SCHOOL.

MR. EDITOR: I send you an extract of a letter from my brother, Rev. J. G. Cotton, Harris county, Georgia. It was not intended for the public eye—but it may do good. It may serve to encourage other Sabbath-school teachers to perseverance, and not despise the day of small things. He has been diseased in his throat since fall, from over working in protracted meetings, though a local preacher. He writes: "I do not enjoy religion as I have sometimes done. It may be in part from the fact that I cannot preach, and in part from worldly care. I am trying to do some good by attending a Bible-class in our Sunday-school, which is truly interesting. We have a school of some fifty or more in regular attendance. I commenced the school about the year 1831, and it has been in operation ever since except two years. I was sole teacher and superintendent for some years. After a while I got some little irregular aid; by degrees we have worked on, till now our teachers are at their post, unless sickness prevent, children are punctual, and parents take much interest. For twenty-five or twenty-six years I acted as teacher and superintendent; for two or three brother J. J. Little has been superintendent. During the last two or three years past, four or five that were taught in my Sunday-school have been converted and have gone out to preach. I hope others are in training for that work. Many, how many I can not tell, have been converted, and are gone to heaven, or are living to bless the world. We have had several in our Church, I think, nearly every year for the last twenty years, while Churches where there was no Sunday-school have hardly a revival once in five years. I am inclined to think that the most extensive and efficient revivals are where there is an efficient Sunday-school. When once you get one of these children converted, he is most sure to become a stable and useful member of the Church. We shall have a celebration at the close of our first term, which has been our custom for years, at which we generally have a high time. We meet on Saturday and examine the smaller classes—have some nice dialogues and speeches among the children, and a fine dinner. Many people attend, and seem highly pleased. On Sabbath morning we meet, examine the larger classes, and have some speeches from the larger students, and then an address or sermon—then close and go home for dinner. By these means we get the people out, and they see what progress the children are making. There is with each year a deeper sense of the importance and usefulness of the school. It is remarkable for good order and intelligence. This community is seldom surpassed by any country neighborhood for benevolence and consideration in reference to the wants of the Church, and ministry, it is seldom equaled. Our Church raises annually $200 or $300, for church purposes, while there are many churches, of equal wealth that do not raise half that amount. This I think is owing in part to Sunday-school training.

The venerable Dr. L. Pierce writes: "My health and strength to preach seem to improve rather than to diminish. I am a wonder unto many; I am in my 76th year. Since the death of brother Arnold, I am alone in Georgia, have no real cotemporary."

BRITISH NAVY FOR 100 YEARS.

A return moved by Mr. Horsman, says the London Times, has been published, from which some interesting facts may be gleaned as to the increase and decrease of the naval estimates and naval strength of this country during the last 103 years. The return comprehends the periods between 1756 and 1859, during which time we were engaged in no less than thirteen wars—viz., four with France, three with Spain, two with America, one with Holland, two with China, and one with Russia—and spent in naval estimates a collective sum of 795,497,113*l.* 10*s.* 7*d.*, or a larger amount than is at present represented by the national debt. While the strength of the navy in men is not much above 5000 more than it was in 1756, the estimate of the two periods are very different, the estimates for 1756 being 3,349,021*l.* 3*s.*, and for 1859-60 9,878 859*l.* We merely point out this vast discrepancy, as we are at the same time well aware that the increased expenditure in the present day for wear and tear by machinery, coals, superior armaments, and superior vessels is absolutely necessary. In the year 1756 the total number of men borne was 52,809; and the estimated expense 3,349,021*l.* 3*s.* For the next seven years, in consequence of the war with France, we find a vast increase in the number of seamen; insomuch that in 1762 the number borne was 84,797, and the estimates for the navy 5,954,251*l.* 12*s.* 9*d.* Peace being proclaimed in 1764, this vast mass of men was reduced to 20,603, and the navy estimates fell in like proportion to 2,094,800*l.* 9*s.*, these numbers being further reduced in 1768 to 15,511 men, and 1,526,357*l.* 0*s.* 11*d.* This is the lowest point ever reached in our naval estimates.—On the breaking out of war with America in July, 1774, they again rose to the sum of 2,104,917*l.* 4*s.* 3*d.*, and gradually increased up to the conclusion of the war to 8,063,-285*l.* 23*s.* 9*d.*, with an increase of 105,443 men. During this period, however, it must not be forgotten that the country was involved at the same time in a struggle with France, Spain, Holland, and America. In 1782, on the recognition of American independence, and in 1783, on the conclusion of peace with Spain, France, and Holland, the estimates again fell, and continued to fluctuate between 2,000,000*l.* and 3,000,000*l.* sterling, with an average of about 26,000 men borne. The war of the French Revolution breaking out produced the ordinary effects, and the estimates rose as the funds fell. In 1793, when war was declared, the number of men borne was 59,042, and the estimates 3,971,915*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.*; in the next year they increased to 5,525,331*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.*, with an increased list of 83,891 men borne on the books. Stride by stride they advanced until in 1801 they rose to the enormous sum of 16,857,037*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.*, when the number of seamen and marines was 131,959. On the conclusion of the peace of Amiens they again, for a short time, fell; but the stirring events of the period, the unsettled condition of Europe, and the want of confidence in France precluded them from finding a peace level, and, although there was a decrease of more than 6,000,000*l.*, yet they still remained 6,000,000*l.* above the estimates of 1763, when the war commenced. Then ensued the great war with France from 1803 to 1815, when the naval expenses and naval strength of the country advanced with gigantic strides, so that for four years—viz., the years 1811-12-13-14, they were always over 20,000,000*l.*, and in the latter year reached the enormous sum of 23,504,070*l.* 19*s.* 11*d.*, with a force of 126,414 men, which force, however, was not equal to that of 1813, when our ships were manned by no fewer than 148,047 men. Down went these estimates again on the conclusion of the peace, and continued in that condition up to the pet year of the non-alarmists, who believe in the good intentions of every country but their own, when they were only 4,434,783*l.*, and provided for only 26,041 men. From that time they have progressively increased up to our own days. The Chinese war of 1840 seems to be guilty of this increase; for although peace was concluded in 1842-3, the naval estimates only temporarily declined to rise again with fresh vigor and culminate in the year 1856-57, when this country was at war with Russia. In that year they reached the sum of 16,568,614*l.*, and maintained a force of 60,659 seamen and marines. They again fell on the conclusion of peace to more than 6,000,000*l.*, and in the year 1858-59 were 9,878,-859*l.*, of which but a comparatively small portion was expended on the pay and maintenance of 58,380 men.—What effect the present Chinese entanglement will have upon them we must leave to the judgment of our readers.

BOSTON AND NEW ORLEANS.

The following is from an editorial of the Delta: By way of illustrating this ignorance about the most common and prominent Southern facts, among the Northern geography-mekers and history-compilers, we give the following statement, from a leading journal published in our modern Athens, in regard to the commerce of Boston:—"Boston, according to our recent statement of the Post, is to-day the second commercial city in the United States.—Her imports in 1859 were $41,174,070; her exports $16,172,120, and her tonnage was 455,622 tons. Boston has nearly one-half of the registered tonnage of New York, and these two cities combined own more than one-half of the entire shipping in this country that is engaged in foreign trade—i. e., 1,248,000 tons, out of 2,400,000 tons of registered shipping." So far from being the second commercial city in the Union, the commerce of Boston is not one-half that of New Orleans, as will be seen from the comparison of the following figures:

COMMERCE OF BOSTON AND NEW ORLEANS COMPARED.

Boston	Value	New Orleans	Value.
Imports	$41,174,070	Imports	$16,078,092
Exports	16,172 120	Exports	100,734,959
	$57,346,190		$117,413,051
			57,346,190
Excess in favor of New Orleans			$60,007,861

The figures in regard to New Orleans are taken from the Price Current of this city, in its last annual statement.—The exports include only those which are sent to foreign countries. Properly we should include all that is sent from our ports, whether to foreign or domestic ports.—The would swell our exports and imports to over one hundred and fifty millions. The estimated value of the principal articles of produce landed in New Orleans, during the year 1859, was $172,952,864. Nearly this total amount may be set down under the head of exports.

The comparison of the tonnage of the two cities is still more startling. The tonnage of Boston is stated by the Post as 455,622. That of New Orleans, for the year 1859, according to the New Orleans Price Current, was 1,182,082, or nearly three times as great as that of Boston. This refers to the tonnage employed in external commerce.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MRS. ANN BOZEMAN BUTT was the daughter of Franklin C. and Ann Matilda Heard. She was born in Greensboro', Ga., August 12th, 1829, but was reared in Mobile, to which place her parents moved when quite young. Here she became the playmate of her future husband, C. W. Butt, who was not much her senior. They became attached to each other, and resolved at a very early age, when the proper time should arrive, to unite their fortunes together. The affection proved lasting; indeed it grew instead of waning as they advanced in years. Many vicissitudes crossed their path, some of which seemed to forbid their union; but at length it was consummated, bringing with it a happiness realized by few in this world. Being the child of praying parents who was converted and became a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church at the age of twelve. Her piety was quiet and unobtrusive, wholly devoid of ostentation, convincing the beholder of her perfect sincerity. No word so well describes her character as the word lovely. In no respect was she spasmodic, exhibiting those extremes which usually attend an untrimmed, unchastened temper. On the contrary, her life was quiet, tranquil and lovely, shedding forth a mild radiance in all the relations she was called on to assume. It was her nature to be loving and gentle, and constant in all her attachments. Her husband soon amassed a fortune which added to the felicities afforded by friends, kindred and social position, made her lot a very happy one. On the 21st of February, 1860, she passed away. She found it difficult for some time to be reconciled to death. God had made life so happy to her, and so intense was her love for her husband, children, friends and kindred, that to give them up caused her a struggle. But every breath was a prayer; she gained the victory, and went up to the saints' everlasting rest. Oh, how dark seemed this dispensation to her husband who loved her so profoundly. Like a true Christian he has been battling against the murmurings which have arisen unbidden in his heart, and soon we doubt not, he will be enabled to see that behind a "frowning providence, God hides a smiling face."

MRS. RACHEL D. EVANS, wife of Joshua D. Evans, was born in Butler county, Ala., September 26th, 1818. In Talladega, Ala., at a camp meeting, 10 Oct. 1839, she professed religion and joined the M. E. Church. She remained a consistent member until her death, May 28th, 1860. Though she suffered long she never murmured. When the fatal hour came she was happy, calm, and tranquil; gave her weeping husband and children appropriate exhortation, with a pledge to meet her in heaven. A friend said to her, "What shall I say to the Church for you?" "Tell them I die in peace," and quietly fell asleep in the arms of Jesus. Sister Evans was a good wife, a tender mother, a kind mistress, and much beloved by her friends. She left a husband and seven children to mourn her loss.

H. J. HUNTER.

MRS. MARGARET McDOWELL, daughter of Reuben and Sarah Cassells, and wife of James McDowell, departed this life June 4th, 1860, of typhoid fever. Her department all through her short Christian career has been such that none can doubt but that she was a faithful servant of God. She was a dutiful wife, and a kind, affectionate mother. She endeavored to instruct her little children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, and had the blessed consolation of knowing on her dying bed that she had faithfully discharged her duty to her children, to her husband and to her Creator. She was in the bloom of womanhood. We cannot say that she is dead, since we behold the fruit of her labor. She has passed from earth, yet we have the blessed assurance that she has gone to enjoy the perpetual youth of heaven.

DAVID W. DIKE.

WILLIE, infant son of Wm. M. and Mary E. Rossel, died near New Salem Church, Perry county, Ala., on the 30th ult., at the early age of one year eight months and five days.

Without a stain upon his little heart,
Without a care upon his infant mind,
Unsullied, pure,
Death wooed him gently to his chill embrace
And lulled his spirit into quiet sleep
With Angel's songs.

LOUISA JANE COLTON, eldest daughter of B. and E. A. Colton, died in Choctaw county, Miss., on the 13th of May, 1860, aged 14 years 4 months and 9 days.

She died in the faith, and her last words were, that she was going to heaven. She requested her parents to write to her relatives and tell them she was going to heaven, and for them to meet her there. We mourn her loss; but, thank God, not as those mourn who have no hope.

R. COLTON.

MARY NARCISSA, infant daughter of James and Mary Conerly, died at Holmesville, Miss., on Friday, June 15th, 1860, aged one year and twenty-one days. She suffered a severe illness of two months, when her spirit departed to dwell with Him who says: "Suffer little children to come unto me."

PROGRESS OF PROTESTANTISM IN MISSISSIPPI AND THE SOUTHWEST.—No. XXI.

MR. EDITOR—I shall not undertake biographical sketches of all the Methodist ministers who were abundant in labors and success here in early times, because that, in many instances, this has been done by abler pens than mine. In the printed minutes we have short, but very readable sketches of Learner Blackman, Samuel Parker, Lewis Hobbs and others; and in the "Biographical Sketches of Itinerant Ministers," we have a fine life sketch of John Lane, by H. M. Drake; and of Richmond Nolly, by H. N. McTyeire. I would recommend all who have any love for the holy, and beautiful as exemplified in the lives of good men, to get that volume from the Depository, and enjoy a rich intellectual and spiritual feast in its perusal.

My purpose is to take up such cases as may soon be lost in the Church unless committed to writing speedily, and such cases as may not only amuse and instruct, but also solemnly warn us, as their successors in the ministry, of the dangers to which we are exposed, and the rock upon which we may be wrecked.

John Shrock was originally admitted into the South Carolina Conference, and after travelling Lincoln circuit, in 1811, as the junior of Robert Porter, and Rocky River, in 1812, as the junior of John Hill, he, with John J. E. Byrd, was transferred to the Mississippi District of the Tennessee Conference, while he traveled Tombeckbee circuit, in 1813, as the junior of Richmond Nolly, and in 1814 Rapide circuit, in Louisiana, after which he located, and remained in that relation to the close of life. In the life of this minister, who was, no doubt, a chosen vessel of the Lord, we find much to admire, and much to regret, and by a review of his whole career we may learn lessons of instruction and solemn warning. He was of German extraction, and a native of South Carolina. When a youth he attended a camp meeting, where he was brought to see and feel himself a guilty and lost sinner, without an interest in Christ, and where, after a season of deep penitence, he was brought to rejoice "in a knowledge of salvation by the remission of his sins." His conversion was sudden and clear, and he gave vent to the raptures of his new born soul in loud shouts of praise to God, and in earnest exhortations to all around to "taste and see that the Lord is good." The Church soon saw that he had a talent for usefulness, and called on him frequently to exercise his gifts in prayer and exhortation. Being a "striker" in a blacksmith shop, and his literary attainments being very limited, with but small opportunities for improvement, while he daily felt a burning, consuming desire to save souls, he could not for some time admit his designation for the Christian ministry. His brethren, however, believed him called of God to preach the gospel, and obtained his consent to be recommended to the annual Conference, where he was admitted and appointed to a circuit. He went on his work with the most humble views of his capacity for usefulness, and believing unless he was "endued with power from on high" he could not fulfill the purposes of his holy calling: he spent much of his time on his knees, reading his Bible, and praying for the Spirit to "guide him into all truth." He carefully noted all his duties as laid down in the discipline, and endeavored to discharge them all as time and opportunity offered. This, in connection with his warm hearted prayers, exhortations, and songs, gave him favor in the eyes of the people, and he was rapidly rising in popularity and usefulness, when, in an evil hour, he gave way to pride and self-confidence, and met with a painful but profitable overthrow. How certain it is that "pride goeth before a fall," and that "he that exalteth himself shall be abased." Hitherto Mr. Shrock had cultivated a spirit of unfeigned humility, and a constant sense of his dependence on the Holy Spirit for strength to discharge the duties of his holy office. He did not believe that he was yet a preacher, and doubted whether he ever would be one in the proper sense, but he was happy and successful in his exhortations and class-meetings, and felt encouraged to go on. At a Saturday appointment he had a congregation of good size, and felt the Spirit with him in all his exercises. By arrangement he went home with a class-leader, who was to accompany him next day to his appointment, where he anticipated a congregation of several hundred hearers. As soon as he entered the house of his host he retired to "the preachers' room," and betook himself to his studies. After a little he overheard the wife of the class-leader asking her husband if he noticed that brother Shrock preached from the same text that brother Porter did at his last appointment, to which he answered affirmatively. "There," said Shrock to himself, "I have ruined myself in the estimation of that congregation, for now they see the great disparity between my bungling efforts to preach, and the superior style and arrangement of brother Porter. I wish I had taken another text." After a short pause the good sister continued, "and regarding to my judgment he preached a better sermon than brother Porter." "Ah, my sister," solilloquized the listener, "I know you are mistaken; you are no judge of what constitutes good preaching." "Yes," responded the old gentleman, "that is my deliberate opinion: he preached a better sermon on that text than brother Porter did." Just there, Mr. Shrock said, Satan began to gain an entrance, to stir up the remains of pride in his heart, and to use his own expression, "he began to swell like a toad getting ready to run over an ox." Said he to himself, emphatically, "that old class-leader has read all of Wesley's sermons and many others; he has heard Hope, Hull, the Pierces James Russell, and most of our leading preachers, so that he is a judge of preaching, and if he says I outpreached brother Porter it must be so, and no mistake." Just there it occurred to his mind how much better he could do next day with a little extra preparation before hand. Full of the idea of preaching "a tremendous sermon" to his large Sabbath congregation, he went to work, selected his text, and planned his discourse, and by eleven o'clock next day, had grown up to mature manhood as a preacher, in his own estimation. Entering the pulpit clothed with self-confidence, instead of being "filled with the Spirit," he went through the preliminary exercises without embarrassment, announced his text, and called the attention of his auditors to five general propositions which he was going to elaborate. But at that point the curtain fell, and a horror of great darkness came upon him. He tried to recall the first, second, and third heads of his intended sermon, but they were utterly gone, and horribly and filthy immediately followed them. In his embarrassment he rubbed his brow, then thought he would deliberately read over his text, and that would probably recall his fugitive sermon, but, alas! the location of the text on the sacred page could not be found, nor could it be repeated by memory. His discomfiture was now complete, and precipitately leaving the pulpit, he said to the class-leader as he passed out, "if you can do anything for these people do it, for I cannot." His first impulse was to mount his horse, and as soon as he could get out of sight, to leave the road and hide himself far away in the forest, where he could spend the afternoon in weeping penitence for having been "lifted up with pride, and falling into the condemnation of the devil," and where he might pour out his heart in prayer to God to forgive his folly. As he rode off he felt that all eyes were upon him, and the time seemed long before he could feel that he was out of sight, and alone with God. Securing his horse, he threw himself on the ground, and wept and prayed until he felt that God, for Christ's sake, "forgave the iniquity of his sin." He reappeared on his circuit greatly benefited by this severe, but necessary discipline, feeling the import of these solemn words of the Saviour as he had never felt before, "without me ye can do nothing." He was now content, "with all humility of mind," to preach, not himself, "but Christ Jesus the Lord." He said when the agony of that day was over, and he felt fully restored to the Divine favor, that often when he entered the house of God, he felt more like hiding himself under the pulpit than ascending it in order to preach. "He that humbleth himself shall be exalted," is the decree of God. This was soon verified in the case of our young preacher, and while he sunk low in his own estimation, his confidence in the promise of Him who had said, "Lo! I am with you always," was greatly increased. He became quite a revivalist, and in some places was favored with extraordinary success, for a man of his talents. But he was very impulsive, and following the lead of a corresponding zeal not well tempered with prudence, he soon prostrated his fine German constitution, and so impaired his vocal organs by "preaching too long and too loud," that his once sonorous voice was a wreck for the balance of his life. His mind, though not very accurately balanced, was strong and active, and susceptible of vast improvement, and with proper care and culture his constitution, voice and intellect might have been sound at the end of three score years. What a pity that all this promise of long years of usefulness to the Church was hopelessly blighted within the first bloom of his ministry. In 1813, when Mr. Shrock was on the Tombeckbee Circuit in the Alabama part of the Mississippi District, the Creek war was raging, and the people generally lived in forts. The massacre at Fort Mims and occasional skirmishes with the Indians, kept up a constant state of alarm, but notwithstanding this, the two itinerants, Nolley and Shrock, went from fort to fort, filling their appointments with praiseworthy regularity, and preaching "in demonstration of the Spirit and of power."

Perhaps Brother Nolley would have thought it quite out of character for a minister to fight with carnal weapons, but his impulsive colleague thought differently. Once when they were hourly expecting an attack from the lurking foe, he requested the commandant to supply him with a gun, and assign him a post, but he would show him that he could do some fighting as well as preaching. Fortunately, however, the attack was not made, and he missed the chance to exhibit his prowess. But no! I have more to say about John Shrock than I can consistently say in one number, I will close for the present.

J. G. JONES.

"FOOTPRINTS ACROSS THE CONTINENT."

NUMBER XI.

Gila City—Accident—The Colorado—The Yumas—Through the Desert—San Felipe—Temecula—El Monte—An Old Mission—Characteristics of the Catholic Missionaries.

Gila City consists of a stable for stage horses and one upright pole cabin. Its prospects for enlargement are not promising. Just after we passed, a singular accident occurred at this place. The horses, a team of six, on being hitched, commenced their usual manœuvres, and plunging blindly and madly about, the leaders fell into an open well—the next two soon followed, and the wheel horses were saved by the cross-bar, which lying across the mouth. The poor brutes screamed in their terror and agony—to extricate them was impossible, and the only remedy was to shoot them, or leave them to die in lingering tortures. They were shot.

About midnight we crossed the Colorado of the West. The river was fearfully swollen by the melting snows, and on the following day gave us no little trouble by its overflows. On one side is the City of Arizona, and on the opposite side Fort Yuma. Occasionally a steamboat reaches this point, but neither agriculture nor commerce will ever build a town, much less a city, in this region. It may, perchance, be a way-station on the line of the Great Pacific Railroad. After a dark ride of several hours, we reached Pilot Knob, a rocky elevation on the bank of the river. Here we were to breakfast and to make preparations for crossing the Great Desert. As we were to be detained an hour or two, to relieve my cramped limbs I prospected orchard, and finally found myself in the camp of the Yumas. It was about sunrise—the women were all up and diligently employed in pounding and rolling into a sort of flour, the Mezquit bean. Large baskets filled with this bean and other pods and berries, were thick around them, and out of these solid products these poor outcasts make their bread. The men were lying about—many of them just waking up, stretching and yawning lazily. Neither party paid the slightest attention to me. All were nearly naked—save that no few of the men had, by hook or crook, picked up the castoff garments of the soldier or of the passing emigrant. The dress of the women consisted of some kind of dark split into ribbons, and tied around the loins. The article was a strange combination of the bustle and the deep. Whether the arrangement was traditional—coming down from the days of the fig leaf apron—or imitative, the mark of a progressive Indian civilization, is a question I shall leave for the ethnologists to settle. One thing ought to be mentioned to the credit of these wild western ladies: they seem to be cleanly. One by one or two at a time they resorted to the river for their morning ablutions. They swam very fearlessly into the rushing current and frolicked joyously in the water. Unbinding their long black hair they gave their heads a thorough scouring. The whole operation was performed with as much delicacy, as little exposure of the person, as in the same enjoyment by their pale-faced sisters at Newport or Cape May.

Ere we must across the Desert. The spreading river drove us several miles out of our way. With six fine horses we were soon in motion. The valley of the Colorado was once wide, and what remains is very fertile—yet, alas! a sea of wilderness of weeds and bushes. The tiller's hand has never stirred its virgin soil. In a few years more the whole bottom will be covered up many feet deep by the encroaching sands of the Desert. Within a mile or two, we reached the sand-bank, which marks the beginning of the wide, wide desolation. The sand is very fine, soft and loose, and the grade is going up very steep. The driver, aware of the difficulties ahead of him, on starting engaged a team of six fine mules to assist in drawing the stage up this ascent. Unloosing his leaders—a lucky act—and attaching the mules the stage was emptied of every one save Mrs. P. and the little girl, and an effort was made to go up. It was "no go." The strength of four horses and six mules did not avail to turn a wheel. Trial after trial was made and it verily seemed as if we were bound. The fretted beasts would sink to their knees in every effort to pull. Finally, we sent back to an encampment of wagons, and procured another long chain, led the mules to the top of the hill where they could get some foot hold, and having made all ready, amid the cracking of whips and the shouts of the drivers and helpers, the stage began to move. The summit was gained and we all rejoiced. Oh, the dreariness of the scene around! Sand, sand, sand. Several of us, at the driver's request, undertook to walk half a mile or more. The time was verging fast upon noon, the sky without a cloud, the sun fearfully hot, shining in full strength. Sinking at every step to the ankles in the yielding sand, without having been on very low diet for about fifteen days, I fairly gave out. I thought of Joseph's gourd and longed for its shade. Thought of the spring at Sunshine, and pined and panted for one refreshing draught. But neither gourd nor spring could I find in the lone wild. My body was a fountain of water, but the gushing stream exhausted rather than relieved. My tongue cleaved to the roof of my mouth. I was ready to faint, and lay down on the hot sand to rest my failing lights—I sympathized with the poor soldier who a few days before got lost on this arid plain, and in the anguish of his thirst slew his dog and drank the blood. By and by the stage came up, I called for the canteen and the miserable water was an elixir of delight. Bless God for water! This trip has made me more grateful for this life-sustaining, heart-cheering element, than I ever was before, nay, than I ever could have been. I never drink the cool, sparkling beverage without a conscious uplifting of spirit to the "Father of light, from whom cometh every good and perfect gift."

The Desert is a treeless, herbless, grassless, lifeless waste. The heat would be intolerable, but for the winds which sweep restlessly over its bosom. Sometimes these winds swell to a gale and there is what is called a storm of sand. The air is dark, the road obliterated.—Neither man nor beast can endure the tempest. To stop and turn your back is the last one can do. To persevere is to lose your eyes, or be suffocated, or be lost: Providence spared us this trial.

We are now in California, but still the soil is poor, timber small and scarce, and the only material change in the scene is, at long intervals a human habitation. To Los Angelos from Fort Yuma is about two hundred miles. On the route are some valuable ranches—immense herds of cattle, horses, sheep and goats, are to be seen now and then. If a man were emigrating from any other State and were not well posted on the outside, on entering this great Pacific State from the East, his courage would fail him and, like the hunted hare, he would take the back track and carry to his old home an evil report of the modern Ophir. But we are in for it, let us go on. "It is bad luck to turn back;" so saith the old saw. Well, here is San Felipe, an Indian town, a cold spring, several huts, cabins and human beings of various colors. And lo! yonder is some green grass, let your eyes regale themselves, while the horses are changed. The desert is past, the wilderness and the solitary place are glad, before us are food, water, safety from Indians, fields, gardens, vineyards.—Presently we met hundreds of Indians in gala costume, many of them well-dressed, some on foot, many on horseback, single and double, sometimes a woman in the saddle and a man behind, and vice versa. All, equestrians and pedestrians, seemed to be merry, eager, full of haste. "What does all this mean?" said I to the conductor.—He replied, "do you remember that house at the spring a few miles back?" "Yes," I answered. "Well," said he, "that is a favorable resort of these Indians. They meet to dance and gamble. They will remain as long as they have any thing to bet and lose."

The next place in order is a little Indian village called Temecula. (I will not be responsible for the orthography of that name.) The inhabitants are a mere remnant of a tribe, and are in process of rapid extinction. They breathe, but do not live, and soon the last one will have passed away. The vices of the white, grafted upon the thriftless habits of the red man, hasten the doom of the race.

Before we reach El Monte, the country is strangely diversified. Much of it exceedingly poor and yet occasionally a fine farm greets the eyes—fields of grain, gardens and vineyards and orchards.

El Monte is a small, but rather flourishing town, and near by is one of the old Catholic missions. It is a very striking fact, that in every instance the location of these missions evince the knowledge, taste and forecast of the old Spanish Padres. Whatever you find one, there are wood, water, soil, picturesque scenery, the best of everything the land affords. This is too uniform, to have been accidental and must have been the result of thorough exploration. But how did these, foreign missionaries explore these wild regions in the midst of ignorant savage tribes? How? I will not answer. But, what zeal? what self-denial! what infidelity? Let Protestantism ponder the example. Shall a corrupted Christianity outvie a purer, more spiritual system? There are old, well-constructed houses, which have survived the race for whose benefit they were erected. Catholic Priests came, toiled, suffered, died and left these now decaying monuments of their heroism. They came too to baptize a degraded people, dwelling in an unknown land; and now with an Anglo-American population, with cities, towns, farms, steamships, railroads, and telegraphs, out of 2,194 traveling preachers and 5,117 local preachers—all sons of Wesley—I cannot get ten to go to California to preach the everlasting Gospel!!!

G. P. PIERCE.

SUNSHINE, May 29, 1860.

THE SABBATH.

The Magdalene wept bitter tears when she gazed in to the empty sepulchre at the dawn of the first Christian Sabbath. But there was ignorance and unbelief in her tears, and the Church has ever since exulted with heart brimming with joy and in swelling utterances of praise that the stone was rolled away.

The joyous nature of the blessed Sabbath finds fitting and beautiful expression in the dulcet voices of the bells that call the devout to worship the Lord in His sanctuary. Those cheerful and inspiring strains under whose influence the multitude walks to the House of God, are like those precious promises of the revealed word that induce the confidence of the contrite, and sustain the patience and refresh the energies of the saint throughout the length of his journey to the Celestial City.

But while the gladsome music of the Church bells is in happy consonance with the jubilant nature of the Sabbath day, it will not do for us simply to delight our ears; our hearts must be attuned to the melody of praise. We must accept with gladness and gratitude the unspeakable invitation that comes from the clear-voiced bells, and with intelligent and glowing perception of the goodness of God toward us, prepare ourselves for reverent and acceptable worship. It is painful to see the levity and worldliness that characterize the air of so many on their way to the House of God. There is unseemly in the sacredness of the day or, of the solemn services in which they are about engaging in their countenance, or voice, or manner. It is obvious that there is no feeling in their hearts in harmony with the holy day.

We do not think that the sanctity of the day or of festival worship in the sanctuary requires a severe face or a funeral step, but does do demand a serious, thoughtful, composed manner. The reverent attitude of humble worship and docile listening we are about assuming, should be anticipated as we draw near the temple of the Lord. The heart should be examined and the conduct reviewed with a minute and unsparing scrutiny, the sense of our unworthiness should be encouraged, there should be established a profound distaste for the employments and objects of our secular life, the dust of the mart should be shaken off, so that when we reach the Church we shall be in a condition immediately to enter upon its holy services. If we are thus prepared to pray and praise, and to hear the word, every moment spent under the consecrated roof will be replete with blessings, and the soul will make rapid advancement toward the prize of its high calling.

And the spirit that becomes the acts of worship in the House of God, is the frame of mind in which the Sabbath should be observed at our homes. We may not sustain that exaltation of feeling we realize while sitting under the droppings of the Sanctuary—the awe that makes the heart tremble, and almost forbids articulate utterance is absent; but the feeling that then possessed the soul in all its fulness, and grandeur, though much diminished, is the feeling in which the holy day should be spent. If we do not satisfy the high demands of its sanctity—if, out of Church as well as in it, we do not keep the day in the spirit of it, with all our decorum in the temple, our prayers and songs and well-seeming service, we are Sabbath-breakers in the sight of Heaven.

Waiting with reverential aspect upon God in His tabernacle and refraining from labor are not all that is meant by keeping holy the Sabbath day. We must do no work in order that we may worship, and we must worship that we may be blessed. If we find Him in His temple and taste the delights of His presence, we will not permit the world to intrude upon the holy calm of our hearts. We will bid its vexing cares away, its vanities and pomps will lose their power to attract, and turning with aversion from every subject that would interrupt the noiseless flow of our peace, we will give the consecrated hours of the blessed day to the pure worship and service of our Heavenly Father.

A Sabbath spent in such a frame as this prepares the Christian for the hearty and faithful discharge of all his obligations. His energies are invigorated, his conscience quickened, his endurance fortified, his virtue established and his whole nature purified and elevated. Having closed the door upon secular work and thoughts when he laade the world adieu, and committed his household and substance to the guardianship of that firm that never grows weary, refreshed by the sweet Sabbath quietude and communion, he goes forth to the labor of the week with broader views of duty and of life, and prepared to unite diligence in business with fervent spiritual service.—Charleston Courier.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOLS OF PARIS.

The 19th day of April, 1860, will be one not very soon forgotten by those who on its early morning were pressing their steps towards the great edifice, called the Cirque Napoleon at Paris. Never before had it been filled with so young an audience, for on that day three thousand children were seated in its vast amphitheatre, and their parents and friends, with a crowd of clergymen had joined them for the celebration of the Sunday-school festival. No doubt that, next year, that interesting gathering will have to assemble in the Hippodrome, the largest public building in Paris.

I cannot here forget to mention the name of one good man—an American gentleman—to whom belongs the honor, and great joy of having been the human means, which God has used for introducing such an one as is the Sunday-school in Paris. Mr. A. Woodruff, of Brooklyn, has employed the threefold influence of his wealth, of his earnest piety, and of his untiring activity, in stirring up the Christians of Paris in the noble work of the Sunday school. His name is cherished with gratitude not by the children only, but by the parents of the children who there sung, "I want to be an Angel," or "There is a happy land." For it was Mr. Woodruff who introduced into France the collection of the Sunday-school hymns, and who had it translated, and then widely circulated. Between 25,000 and 30,000 copies of these books have already been sold in France; and now, little children who formerly knew nothing but hymns to the Virgin, join their young brothers and sisters of America in the blessed praise of Jesus, their Savior and friend.

It is interesting to know, that the cause of the Sunday-school is widely enlisting now the active sympathies of Christians on the continent. Clergymen from almost every part of Switzerland attended the great celebration on the 19th of April. One, Mr. Nagel, came from Neufchatel, the mountain-encircled city, where both Professor Guyot, of Princeton, and Professor Agassiz, of Cambridge, held so long an honorable position in the college, before they made America their home. Other clergymen there were who came from the south of France, and from the west and the north. Mr. Plantier came from Alais, an important manufacturing town, surrounded by vast coal mines. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries it was a stronghold of Protestantism, but was afterwards crushed on that account by Louis XIII.

The Rev. Mr. Jean Monod, brother of the lamented Adolphe Monod, came from Nimes, that beautiful, ancient city, so rich in historical associations, and where we found the most perfect, as well as the most interesting remains of antiquity in all Europe. Aqueducts, amphitheatre, and a famous Roman bath, share this day the admiration of travellers, and their patient researches. It is a little singular to see a ruined tower about one hundred feet high, and said to have been erected by the Greek colonists, which now serves to support telegraph wires. Nimes is a manufacturing city, and has a number of schools. One cannot think of a wider and more open field of action, where Christian zeal and persevering love can find room and opportunity to develop its blessed fruits.—S. S. Treats.

MISSING THE MARK.—The Chinese translation of "Methodist Church" is "the church of the square and compass."

THE CONDITION OF VENETIA.

A correspondent of the London Morning Chronicle, writing from Verona under date of May 24th, says of the enforced isolation of the Venetian provinces and the condition of affairs there: "The diligences which used to run between the Romagna, the Duchies and Venetia are all stopped short at the frontier, and you cannot book your place through from Ferara, Bologna or Modena to any part of the Austrian territory, but are obliged to trust to chance conveyance, and so you travel in your own carriage. All Piedmontese papers are carefully excluded. Indeed, most foreign papers share the same fate. At Florian's, the well-known resort of foreigners, on the square of St. Mark, even Galignani has been suppressed since the war, and the only English paper admitted in the place is the Illustrated News. What little is known of the state of things across the frontier comes entirely by private letters or stray intelligence. On every side there are traces of preparation for an approaching war. The broad, straight military roads, which stretch through endless vistas of poplars across the flat, marshy plains, are commanded by redoubts at each little elevation. Every city is garrisoned, and most are fortified. There are barracks and stores to be seen everywhere. At Padua, the Church of San Giustino is blocked up with barrels of biscuits, which were stopped on their way when the news came of Solferino and Villafranca. The great theatre at Verona is turned into a barrack. There are guns upon the steps of the island church of St. George, at Venice. The Austrians, indeed, wished to pull down the church and erect a fort there; but happily, for the sake of art, this intention was relinquished on the remonstrance of the priests. At Venice, and Verona, and Mantua, the guns of the forts which command the towns are all pointed towards the city; and under the arched vestibule of the Doge's Palace the guns are turned upon the Piazza, and by each gun there is a soldier on duty. Armed patrols pass up and down the streets, and there are centries posted at every turn. At Venice there is a German theatre; and, during the last few weeks, an Italian operatic company performs every other day at one of the minor theatres, the San Gallo. I was present there one evening, when the programme was more than usually attractive; but out of the one hundred and fifty boxes, only twelve were occupied, and these by Austrian officers. The pit was barely filled with soldiers and strangers, and German was the language you heard spoken amongst the audience. At Verona, Padua and Mantua, the theaters are all closed, except those of the very poorest sort, which give day performances, and are frequented chiefly by soldiers of the Italian Tyrol. The grand piazza of St. Mark, which used to be the favorite promenade of the Venetians, is almost deserted on the nights when the splendid Austrian band plays, and what concourse there is, is composed entirely of foreigners and the commonest rabble. An Italian, even respectably dressed, is a rarity there. The cafes, too, are but poorly filled. The Austrian officers always go to different cafes from the Italians; and if an Austrian enters a café frequented by the natives the habitues quietly leave the building. You never see Austrians and Italians walking together—seldom even in conversation with each other."

THE BOMBARDMENT OF PALERMO.

By the steamer Asia we have intelligence that Lord Brougham, in the House of Lords, had characterized the bombardment of Palermo by the Neapolitan squadron as the most atrocious act ever perpetrated. Such must be the opinion of all men, unless we except the minions of despotism, and even they cannot but be ashamed of the brutal deed although they may deem it their interest to make a show of defence of it. The London Times, referring to the bombardment, thus records its emphatic condemnation of this latest Bourbon outrage on humanity and civilization: "The news which now reaches us is calculate to rouse the anger of every man of feeling throughout Europe. Palermo has been unnecessarily and cruelly bombarded by the Neapolitan squadron. As soon as it was likely that the troops would be obliged to retreat before Garibaldi the ships opened fire on the defenceless town, the only crime of which was that it was about to fall into the hands of the enemy. The fire was kept up for many hours, and ended in the destruction of a great many buildings. It was continued at the last date to which our advices extend; and it may be that by this time the capital of Sicily has been destroyed by the naval forces of its own sovereign. It is impossible to condemn such an act in too strong terms. The bombardment of a town is an event happily rare in the annals of warfare. A fortress is bombarded when it holds the enemy's troops and magazines, and affords shelter to his operations. But to bombard a populous city—to kill women and children and ruin private property, merely because the suburbs are the scene of a battle, and the place is likely to fall into the hands of the enemy, is the extreme of cowardice and cruelty. What shall we say, then, to the case of a sovereign bombarding one of his own capitals and slaughtering his own subjects? Such an act could be perpetrated only by a family so lost to all sense of justice and public right as the Spanish or Neapolitan Bourbons. If even the city were destroyed, the position of the king's forces would not be improved. Palermo is not Moscow, nor are the insurgents dependent for existence on the shelter of a town. If the city were to disappear from the face of the earth, Garibaldi might establish himself on the site, and carry on his attacks on the castle, into which the royal troops have retreated. The bombardment must be held to be a mere wanton act of vengeance, and as such should incur the stern reprobation of all the powers of Europe."

THE REJECTION BY THE CHINESE OF THE BRITISH ULTIMATUM.

The London Times, refering to the latest news from China, remarks: "China has refused the British ultimatum with a directness and with an insolence such as a great preparation and a consequent sense of security alone could have prompted. The terms of the ultimatum are confined to a confirmation of the treaty of 1858, an apology for the outrage at the mouth of the Peiho, compensation for losses, restoration of ships and material, a revisal of the clause in the last treaty on the visits of the British Minister to Pekin, and an indemnity for the expenses of the present expedition, according to the obstinacy of the Chinese resistance. It is evident from the reply that the Chinese are infatuated with success, and, painful as it is to see them running headlong to their doom, we cannot help feeling that this is the long expected justification of ourselves and others who on several occasions have maintained against attacks the cause of her Majesty's servants in those regions. The Chinese have recourse to every trick of policy, every evasion of argument, and every folly of invective which the traditions of our very nurses have ascribed to their race. In the first place, and what alone would justify the present expedition, they refuse to admit that our remonstrances or ultimatums have been conveyed to the Emperor, or to give any answer except as from the provincial Government, in accordance with commands from the Great Council. This is equivalent to a refusal to negotiate in the only sense of negotiation among civilized countries—that between one sovereign and another. It is evident that there never was an intention of confirming the treaty, and that it has not yet been recognized by the Emperor. The Chinese maintain that the British and French Ministers were duly warned, even at Shanghae, not to proceed to Taku, which had been fortified, as they pretend they had informed us, but to Pehtang, or the false mouth of the Peiho, which turns out to be, indeed, no mouth at all. They still refuse to admit our ships of war up the Peiho, on the ground that an ambassador can require no armament, and that any foe might assume our flag. Against our expenses they plead their own greater expenses. The ships and guns cannot be restored, because they are at the bottom of the sea; and we had better let them remain there. They propose to treat our Minister as they did the American, and they criticise the tone of our ultimatum and correspondence as insubordinate, extravagant, and indecorous.

THE BEST PHYSICAL EXERCISE.

After all the inventions, erections, and temporary eulogizing of the gymnasium—after the costly experiment, for a time, of horse-back-riding, nine-pin rolling, and other games—after the novelty of military drilling, too exacting on the time and purse of the student, too starched and mechanical in the style of carriage it gives, and too demoralizing in its associations—after all devices, the wise man comes back to the simple thing of walking. In the old beaten track, the man of perfect health and physical development, hale and hearty, holds on the even tenor of his way, till, staff in hand, he steps into his grave. The history of this branch of education is most instructive. The empirical Greeks, especially the dreamy among their philosophers, first introduced gymnastics. The end sought by these exercises was not one practical with us. Then men were to fight hand to hand, and the gymnastics of the Greeks seemed to be adapted to train men to this mode of combat. Diodorus, however, the Roman historian, in the Augustan age, writes from Egypt:—They think that from daily gymnastics in the palæstra, youth will gain not sound vigor, but only a temporary strength, and that at great risk of injury." It was not, then, from Egypt that Pythagoras and Plato brought Gymnastics; and when they had introduced them into the schools, the practical followers of Aristotle so preferred the round-about-town ramble for physical culture, that they received the name of "Peripatetics," while the ultra conservative stoics were satisfied with promenading and lounging upon their porticos.

It is refreshing, almost invigorating in itself, to the roundest peripatetic of our day, panting and swelling with the thrill of his morning and evening walk, running through every fibre of his frame, just to think of the men who have preceded him in this line which he has marked out for himself. He is the companion of Abraham, rambling over the hills of Palestine, of Jesus, walking two miles out of Jerusalem every night, and back in the morning; of Paul, "minding himself to go afoot;" and he is the fellow partaker with a long line of men in secular life, most masterly in their power of mind in every age and land, because the framework of mind's mighty engines has been kept in its strength by the renovation of walking.

It is instructive to the educator, when traveling in Europe, to observe the students in the German universities spending their summer vacations in tramps among the Alps, with their knapsacks on their backs, their stout shoes on their feet, and strong staves in their hands; gaining thus a vigor and strength, which is kept up during the severe tasks of their sessions of study by evening promenades on the shady walks around most of the cities of Europe. In fact, all experience shows, that while other resorts may be valuable as temporary restoratives, the location of an institution of learning where long and pleasant walks are not only possible, but necessary, with the addition of a covered promenade for inclement weather, is the best provision for physical education.

THE PLAINS OF LOMBARDY THE BATTLE-GROUND OF NATIONS.

It is a melancholy fact that the richest and fairest spots on earth's surface are also those where human blood has been most frequently and lavishly shed. What waves of invasion have successively rolled over the fertile plains of Persia and Hindostan, the prolific valley of the Nile, the fruitful provinces of Asia Minor, Turkey and Hungary! What battles, what sieges, massacres, almost from the birth of history, have drenched their soil with gore! Andalusia, too—the garden of Spain—was for eight centuries the battle-ground of Christian and Moor, whose blood, according to the Spanish historians, was poured forth in thirty-seven hundred battles.

But, perhaps no country has been more blessed by the gifts of God, or more cursed with the strife of man, than the wide and beautiful plains of Lombardy, guarded by Alp and Appenine, a very garden in fertility, watered by innumerable streams, and with a thousand towns and villages glittering like sails amidst a sea of verdure. It has been the battle-field of nations, from the time when Bellovesus, nearly six centuries before Christ, led his Celtic legions across the Alps, until yesterday, when the French and Austrian eagles were striving for supremacy. Romans and Cimbri, Goths and Romans, Lombards and Franks, Germans and Italians, French, Spaniards and Swiss, Austrians and French, have again and again met in deadly strife on these wide-spread plains, and have been successively swept down, in bloody swaths, by the scythe of the grim mower, Death.

THE SARDINIAN GOVERNMENT AND SECULAR POWER OF THE ROMISH CHURCH.

The London correspondent of the National Intelligencer, in his letter of May 24th, writes: "The Sardinian Government has always been desirous to avoid the religious question respecting the secular power of the Roman Church, but the Ultramontane portion of the Sardinian priesthood has forced attention to be paid to it, and the consequences may be of great European importance.—It has been found necessary to arrest several Bishops and to close, by way of precaution, the seminary of Piacenza, on account of its regicidal teachings. The Bishop of Farli has also been prosecuted for suspending the priests who assisted at the celebration of the "Te Deum" at Bologna in honor of the Sardinian constitution. Several Pontifical enlisting agents have also been arrested for tampering with the soldiers of Æmilia, and persuading them to enrol themselves as volunteers to serve in Sicily, instead of which they have sent them to Ancona or Civita Vecchia. The Archbishops of Florence and Pisa, two Bishops, and a Cardinal have been summoned to appear at the Home Office at Turin, and to declare whether they are willing to acknowledge the sovereignty of the King of Sardinia in a frank and legal way. If they hesitate they will be sent to Fenestrelle, and tried by the competent courts of justice. The Archbishops of Piacenza and of Perma have fled into the Austrian dominions, and three others are dead, and have been replaced. The conflict with the higher orders of the hierarchy will be more severe than any it has previously known. The Piedmontese Government has placed the business in the hands of Signor Farini and Count Mamiani, a guarantee that it will be treated with dignity and vigor."

RUSSIA AND TURKEY.

The London Daily News referring to papers laid before Parliament on the 1st inst. in reference to Russian pretensions to interference in Turkey, remarks: "We have now an authoritative version of the pretensions formally put forward by the Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs in his recent intercourse with the Turkish Minister and the ministers of European courts. It is now known that at the end of April, Prince Gortschakoff informed the Turkish Ambassador that the accounts he received from the different Christian provinces governed by the Sultan, showed such sufferings and such exasperations, that if they should lead to insurrection and massacre the Emperor of Russia could not remain a tranquil spectator of the scene. A few days after, the same declaration was made in a dispatch to Paris, and early in May it was repeated to the ministers of the great powers resident at St. Petersburg, whom Prince Gortschakoff had assembled to receive it at the foreign office.—The Russian declaration can be regarded in no other light than as a renunciation of the obligations undertaken in the treaty of Paris which gave peace to that empire. It is a renewal of those pretensions which were sunk—for a time only, as it now appears—with the Russian fleet in the Black Sea. There is nothing in the state of Turkey now, when Prince Gortschakoff threatens to break the treaty, that should not have restrained him from signing it. His announcement, certain to be known and therefore intended to be known, in Bosnia, Roumelia, and Bulgaria, will there be understood as a promise to the aid of an insurrectionary party."

AN ETHIOPIAN RELIGION.

In the highlands of Ethiopia, Major Harris found a so-called Christian kingdom, a national establishment dating from the earliest ages. By this Church, saints and angels are invoked, the Virgin and St. Michael are made secretly subordinate deities, a crowded calendar of saints receive honors, and half the year is composed of fasts and festivals. It enjoins also confessions to the priest, whose curse is dreaded by the people as the last calamity, while they confidently rely on the almsgiving and penances she imposes as an expiation of sin. Its most extraordinary peculiarities are certain usages and ceremonies, either borrowed from the Jews or retained from the Ethiopic faith. Their churches, which generally are small and mean, resemble precisely the Jewish temple; they are divided into three parts; the innermost is the holy of the holies, and may be entered by the priest alone. The service is in a dead language, and dancing is one of the ceremonies. They keep in the same manner, and with equal strictness, the seventh day and the first—the Sabbath of the Jews and the Lord's day of Christians. They observe the Levitical prohibitions as to unclean animals; they will not eat with Pagan or Moslem, nor taste of flesh that has not been slain in the name of the Trinity. They practice circumcision, not asserting it to be obligatory, yet rigorously imposing it on every pagan convert to Christianity. They allow of concubinage. They are all baptized once every year, commemorating the baptism of Christ at the Epiphany by a religious procession to the river, into which men, women and children enter in a promiscuous and shameless crowd. Fasts of extraordinary frequency are observed with unexampled strictness; two every week; on Wednesday, and Friday, while reckoning all the holy days, together, one entire half of the year is thus occupied.—Jewish Chronicle.

GROWTH OF FERNANDINA, FLA.

A late visit to this place has satisfied us that the encomiums bestowed upon it are not over-drawn. It is indeed "beautiful for situation," with a fine entrance from the sea, a capacious, well protected harbor, and reposing on an island high and airy, and covered with a beautiful growth of forest trees not looked for so near the Atlantic coast. As a place for residence we know of few if any more desirable. As respects the prospects of Fernandina as a city, if the future is to be judged from the past, there's every reason to anticipate the fulfillment of the most sanguine hopes. There must be at this present writing a population of well nigh two thousand, and this too before the railroad connecting the city with the Gulf is completed. Should that road prove as successful as its friends and projectors anticipate, Fernandina will then become a city numbering its tens of thousands; but if only a reasonable share of their hopes are realized, it will still be a place out-stripping all others in Florida in size and importance. In my event there is a promising future before it. The Florida Road is nearly finished. Perhaps by the first of July the cars will pass from the Atlantic to the Gulf at Cedar Keys. We found that

THOUGHT AND ELOQUENCE—PUNSHON'S SERMONS.

A book has been recently published by Derby and Jackson entitled, "Sermons by Rev. William Morley Punshon," with an introduction by Rev. Wm. H. Milburn. It contains twelve sermons, which are preceded by a "Plea for Class-meetings." The fame of the preacher, attained principally by the delivery of these very sermons, will doubtless cause the book to have a large sale, especially in the United States, the great modern arena and audience of genius, in any of its achievements in the armor of the English language. That fame is remarkable for so young a man; for he is now but thirty-six years old, and he is considered the most eloquent preacher among the English Wesleyans, if not in England. The coincidence of the rise of two such transcendently popular preachers as Punshon and Spurgeon, in the same country, and at the same time, and both so young, is also remarkable. Spurgeon burst upon the world suddenly; Punshon rose more gradually. Spurgeon reached his zenith at once; Punshon is still on the oriental side of the noon-point. Punshon is much the most accomplished man, and, we take it—and we think we are impartial—the most eloquent man. His style is much the purest and most elegant, and his thought the strongest. Spurgeon is the most simple, direct, and imaginative. His native ability we take to be equal to Punshon's, but he is inferior to him in art and taste.

Mr. Punshon is one among the rare preachers of the time who have helped to rescue the pulpit from the reputation of dullness, and to give the sermon a place in popular literature. He is one, also, of a still rarer company—one of the select few pulpit orators who have attained to a high reputation for eloquence without loss of evangelical soundness, and who have reached great popularity without loss of spiritual power. Like all great orators, his great power is in his speaking—in the indefinable magnetism of a charming manner. Not that his sermons are intrinsically inferior—for they are admirable in matter, method, and manner—but that they are inferior, as evidences of literary genius, to his just reputation for oratorical genius. We have long been inclined to the opinion that, as a rule, intellectual mediocrity and oratorical excellence were inseparably wedded. There is such a thing as a princely power of thought in speech, that is called eloquence, but however superior in itself, it is far inferior in popular power to that irresistible charm of delivery which is inseparable from the highest eloquence. But few men have ever combined genius in thought with genius in utterance. Such rare men are the intellectual princes of the world. Eloquence is necessarily popular, and, as a condition of its existence, is of an average grade as to its intellectual basis, and adapted and addressed to the most comprehensive average of the popular mind. High power of thought, on the contrary, is not popular—that is, it is not adapted to popular apprehension and appreciation. Nevertheless, there are exceptional instances of high mental and oratorical genius, where there is power to translate into popular speech, and to bring into communion with the popular mind, the noblest conceptions of the grandest minds. But these exceptions are very rare. Few, therefore, may reasonably hope to be great thinkers and great speakers at the same time.

But there is a view of this subject which we have seldom seen in print. It is, that this peculiar genius of the great orator which prevents him from diving to a depth of thought, or rising to a height of imagination beyond the capacity of the popular mind to appreciatively follow, but which enables him, as with an unerring instinct, to strike the far-sounding chords of popular thought and feeling, is, itself, the highest, healthiest, and most symmetrical form of genius. There is truth in this view, but it is not the whole truth; or rather, it is an exaggeration of a truth. Republicanism in government is founded upon the idea that the verdict of the great body of the people, made up from their honest natural instincts, and their unsophisticated common sense, is the surest guarantee for truth and right. This guarantee, however, is a moral one, rather than an intellectual one. It is according to the philosophy of the passage in Scripture where our Savior says that "except we become as little children we cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven." Not that those who are as little children have, intellectually, a better capacity to understand the grand truths of the Christian religion than those who are as adult persons, but that, morally, they are in better attitude and temper for the reception of the truth. While, therefore, the true orator is intellectually inferior to the great thinker, he is, in some respects, morally superior to him, and though the highest manhood should include them both, yet, as perfection cannot be the rule, in this state, it is not a defect in the growth of things that the one is set off against the other. It is a sort of equilibrium which is necessary to the health and symmetry of our mental growth and spiritual progress. It is a sort of mental masculine and feminine gender, acting upon and modifying each other, to the good of both, and to the good of the world.

Nevertheless, the ideal of all pulpit-students should be the combination of both the excellencies of the original thinker and the popular orator. Partialism, however inevitable in the majority of men, should never be chosen as a good in itself. This is the common danger of both the thinker and the orator. The one devotes himself exclusively to the art of thought, and, neglects the art of preaching, and, consequently, while growing as a thinker, deteriorates as a preacher; the other devotes himself to the art of preaching, and, consequently, while growing a preacher, deteriorates as a thinker.

ENDOWMENT OF CENTENARY COLLEGE.

This paper has had much to say on this behalf, but is "not weary in well-doing." We had hoped that the work would have been accomplished before this time; but it is not, and the labor must continue; for, that it must and will be done ultimately, no friend of the college can permit himself to doubt. The world is not converted, but it will be, and therefore we are toiling on toward its accomplishment. We have good reasons for believing that Centenary will be endowed. It is the principal institution of the Mississippi and Louisiana Conferences, and two such conferences cannot and will not afford to fail to endow. It has every thing to encourage the hope of its endowment. It has the finest college buildings of any similar institution in the South. Indeed, but little is left to be desired in respect to the buildings, either in commodiousness, comfort, and architectural taste. It has an able, efficient and successful faculty of instruction, and a large, increasing patronage, over two hundred and sixty pupils being in attendance, and over one hundred in the college proper. It has a larger, less divided, and wealthier constituency than any college in the South. Indeed, an endowment is all that it needs to place it in the very front rank of American colleges. And never was a college constituency better able to endow, than that of Centenary college. That it is not endowed is strange—is a pity—is humiliating. We have been hoping that the endowment would be accomplished this year. Two regular agents are in the field—Rev. V. H. Johnson for the Mississippi Conference, and Rev. H. Avery for Louisiana Conference. From the first we have not heard. Mr. Avery, we learn, has been afflicted and confined at home. We hope they will both report well at the end of the year. In the meantime Prof. Scales, whose ill health has compelled him to cease for a time his regular duties and travel for health, is laboring for the endowment as a volunteer. We are glad to learn, too, that he is meeting with a degree of encouragement. In about six or seven weeks he has succeeded in securing about thirteen thousand dollars. Two gentlemen, brothers, gave him five thousand dollars each. This is noble. Others have given smaller amounts. What is needed now is for four or five wealthy men to endow a Chair each with 25,000 dollars—This has been done in other states, and it can be done in Mississippi and Louisiana. If some one man will break the ice, the work will be done. Who will do it? Who will glorify God, and establish a monument to his memory? Who will put twenty-five thousand dollars where it will do good forever, instead of consuming it upon the lust of the eye, the lust of the heart, and the pride of life? Is there no such man in the South-west? Shall such noble liberality be unknown in this region?

THE SOUTHERN FIELD AND FIRESIDE.

We have seen only a few numbers of this paper, yet we are pleased with it, upon the whole. It is printed upon fine paper, with excellent type, in quarto form, with an embellished border on each page. Its stories and sketches are well written, and its Paris correspondence is excellent. Its literary editorials, from the pen of John R. Thompson, Esq., late editor of the Southern Literary Messenger, are tasteful and spirited. The agricultural and horticultural departments, each under the control of its own editor, are, to our thinking, too heavy in their management, for a literary weekly, if not too heavy in their character. In order to success, every department of a periodical must be under the control of one experienced and tasteful editor-in-chief, who will reject the best kind of matter, if it be not timely and readable. Many periodicals have been killed by the best kind of matter. The agricultural and horticultural departments of the Field and Fireside may do well if they are edited in a manner harmonious with the general literary character of the paper—a hard task—but not without. Another difficulty in the way of this paper is, that it is not in a large city. Great successes in periodical literature have never been attained in small places, and we imagine, never will be.

But our principal fear for the Field and Fireside is yet to be mentioned. It has a sectional name. It had an need of this. There is nothing to be accomplished by it. Literature is not sectional, any more than truth or religion. We do not need, and should not seek, an exclusively Southern Literature. We should look farther and aim higher. We should seek to give the South her appropriate place and power in English literature. We do not affect these sectional clap-trap names. We object to the word "South" as appended to the name of the Methodist Church. We object to everything founded upon geographical position, instead of philosophical principle. Politically, the cause of the South is simply the cause of the Constitution. In religion the South follows the teaching and example of the Bible. In literature, the South should be simply devoted to truth, and should be as liberal and catholic as truth. The Constitution, the Bible, and Truth are not Southern, but the South is loyal to the constitution, to the Bible, and to truth. The North, in the majority of its population, is sectional. The South is not sectional in principle, and should not be tempted to its appearance. Let not the philosophy, literature, religion and civilization of the South be deprived of their rightful power in the eyes of the world by unnecessary and deceptive words and names. The Field and Fireside in itself, however, is worthy of all acceptation.

A FLORIDA CONFERENCE PAPER.

We notice that a proposition has been made to establish a Methodist paper for the Florida Conference, which is now one of the joint owners of the Southern Christian Advocate at Charleston. We cannot see what the Florida Conference is to gain by such a movement. It now has need of more money than it can raise, to establish and endow its colleges and academies, and for other valuable interests. It would injure these interests to attempt so expensive an enterprise as the establishment of a paper. And then it has no earthly need for such a paper. Joint owner of one of the finest papers among us, which is just as much devoted to Florida interests as to those of Georgia and South Carolina, the proposition is to establish, in preference, a weak and sickly little sheet for a single young Conference. The idea is preposterous, and we are glad to see that the leading men of the Conference oppose it. If the paper should be established, we confidently predict that its founders will ultimately rue the day they undertook it. None of our papers are as strong as they ought to be. None of them are able to expend the amount of money for literary labor that is necessary to the highest success and power of journalism. Even the Christian Advocate and Journal at New York is not. The number and consequent financial feebleness of religious journals is one reason why the great secular journals outstrip them, as a rule, in circulation and power. With our present knowledge of the business, we should be unwilling to attempt the establishment of a journal to represent a great Church, and to risk upon it our financial and literary reputation, without capital to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars. In the present day, and with the advanced journalistic taste of the times, a fine journal could not be established with a much less amount. Even then it could not be supported without a large territory for circulation. Our present papers began when public taste was not so much advanced, grew with the times, and became established without the original investment of much capital. But the time for such things is past. The country is full of fine journals competing for circulation. A poor, lame, spiritless paper is not read at this day. We have had enough of them. We want no more of them. We have too many papers now. There is a vicious tendency among us on this subject that should be checked. If it continue, we advise that we have no papers but such as belong to the General Conference; or that the Church own none of them, and make them all private property. We speak from experience, for the benefit of those who wish to "go in."

THE BALTIMORE BORDER CONTROVERSY.

In the last Baltimore Christian Advocate accounts are given of meetings held at Waterford, Va.—in Summerfield circuit—Onancock, Va., for Onancock circuit—Fairfield, Va., for Rockbridge circuit—in Leesburg station—and Uppervillo Society, London circuit, at which resolutions were adopted proclaiming resistance to the recent action of the Northern Methodist General Conference on the slavery question. The paper is filled with communications on the same subject, some counseling submission, but most of them urging resistance and secession. The strangest and most pitiable document of all, however, is a paper published by the Baltimore delegates to the General Conference, or a part of them, signed by Alfred Griffith, C. B. Tippett, Henry Slicer, Thomas Sewall, Geo. Hildt, E. R. Veitch, Thompson Mitchell, J. H. Brown, N. J. B. Morgan, George Guyer, and John Lanahan. They argue that the new chapter has not the force of law, that they shall so consider it in their administration, and counsel submission! These men belong to that old fence-riding, expediency-loving Baltimore which helped to kick the South in 1844, and which, since deprived of the support of the great South, has been kicked past feeling. But these men and their party are few and powerless. Young Baltimore, with Dr. Bond for leader, is rising up to redeem the reputation of the long misrepresented Baltimore Conference. They will resist, and they will leave the now thoroughly abolitionized Northern Methodist Church. They will not join the Southern Methodist Church, we imagine. In this matter, we have not a word of advice to give them. They have our sympathy; they do not need our advice. God help them, and help every Church in the land not infected with the abolition apostacy, to "contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints."

NEW YORK LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE.

I wish some one would write a few common sense words about the poet Shelley. There have been some attempts at his life recently again. The poor poet seems to have had a vision, in one of his uneasy moments, of what was to befal him in the future, and it is noticeable that he had a peculiar and extreme horror of the persons who, on that mysterious occasion, as he fancied, desired to take his life. "If he (Shelley) were still in the flesh, I would not like to stand in the shoes of Mr. William Dowe, who has perpetrated, in the July number of the Atlantic Monthly, what I take to be the most maudlin, ill-natured, and elaborately bosky defense of Shelley that has yet appeared. "More words about Shelley" might be called "Mere words" about Shelley," and very poor words at that.

Shelley was a poet and a man of genius. He was also a wrong-headed—almost pig-headed—wilfully impractical and impracticable boy. It takes nothing from the true estimate of the man to admit this truth of him. He is none the less a poet that he is also a personally irregular man. It is not necessary to make him out perfection, but to do that, which Mr. Dowe seems to consider the first and most necessary step in any true estimate of his hero's character; to do that, it becomes necessary to do also precisely what Mr. Dowe has done: to villify every one who ever had anything to do with Shelley, and who failed—as a good many did—to report him the angel Mr. Dowe thinks it necessary to present.

Mr. Dowe thinks the time has not yet come to do justice to Shelley. I think the time has come; and it would be a mercy to the poet's memory, if some one would take it out of the hands of unreasoning worshippers, and give, what would not be so difficult to give, a respectful, loyal, and common sense estimate of the man, separate in some degree from his works. This, because hitherto most who have approached Shelley to characterise him have formed their theory from his poems, and not from the recorded facts of his life.

To me (I speak it modestly) Shelley appears to have been a man to whom life was a blinding mystery, who stood like a blind man upon the portals, groping his way in; and who would have found his way and his sight had he not been taken away so untimely. It was only through much suffering that so fiery a spirit as his could be purified.

But I did not intend to say anything about him myself. I am warned by Mr. Dowe, who, taking upon himself to explain Shelley to the multitude, says aptly, and to the point, "genius alone can do justice to genius." I don't altogether agree with this position of Mr. Dowe; but there is nothing in his article which militates against it.

The Atlantic has for its other articles, "Meteorology," by Mr. A. P. Bloodgood; "a Legend of Maryland," a new serial, by Hon. John P. Kennedy; "Clarian's Picture," by Edward G. Spencer, of Maryland, a promising (and fulfilling) young writer; "the Regicide Colonels of New England," by John G. Palfrey; "the Professor's Story," by Dr. Holmes; an article on "Darwin's Origin of Species," which merely raises the question with the intention, it is to be hoped, of settling it in August; and a "character of Rufus Choate," that is, if unlimited eulogy can be called characterization. Mr. Choate was undoubtedly what Mr. Dickens would call "one of the most remarkable men our country has produced." He was aligue scholar, a man of a deep, far-seeing reach of mind, a man of genius, of wealth, of opportunity. That is to say, he had all the chances that a man could possibly have in life, according to his eulogist. And he was content to be remarkable chiefly for his profound ability to make a jury believe that black is white. Was it a worthy ambition for a man who had all that is claimed for him?

In a work just published by Harper & Brothers, "The Three Clerks," by Anthony Trollope, there is a passage descriptive of one Mr. Chaffanbruss which applies to the whole class of which Mr. Choate was a most illustrious member, that is worth while to quote here: "His business is to perplex a witness and bamboozle a jury, and in doing that he is generally successful. He seldom cares for carrying the judge with him; such tactics, indeed, as his, are not likely to tell upon a judge.—That which he loves, that a judge should charge against him, and a jury give a verdict in his favor. When he achieves that he feels that he has earned his money. Let others, the young lads and spooneys of his profession, undertake the milk-and-water work of defending injured innocence; it is all but an insult to his practised ingenuity to invite his assistance to such tasteless business. Give him a case in which he has all the world against him; Justice with her sword raised high to strike; Truth with open mouth and speaking eyes to tell the bloody tale; outraged humanity shrieking for punishment; a case from which Mercy herself, with averted eyes, has loathing turned and bade her sterner sister do her work; give him such a case as this, and then you will see Mr. Chaffanbruss in his glory. Let him, by the use of his high art, rescue from the gallows and turn loose upon the world the wretch whose hands are reeking with the blood of father, mother, wife, and brother, and you may see Mr. Chaffanbrass, elated with conscious worth, rub his happy hands with infinite complacency. Then will his ambition be satisfied, and he will feel that in the verdict of the jury he has received the honor due to his genius. He will have succeeded in turning black into white, in washing the blackamoor, in dressing in the fair robe of innocence the foulest, filthiest wretch of his day; and as he returns to his home, he will be proudly conscious that he is no little man."

Mr. Anthony Trollope always gives his readers the idea that he has thoroughly studied the life which is depicted in his novels. He does not write at random, and therefore his points are always well made; and as the life he describes is mostly fresh ground to novel readers (on this side the water at least), he has the added advantage of telling us something new. This is the case with "The Three Clerks," who are young gentlemen in government employ, attending in various departments of what Mr Dickens calls the Circumlocution Office, in the city of London. The careers of these three young men make up the story, which, of course, has in addition the proper number of young ladies, the proper quantity of love, and for the rest—mean is the man who reveals the plot of a novel. The story is quietly, evenly, and fairly told, and is such a home story as, by its naturalness and its unobtrusive but justly drawn moral, comes home to the hearts of young and old. Mr. Trollope has never done better than in the Three Clerks.

Messrs. Ticknor & Fields have just published the "Autobiographical Recollections of Charles Robert Leslie, R.A., with introductory memoir by Tom Taylor," a charming volume, full of gossip of men we like to hear about, and of especial interest because Leslie himself, like his brother painter, West, was of American parentage; though, unlike West, he was born in London; but he spent his boyhood in Philadelphia, and there developed his talent for art. There are some good stories of Sidney Smith, of which I cull two or three here, as they are new:

Newton told me that at a dinner-party at Lord Lyndhurst's, at which he was present, the conversation turned on the custom in India of widows burning themselves.—Smith began to defend the practice, asserting that no wife who truly loved her husband could wish to survive him. "But, if Lord Lyndhurst were to die, you would be sorry that Lady Lyndhurst should burn herself?"—"Lady Lyndhurst," he replied, "would, no doubt, as an affectionate wife, consider it her duty to burn herself, but it would be our duty to put her out; and, as the wife of the Lord Chancellor, Lady Lyndhurst should not be put out like an ordinary widow. It should be a state affair. First, a procession of the judges, and then of the lawyers." "But where, Mr. Smith, are the clergy?" "All gone to congratulate the new Chancellor."

Mr. Luttrell mentioned an Irish clergyman who was much offended at being called a "pluralist," and said, "if you don't take care, you will find me a duellist."—Smith took this up, and said, "I suppose there is scarcely a clergyman in Ireland who has not been out. I am told they settle these matters when the afternoon's service is over. I have seen a parson's challenge—'Sir, meet me on the first Sunday after the Epiphany.'"

Sidney Smith, after travelling some hours in a stage-coach with one other passenger only, a lady, said, as he was about to leave the coach, "We have been some time together, and I dare say you think me a very odd fellow, and would like to know who I am?" "Indeed, sir, I should." "Well then, madam," he said, as the coach stopped, and he was getting out, "I must inform you that I am the stout gentleman who was seen by Mr. Washington Irving's nervous friend."

Mr. Rogers told me that Smith received invitations to dine with Whitbread and with some peer at the same time. He accepted Whitbread's, and wrote to the peer that he "was engaged to dine with the great fermentator in Chiswell street." But, putting his answers into the wrong covers, his excuse to the peer went to the brewer and Lady Elizabeth Whitbread replied, "The great fermentator is much obliged to Mr. Smith for giving him the preference." He answered, "I have received your ladyship's note, and kill myself on the spot."

Edwin Landseer said to him, "With your love of honor, it must be a great self-denial to abstain from the theatres." "The managers," he replied, "are very polite; they send me free admissions, which I can't use; and in return I send them free admissions to St. Paul's," where he preached.

The last number of Thackeray's Cornhill Magazine closes the first half-yearly volume, and the illustrious Mr Titmarsh sings this funny hymn of glorification to himself:

"I fancy the Imperator standing on the steps of the temple (erected by Titus) on the Mons Frumentarius, and addressing the citizens. "Quirites!" he says, "in our campaign of six months, we have been engaged six times, and in each action have taken near upon a hundred thousand prisoners. Go to! What are other magazines to our magazine? (Sound, trumpeter!). What banner is there like that of Cornhill? You, philosopher yonder?—(he shirks under his mantle.) Do you know what it is to have a hundred and ten thousand readers? A hundred thousand readers! a hundred thousand buyers!" (Cries of No!—Pooh! Yes, upon my honor.) Oh come! and murmurs of applause and derision)—"I say more than a hundred thousand purchasers—and as much as a million readers! (Immense sensation.) To these have we said an unkind word? We have enemies; have we hit them an unkind blow? Have we sought to pursue party aims, to forward private jobs, to advance selfish schemes? The only persons to whom wittingly we have given pain are some who have volunteered for our corps—and of these volunteers we have had thousands—(Murmurs and grumbles.) What commander, citizens, could place all these men—could make officers of all these men? —(cries of "no, no," and laughter)—could say, 'I accept this recruit, though he is too short for our standard, because he is poor and has a mother at home who wants bread? could enrol the other who is too weak to bear arms, because he says, "Look, sir, I shall be stronger anon." The leader of such an army as ours must select his men, not because they are good and virtuous, but because they are strong and capable. To these our ranks are ever open; and in addition to the warriors—who surround me—(the generals look proudly conscious) —I tell you, citizens, that I am in treaty with other and most tremendous champions, who will march by the side of our veterans to the achievement of fresh victories.—Now, blow trumpets! Bang, ye gongs! and drummers drub the thundering skins! Generals and chiefs, we go to sacrifice to the gods."

Crowned with flowers, the captains enter the temple, the other magazines walking modestly behind them. The people huzza; and, in some instances, kneel and kiss the robes of the warriors. The Philosopher puts up his shutters, and retires into his shop, deeply moved. In ancient times, Pliny (apud Smith) relates it was the custom of the Imperator "to paint his whole body a bright red;" and also, on ascending the hill, to have some of the hostile chiefs led aside "to the adjoining prison, and put to death." We propose to dispense with both these ceremonies."

Messrs. Harper and Brothers have just published "Right at Last, and other Tales, by Mrs. Gaskell," which contains a very remarkable story of the early American times, and the Salem witchcraft, called "Lois, the Witch," a story worthy of Hawthorne; also, "Harper's Illustrated Natural History, for schools and families," by the popular author of the "Child's Book of Nature;" "Selling Lucky," the fourth of the "Rainbow and Lucky" series, by Jacob Abbott, which have met with such success; and "Smith's Smaller History of Greece," for public schools and beginners in history.

Messrs. Little & Brown have just out the eighth volume of Bancroft's History of the United States. I notice that Geo. P. Putnam is getting out a new edition of Irving's works. There seems to be no end of these new editions of Irving—mostly, I imagine, printed from the same plates. There was a rumor here that the novel, "Ratledge," was written by Miss Evans, the author of Beulah, but it is again contradicted.

A Florence correspondent of a Boston paper gives the following description of the author of "Adam Bede:" She "would be called 'ugly' by thoughtless persons, but the more discriminating pronounce her intelligent and interesting in appearance. She is a woman of forty (probably), tall in stature, large in build, of fair complexion, golden hair, fine teeth, light eyes, long nose, and the face is altogether long. In the heaviness of jaw and highness of cheek-bones, she greatly resembles a German. The expression of her face is gentle and amiable, while her manner is particularly timid and retiring."

LITERARY NOTICES.

The Debates in Congress, by the Author of the "Thirty Years View." Vol. 3. (Published by D. Appleton and Company.) This volume embraces the eighth and ninth Congresses, and the first session of the tenth, and presents many of the most interesting questions and debates connected with the political history of the country. Among the subjects of debate are, the Embargo Act, the Algerine War, the Alien and Sedition Laws, Foreign Allegiance, Amendments to the Constitution, Bank of the United States, Bankrupt Act, British Aggressions, Trial of Judge Chase, District of Columbia, Duties on Imports, Importation of Slaves, Flag of the United States, Purchase of Florida, Foreign Ministers, Georgia Land Claim, Gunboats, Habeas Corpus, Home Manufactures, Library of Congress, Louisiana Treaty, Military Academy, Neutral Rights, Non-Importation of British Goods, Ordinance of 1787, Public Lands, Soldiers of the Revolution, Yazoo Bill, and much more, too much to mention. This work, to an American citizen, is worth all the political libraries in the world. In the volume under notice, we not only have presented the important measures of the time, but also the great speeches from the great statesmen of the time. No citizen should be without the "Debates," who is able to buy the work.

Cicero on Oratory and Orators, translated & edited by J. S. Watson. (Published by Harper and Brothers.) This book is one of the series constituting Harper's New Classical Library, conforming in appearance to Bohn's Classical Library. Here are to be found the matured opinions of the great Roman orator upon the science and art of eloquence, and his criticisms upon the eminent orators of his time. Interesting and valuable to all readers, it will be especially so to all who seek to cultivate the gift of public speech. For sale in New Orleans by Thos. L. White.

The West Indies and the Spanish Main, by Anthony Trollop, (Published by Harper and Brothers.) This is a well written book, describing an interesting region of country, and throwing light on some of the most important social and political questions of the day. Mr. Trollop is an Englishman and an anti-slavery man, but his observations, honestly stated, are entirely favorable to the Southern and Pauline view of the question of emancipation. The style is pleasant and readable, and the book is valuable and interesting. For sale in New Orleans by Thos. L. White.

The Three Clerks, by Anthony Trollope. (Published by Harper and Brothers.) This is a fiction by the author of that fine work just noticed, "The West Indies and the Spanish Main," Whether or not Mr. Trollope is as successful in romance as in reality, we leave the reader to judge. His reputation, however, is good. For sale in New Orleans by Thos. L. White.

A Course of Exercises in French Syntax, by Frederick T. Winkelman. (Published by D. Appleton and Company.) The author of this work is Professor of Latin, French and German in the Packer Collegiate Institute of Brooklyn, N. Y., and has a high reputation in his profession. We should judge that the present work is valuable for the purposes for which it is intended. For sale in New Orleans by J. C. Morgan.

A Mother's Trials, by the author of "My Lady." (Published by Harper and Brothers.) This is a fiction said to be of the best kind. It has already won commendation in high literary quarters. For sale in New Orleans by Thos. L. White.

The Elementary Spelling Book, by Noah Webster, LL. D. (Published by D. Appleton and Company.)—Webster's Spelling Book is, beyond all controversy, the great national standard, whatever may be the case with the dictionaries. This is an improvement on the "American Spelling Book," and a revised edition. For sale by J. C. Morgan.

Short Stories, by Charles Dickens. (Published by T. B. Peterson and Brothers, Philadelphia.) This book contains about thirty of Dickens' short stories, gathered in one volume. Dickens' stories are read by every body, albeit they have faults. The public will be glad to find these stories all in one book. For sale by J. C. Morgan.

The British Reviews and Blackwood.—We have received from the Publishers, Leonard Scott & Co., through J. C. Morgan & Co., New Orleans, the Westminster, the Edinburgh, the London Quarterly, and the North British Reviews, and Blackwood's Magazine, for May. With the exception of the infidel tendencies of the Westminster, these periodicals, as the principal representatives of current British literature, are the best in the language. No man who pretends to anything like study of English literature can do without them. They are cheap as well as valuable—$10 procuring the whole of them.

☞ Further notices crowded out till next week.

BEGINNING OF THE HALF VOLUME.

This number of the Advocate is the first of the second half volume of 1860. The price, of course, is fifty cents—a dollar. To those who subscribe now, we can send the back numbers, for some weeks, which we will do gratis, as long as they last. We hope for a large list of new subscribers beginning with the first number in July.—We ask now, as we have asked before, that all of our preachers exhibit the paper in all their congregations, and urge the people to subscribe for it. Brethren, will you not do this? We hesitate to say how many new subscribers we believe could be obtained, if this were faithfully and earnestly done. Brother preacher, have you ever made such an effort for your paper? Whether you have or have not, will you not do so now? Brother presiding elder, will you do so at all your quarterly meetings? Choose the time when you have the largest congregation. Present it, as it is, as a suitable paper for all classes of people, in the Church, of all denominations, and all classes out of the Church; as a good religious, literary, family, and news paper.

We also ask all our subscribers to help us in the good work of extending the circulation of the Advocate.—Brother, sister, friend, could you not get a new subscriber if you were to try? Will you not try? One, from you, alone, would not be much, but one from each one of you would give us an increase of thousands. In all earnestness we ask you, will you try, as soon as you read this, and keep trying till you succeed?

There is not an interest, to which you give your labor, your thought, your money, or your prayers, of the church or of the country, that will not be advanced by increasing the circulation of the Advocate. You may not be pleased with some things the Editor has said; but then you must remember that he did not know what would please you—that if he had pleased you, he might have displeased somebody else—that he was not sent here to please you, and does not intend to try. He was sent to make the best paper he could; he has done so, and is content. Only, he wants a large list of new subscribers. Let him have them!

Jackson Railroad.—The morning train leaves this city at eight o'clock in the morning, and the night train at eight o'clock in the evening. An accommodation train leaves at four o'clock every Saturday afternoon, for the benefit of summer residents on the road, and runs as far as Magnolia, returning on Monday morning. The pine hills are now easy of access, and are delightful and healthy for summer residences. This railroad is one of the most important in the country, and is doing an immense business. We have never seen a better class of Conductors.

But Few Advertisements.—Our readers, as a general thing, express flattering approval of the small number of advertisements now inserted in the Advocate. We have but little more than half the amount of advertising we formerly had. We reject four times as much as we insert. Yet we make twice as much money by advertising as we did formerly. Our circulation is large, our columns are sought, and command good prices.

Once For All.—Teachers desiring situations, and schools desiring teachers, will please not write to the editor of this paper, as he cannot possibly have the information they desire, in one case in ten, and as he cannot take the time to answer their letters. Why not send a "notice" to be published in the paper for a month, and five dollars to pay for it, with your address? Let the letters be directed to yourself.

The Sketch Book is the title of a new paper which has recently made its appearance in Auburn, Ala., edited by Messrs. Price and Mason. Professor Price is a brother of President Price, of Tuskegee Female College, and Dr. Mason is a son of Hon. W. W. Mason, of East Alabama. From our knowledge of the men we predict they will make one of the most charming papers in the country.

Rev. T. N. Ralston, D. D., who recently left the Methodist Episcopal Church, and joined the Protestant Episcopal Church, has returned to the Methodist Church. His happiness demanded it, he says. His candor is commendable.

Our Weekly Summary of News.—Reader, is it not worth the price of the paper? Did you ever see a better one in a weekly paper? Here you have all the important news, of all sorts, from everywhere, carefully condensed and classified, "once a week."

LETTER FROM CHINA.

Shanghai, China, March 21, 1860.

Rev. T. C. Thornton—My dearly beloved brother and father, long have I been anxiously expecting a letter from you, so dear to myself and wife. I feel sad when I hear by almost every letter that reaches me, of your feeble health. I may now be address ng one who is no longer among us, but whose name liveth and shall ever live, and be treasured as dear to our hearts. Your name is indelibly written in our hearts. You shall never be forgotten, as one who loved us dearly and the China Mission, and whose name is inseparably connected with it. Am I not addressing one who loves his Master's cause? I verily believe it is dear to you, no matter where the standard be raised. Memories of the past have often melted my heart to tears of joy, and often have I been cheered by the kind, affectionate and loving letter of a very dear brother and father. I have wept for joy when, in my isolated condition, I have been blessed with such communications from those so dear to me, and to whom the work of saving souls is so dear. They are bright spots of my past experience. We have sometimes the dark side, but the Lord has so blessed us as to cause us to rejoice even in the midst of these. I have been long convinced that I could do nothing without the Saviour. I must abide in him. I am convinced of my insufficiency, and desire more of the sweet and strengthening influences of his Holy Spirit. I am assured that I have your prayers, and the prayers of other dear friends, that I may never be left to my own strength. I desire not to trust myself in anything. I wish to confide all to my Saviour, that I may be strengthened and blessed in laboring for the salvation of the heathen. Much depends upon our earnestness and faithfulness to God in the work; I may say all depends upon that. It is by the light of the Holy Spirit the heathen are made to see their destitute condition; this Spirit will not be granted but by faith and prayer, and earnest supplication at the Throne of Grace.

It will now soon be six years since I arrived at my field of labor. The Lord has been gracious to me in such a degree as humbles my heart before Him. He has blessed me more than I could have asked, yea, exceedingly more than I could have thought. I know that, if I rely on the Lord He will fulfill his good pleasure in me, and raise my heart from earth to heaven. Happy are we if we can have Him for our support in all things. I have often thought I would be the happiest creature on earth if I could, in all I do and say, first commune with God in prayer. I know that He is an all-sufficient Saviour, and that He will sanctify all who come unto Him. If we converse much with Him we shall be heavenly minded, and we shall seek those things which are above. O, that the Lord may grant a spirit of continual supplication, that my heart may be each hour with Him; and as the Lord Jesus loved me, and gave himself a ransom for me, so may my heart be fixed on Him until I be perfectly able to do His will. Though our hearts often sink down to earth again after being once with the Lord, yet He is gracious and long-suffering, and will receive us again if we return to him. Often have I been discouraged and cast down when trying to preach Christ and Him crucified to this heathen people, to see them so indifferent, and regarding what we tell them as of no importance. But blessed be the name of God, his blessed and holy word comforts me, and the precious promises given to His dear and only begotten Son gives me new hope and strength. The Lord will not fail us, for with Him "there is no variableness nor shadow of turning." He is "the same yesterday, to-day and forever," in whom is infinite fullness of all spiritual blessings to those who would come unto Him. O, that God would help me to be an humble supplicant at the feet of Jesus, that I may by faith be purged from iniquity, and made a fit temple for the indwelling of the Holy Spirit of God, and warmed up to more entire devotedness to Him and His cause among the heathen. O, how much we need a live coal from the altar to kindle in us a flame of sacred love, and consume in us all the dross, and fit us for the Refiner's use. Often have I bewailed my utter barrenness and distance from God, but I can truly say that my soul thirsteth after the Lord as a thirsty land. I can feel that He is near at hand to help according to every need, and though we are continually warfaring and struggling with the enemy, He will not suffer us to be overpowered.

My dear President Thornton, these are precious and consoling thoughts to me, to know that the arm of the Lord is on my side. He prepares us for His work, and opens the way by removing all difficulties.

Thus we are greatly encouraged to see the Lord gradually opening the way here for the spread of His pure and holy religion among these benighted heathen, who have resisted the truth so long. Thirty years ago no one dared openly to preach Christ among this people; they had threatened any such with death, and thus the Missionary of the Cross had to come as the way was opened, and now those difficulties are almost entirely removed. Missionaries have been able to go to nearly all parts of this populous empire, and declare the glad news of the gospel of Jesus to a dying people, and a people without God in the world. Some have believed and embraced the truth, and are already rejoicing in the hope of eternal life at God's right hand. Thus, the missionary's heart is gladdened to see the hand of the Lord in all this. We hope soon to see the way opened more extensively to regions beyond, where the people still sit in darkness and the shadow of death.

Dear President Thornton, I want to ask you a question in reference to the money I received from you, my father, and all the dear friends. Am I at liberty to use that money for building churches, conducting schools, and supporting the poor, or am I to hand it over to our mission in Shanghai, to be directed as they think? I wish to know in full about this, for one of our Mission here says I have no right to use such funds. Now I am still under the direction of the Mississippi Conference, and will be, I hope, while I stay in China. I shall write more in full about this matter to the Conference in July. And the Church which I had built in the city is still in the name of the Conference, though it is made use of by all the Mission. When the Conference says deliver it over to the Mission, to be the property of the Board, then I will do it. I hope you will write me in reference to this matter, that I may know what to do. If I was supported by my Conference, as is the case of many, our work would not be cramped, and we would not only have enough to buy our bread, but have a surplus to help us in the work of erecting churches, schools, &c. I hope you will write to me if you can. I feel it greatly encourages me when I receive one of your letters. I hope I shall receive more of them as often as you are able to write. I pray the Lord that He may bless you, and be your constant support in life.

We have now much excitement in China. The Insurgents are still successful in conquering some of the most wealthy provinces of China, and some of the largest cities. It seems that great and overwhelming judgments are being, as it were in one day, poured out upon this idolatrous nation. They have war from without and war from within. England and France are, in one more month, to descend upon them. This great, idolatrous and corrupt nation is to be revolutionized. Let the people of God pray that good may be the result of all this confusion, and that the people may see that these judgments are sent upon them for their gross wickedness in the sight of God. We are still quiet at Shanghai, but we do not know at what moment we may have to flee from our dwelling. I have often thought since my dear Mary and dear children left me, it was a blessing that they should not be here during such disturbances. Give my love to all your family and dear friends, and believe me ever

Your brother in Christ Jesus,

J. W. Lambuth.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

JULY 4, 1860.

LETTER FROM MRS. LAMBUTH.

New-York City, June 4th, 1860.

Rev. J. R. Lambuth: Just on the eve of setting sail I come to say good-bye to dear father and loved ones at home. My passage is paid, and state room all nicely carpeted, for the passage to Shanghai, aboard the ship "Nubia," Captain Baxter being in command, while our friend Bro. Dillingham is first officer. The Captain's wife accompanies us, and Miss Conover, of Philadelphia, returns with me to our homes in China. There are also two Chinese; one a man, who goes as an assistant for us, and a woman who came as nurse to a merchant's wife. Then, there is still one other—a young gentleman of New York city, who goes as a seeker of pleasure. Thus our list is filled. I think we shall have a pleasant time, at all events we must try and make it so.

I left dear Walter and Nellie one week ago last night, and have heard twice from them in that time; they are both well, and seem to be quite resigned to their lot.—"Walter" misses me much more than "Nettie" does, and has on one or two occasions cried on account of my absence, but when his grand-ma talked with him he said she was glad to have me go back and teach the Chinese girls how to go to heaven, so that he might meet them there when he went to that happy place."

I wish, dear father, you might write the children through "post-office" a letter, and let them become better acquainted with you all. I have told Sister Carrie to try and go to see you this winter; but in consequence of her very poor health, I am somewhat afraid she will give up the visit. I should greatly enjoy having the dear children with you through the winter, and if I were at home it should be so—as I shall not be there I cannot act.

I had a letter from your dear son to-day, dated March 31st. He was then quite well, and very anxiously awaiting the time for my return to him; a happy day that will be, will it not? but oh! how much I will miss all my loved ones, while on the way; but I feel sure that our kind Heavenly Father will be near, and ever watch over us, and give us every needful blessing. May your prayers often find an remembered at a throne of grace, and may we, because of those prayers, enjoy much of the Holy Spirit's influence among us.

Dear William mentions the arrival of the box you, together with sister Lizzie and brother Olney, sent me last year. He was quite delighted, and said he found everything very nice indeed. The presents for our dear children, together with mine, he has put away until I return. I am rejoiced at this, for I longed to see what I knew was intended for our enjoyment. You will have my most sincere and heart-felt thanks for the many acts of kindness extended to us, and I pray God to abundantly bless you in all things.

I go cheerfully, and rejoice that I come so unworthy, can do a little for the advancement of Christ's kingdom upon earth.

Love to all, and may I find letters from each one when I arrive at my loved home in China. Good-by to you all, and may you not forget to pray for your affectionate child and sister,

MARY J. LAMBUTH.

P. S.—I am and have been stopping while in the city with the Rev. Dr. Terry and family, 199 Mulberry Street, and greater kindness I seldom ever saw. I wish you could write and thank them on my behalf. He is Recording Secretary of the Missionary Society, and his house is a home for the missionary. We sail to-morrow morning at one o'clock.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

A New Church Edifice Dedicated.—Rev. T. J. Lucy writes: On the 17th instant a new church edifice was dedicated at the north or upper end of Bonoff Prairie, Winnsboro circuit, La. Conference. The enterprize was commenced last winter; but the undertaker did not lay the foundation until about the first of March, and in little more than three months an edifice, commodious and of elegant proportions, was erected. The occasion was evidently appreciated by one of interest, especially so since it is the first house that has been dedicated exclusively to the worship of Almighty God, in Franklin parish, La.; and the one is in every way worthy of imitation. Its entire cost, including a good cistern, is $2,200. But this amount is quite enough to build a neat and commodious church edifice in the country. Lumber, living and labor, are all so much cheaper than in cities, that we can get a much better house for the same money than could be had in a city. In other places the people have a mind to build also. A few days since, passing through a neighborhood, without making anything like an effort, the writer obtained, in subscriptions and promises, near $2,000 for the building of a house for God. It has been said that "Winnsboro circuit was greatly in prospect." But the prospect is bright and full of promise. Franklin parish is mostly free from inundation, with rich and fertile lands; and were it not that so much of these lands are owned by non-residents speculators, the parish would soon be densely populated; and in a high state of cultivation. As to health, I will only say that my own family, up to the present, are in better health than they have ever been.

Death of Rev. B. C. Stengall.—Rev. T. H. McClendon writes: Our Brother B. C. Stengall, appointed as Supernumerary to the Columbia Circuit, who lived in the bounds of this circuit, died on the 10th of the month, at his own residence, after an illness of ten days. I went to see him, after he had been sick several days. Taking hold of his hand, and asking him how he felt, he said he was better, and that he would then, perhaps, get well, but that he felt rather disappointed, for he had expected to have been in heaven before that time.

Tigerville Celebration.—Rev. Wm. McBeath writes us that on the 15th instant they had a most interesting Sabbath School Celebration. Rev R. J. Harp delivered an excellent address, and a number of good speeches were made by the boys and girls. A pleasant repast concluded the ceremonies, and all departed well pleased.

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Brookhaven.—Rev. P. E. Green writes: We closed a protracted meeting on the 10th instant, which had lasted eighteen nights. Some had been converted, some reclaimed, the Church generally revived, and some thirty-two or thirty-three whites, eight or ten blacks, by letter and otherwise, had joined the Church.

On yesterday the first Commencement of Whitworth College closed under very flattering prospects. A large number of freemasons came forward, on Wednesday, and laid the corner-stone, much to the delight of the vast concourse. After this the masons marched to the Methodist Episcopal Church, where we heard a very interesting address delivered, by the Rev. H. F. Johnson, of Fayette, Miss., upon the Education of Woman. We attended the examination of the classes, and must say that we never witnessed a more rigid and thorough examination, and one which seemed to give more general satisfaction. The reading of compositions and all the performances on the rostrum were highly interesting. The young ladies acquitted themselves well. Some one better qualified will send you a full report of these interesting exercises. We also had an examination on Friday, and at night an exhibition at the Male Academy, Rev. William Regan, Principal. This examination and exhibition were also highly interesting. Our citizens are now raising funds to erect a larger and a more commodious building for the Male Academy. The Female College buildings are large and commodious, and our citizens seem determined to have good buildings for the Male Academy. May they succeed, and long may these institutions of learning, their presidents, teachers, and those noble and self-sacrificing men who build up and foster these institutions of learning, long live to bless our race. And here in Brookhaven may religion and education go hand-in-hand.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Enterprize, Miss.—Rev. W. M. Motley writes: We have recently had a very good revival of religion here. About thirty-five professed religion. Thirty joined the Church on probation. The Church was considerably revived.

WEEKLY SUMMARY OF NEWS.

CONGRESSIONAL.

At the extra Executive session of the Senate, on the 26th ult., the Extradition treaty with Switzerland, and the treaties of Commerce and Friendship with Bolivia, Venezuela, Honduras, and Nicaragua, were ratified.

At the sitting on the 27th, the Senate having failed to reconcile the disagreement on the Mexican treaty, its further consideration was postponed till December.

The treaty with Spain, recently negotiated by Minister Preston, was rejected. The Black Republican Senators opposed it because of the clause which provid d for the payment of the Aspinwall claimes. They made an effort to have this clause stricken out, but the motion was disagreed to, and to the question of ratification twenty-four voted in the affirmative and eighteen in the negative, and the requisite two-thirds. The Senate then adjourned.

POLITICAL.

Arkansas Electoral Ticket.—The Bell and Everett electoral ticket for the State of Arkansas, is composed of the following gentlemen: Jas. Yell, of Jefferson; A. H. Garland, of Pulaski; H. F. Thompson, of Crawford; John H. Askew, of Union.

The National Douglas Committee of Washington has organized for the Presidential Campaign—Mr. Belmont, of New York, Chairman.

Bell and Everett in Florida.—The following papers in Florida have hoisted the names of Bell and Everett, and will give their support to those gentlemen during the approaching Presidential campaign: The Tallahassee Sentinel, the Lake City Independent Press, the Pensacola Gazette, the Milton Courier, and the West Florida Enterprise.

The President's Veto of the Homestead Bill.—In the message sent by the Senate on the 23d ult., vetoing the Homestead bill, the President says the small sum asked for the public lands by the bill—twenty-five cents per acre and a credit of five years—is equal almost to a donation, and that Congress has no right to give away the public domain to States or individuals. Furthermore, aside from the constitutional objections, the bill is unjust to old soldiers who hold military bounty lands, as it greatly reduces their value. It opens a large field for iniquitous speculations, makes an unjust discrimination between Americans and foreigners, by prohibiting the former, it single, from having the benefit of the bill, while the foreigner, without being the head of a family, is given those privileges. The bill draws partial distinctions between pre-emptors, and seriously affects the revenue from the public lands. The question was taken in the Senate on the passage of the bill, notwithstanding the President's objections, and the veto of the President was sustained. The vote stood 28 to 18, two-thirds of the votes cast being required to pass the bill over the veto.

Messrs. Douglas and Johnson, and Breckenridge and Lane have accepted the nominations made by the Douglas and Constitutional Conventions at Baltimore.

The Vermont Republican State Convention met at Rutland on the 29th ult., and nominated the Hon. Erastus Fairbanks, of St. Johnsbury, for Governor. The Convention also nominated Presidential Electors for the State, etc.

The Alabama Bell and Everett Convention met at Selma on the 27th ult., and nominated a State and District Electoral ticket. It is reported that over 200 Delegates, representing all parts of the State, were in attendance, and that much enthusiasm was manifested.

The friends of Bell and Everett assembled in goodly numbers at Odd Fellows Hall, in this city, on Saturday night, 30th ult., and elected Delegates to the State Convention at Baton Rouge.

The Breckenridge and Lane National Committee at Washington has been fully organized.

Judge Kane has been confirmed as Chief Justice of Utah.

The President has determined not to fill the vacancy in the Supreme Court till next winter.

The Democratic State Convention of Michigan has nominated Hon. John R. Berry for Governor.

The Constitutional Democratic Convention reassembled at Richmond, Va., on the 28th ult., pursuant to adjournment, passed a resolution declaring for Breckenridge and Lane, and then adjourned sine die.

DOMESTIC.

Mississippi Central Road.—The Holly Springs Star says: Arrangements have been made by this road for a very heavy business the coming season; in fact an increase of 200 per cent. over last season is anticipated. Some 250 cars have been ordered to be in readiness for the cotton trade.

Maroney, who was indicted in Montgomery, Alabama, for robbing the Adams Express Company of $40,000 in January, 1854, has pleaded guilty, and been sentenced to the Penitentiary for two years.

Dreadful Catastrophe at Sea.—In the last issue of the Christian Advocate, we briefly mentioned the loss of the United States steamer Walker, by a collision at sea. The following particulars of the disaster are furnished by Quartermaster Clifford: "The United States coast survey steamer Walker, Lieutenant Commanding J. J. Guthrie, left Norfolk, Va., on Tuesday, the 15th, for New York. At half-past 2 A. M., of the 21st, when 8 inch from N. N. E. half E., came in contact with a schooner. At the time of the collision, Lieut. J. A. Sewall, the executive officer, was on the watch. It was about a quarter past two in the morning. We saw the schooner ahead, coming before the wind, and put the helm hard apeort to clear her—The schooner was close aboard of us. The lights of both vessels were burning clear. The atmosphere was cloudy, and the wind blowing fresh from the northeast. The schooner therefore struck the starboard bow and of the port guard and wheel-house, cutting her down to the water's edge, and carried away her own head-works. The schooner hung for a moment, then swung aboard side, and carried away the forward and quarter boats of the steamer. Getting clear of the schooner, we worked ahead, and found the Walker was sinking; cut away her mainmast, hoops, and got everything movable on deck, to make a raft for the men. Everybody cool, and the officers behaving with great pleasure of manner. Lowered both starboard boats and dropped them astern for use when the vessel went down. By this time every soul was on deck except those who may have been killed or injured by the collision, and a sick man on board, near seventy years of age, almost helpless, had been carefully lifted out and laid in one of the boats. As was ordered by. The man stayed by the steamer until she was sinking, and then, with all coolness, each of the men passed took to the boats. Many of the crew went down with the steamer never emerging to the spars and portions of the wreck, and expected to be saved in that way. The captain stayed on board until the steamer went down, and just before she disappeared from sight jumped into the water; and was picked up by one of the boats. Lieut. Sewall was drawn down in the vortex, and, after remaining for a considerable time floating on a portion of the wreck, was also rescued by one of the boats. A heavy sea was running, and many of the men were doubtless washed off the spars and drowned from the mere exhaustion of holding on, while others were killed or stunned on rising to the surface by concussion with spars and other parts of the wreck. The steamer had entirely sunk from sight in thirty minutes after the collision. Many of the crew were rescued by the boats, in which were about forty-four persons, and they were in turn picked up by the schooner H. G. Porter, Capt. S. S. Hudson. He did nobly, keeping his vessel about the spot where the wreck went down until 2 o'clock in the day, and using every endeavor to render us comfortable and afford the desired assistance. Finding that it was useless to remain longer in searching for the missing, Capt. Hudson stood into Cape May, where he arrived about 4 o'clock on Thursday afternoon." The above account is corroborated in all particulars by that of Lieut. Commanding J. J. Guthrie. He states, in addition, that on arriving at Cape May, a schooner was there with a tent in her forecast, her head spars carried away, and her cabin-er injured. The name of this vessel was the Fanny, and the time of her arrival was such as to make it almost certain that she was the author of the accident. While in Cape May the officers and crew were provided with much needed refreshments and clothing by the citizens. A heavy gale was blowing at the time, and a rough sea running, which caused the steamer to careen and settle much more rapidly than she otherwise would have done, as well as prevented those engaged in the work of rescue from saving all those who were enabled for a time to keep themselves above water. It is hoped that as a number of schooners were in the vicinity, others may have been picked up, and, indeed, from the manœuvres of them, the Captain states that it is almost certain that such is the case.

The 85th Anniversary of the Battle of Bunker Hill was celebrated on the 18th ult., with appropriate ceremonies, at Boston and Charleston.

The Baton Rouge Gazette says the population and wealth of that city have doubled within the last two years.

The Jury Excuse.—A party who proceed by appointment from the National Almanac Office, established by the Navy Department of the United States at Cambridge, Mass., under the charge of Commander Charles H. Davis, United States Navy, arrived in St. Paul, Minnesota, some time ago; upon a journey of one thousand miles northwest of that city, for the purpose of observing, with astronomical instruments, the eclipse of the sun on the 18th inst., at Cumberland House, in the interior of British America.

It is reported that the Hon. L. Q. C. Lamar, member of Congress from Mississippi, intends resigning his seat to accept the position of Assistant Law Professor, in the State University.

The United States store ship Relief, from Aspinwall, arrived at Boston on the 19th inst.

It is stated that the maple sugar crop of the country has vastly exceeded that of any former year, and prices have ruled so low that, in many sections, the consumption of foreign sugar has been materially interfered with. In the Northern part of New Hampshire, Vermont, New York, and in some of the Western States, nearly a sufficient quantity has been made, it is said, to supply the home demand for raw sugar.

Dr. Ramsey, the Registrar of Records of New York City, is taking measures to prosecute before the Courts, for the penalty of $50, any clergyman who shall be proved to have neglected to make monthly return of all marriages performed by them.—Thus determination covers the case of Archbishop Hughes and of all the Catholic priesthood.

The report from Denver city that Fowler, the defaulting New York Postmaster, had been seen and identified at Pike's Peak, it appears, was unfounded. A gentleman writes from Havana, that Fowler was in that city and had called upon him.

The Ohio Journal of Education gives an account of a school in that State where, out of the thirty-five scholars nine boys chew tobacco, and five girls are smokers.

Commercial Intercourse Between Japan and the United States.—On the 19th ult., a Committee of the New York Chamber of Commerce had an interview at the Metropolitan Hotel, with the Japanese Ambassadors, when the President of the Chamber, Wm. Peet, addressed the Ambassadors. He expressed the hope that for ages to come, Japan and the United States will be bound together by friendly relations; that peace, unfettered commerce, and the effects of benevolence will mark their intercourse—thus helping on the civilization and happiness of the human race. To this address the Ambassadors, through their interpreter, made the following reply: The Embassy acknowledge the pleasure they feel in receiving the delegations of the distinguished Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York. The Embassy feel the importance and the great advantage which will arise to their own country by the proposed general commercial intercourse between Japan and the United States. The Embassy appreciate the objects and aims of commerce, in its most extended shape, and therefore desire a reference some evening this week, with a committee of the Chamber, in order to consult upon details connected with commerce of the United States and of other nations." The New York Courier and Enquirer says that an evening had accordingly been selected for a conference between a committee of the Chamber and the Ambassadors.

The St. Joseph (Mo.,) Gazette learns that a Treaty has been concluded with the Delaware Indians for the sale of their lands.

The ship Star of the Union, chartered by the Colonization Society, has sailed from New York for Key West, to take on board and convey to the West Coast of Africa, 1,01 of the captured Africans landed at Key West.

The statue of Washington, by Hiram Powers, for the Masonic Lodge in Fredericksburg, Va., in which Washington was initiated and raised to the Master's degree, has arrived.

Prof. Bache, superintendent of the United States Coast Survey, writes to Mr. A. Lea, of Aransas (Texas), that, the distance from the light house at Aransas to Mazatlan, on the Pacific, is 600 statute miles. Mr. Lea communicates this to the Corpus Christi paper, with the remark: "With the information now before me, as to the character of the intervening country, I confidently rely on making a railroad from ship to ship, cross the continent, within seven hundred miles."

It is estimated that over two hundred thousand people will cross the plains this year for California, Utah, Oregon, etc.

The banks of Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware, held a meeting in Philadelphia recently, and formed an association for the prevention of counterfeiting and bogery. A similar association is in operation in the New England States.

The annual Commencement exercise at Centenary College, in Jackson, La., will commence on the 29th inst. It will be gratifying to the friends of the College, and to all advocates of home education in the South, to learn that the number of its students was never so great as at present.

Joseph and Robert Hatton, editors of the Virginian, were shot in the street, at Lynchburgh, Va., on the 23d, ult., by the brothers Hardwicks, editors and proprietors of the Republican.—One of the Buttons is said to be mortally, and the other seriously injured. Both the Hardwicks are in jail.

Large Sale of a Cotton Plantation.—Joshua M. Craig, of Chicot county, Arkansas, recently sold to Judge Francis Griffin, of Washington county, Miss., his plantation and negroes, known as the Lelaud Plantation, for the handsome sum of $1,000,000—$100,000 cash and the residue in seven equal annual payments, with 8 per cent. interest.

Frederick E. Church, the painter of the "Heart of the Andes," "Niagara," "Twilight," etc., was married on the 11th ult., at Dayton, Ohio, to Miss Isabel M. Carnes, of that city.

A New Comet.—Professor Bond, of the Harvard College Observatory, under date of the 22d, writes thus to the Boston papers: "A fine comet has come in view in the north-west, near the horizon, and on the verge of the evening twilight. Its nucleus is as bright as a star of the fourth magnitude, well concentrated, and has appended to it a narrow tail, but little curved, and rising vertically from the horizon like a faint streamer of the aurora.

An Extensive Mill.—The new mill at Lawrence, Mass., (that fatal spot) will be very extensive. The capacity of the establishment will enable the employment of about 2,800 persons, and the annual production of about 35,000,000 yards of goods; it will run 2,500 looms and 100,000 spindles, consuming weekly nearly 100,000 pounds of cotton and wool, and using annually 725,000 pounds starch, 16,000 gallons oil, 12,500 tons coal, $225,000 worth of dying and 450 bbls flour.

The Richmond Whig considers that the population of that city, within its corporate limits, is nearly 40,000, and that the suburbs embrace 11,000 to 12,000 more. This year's valuation of real estate in the city is $20,579,410—an increase of more than $100,000 over the appraisement of 1859.

It is reported that considerable excitement existed at El Paso, at last accounts, in consequence of a discovery of gold diggings, not far from Fort Fillmore, and between fifty and sixty miles, S.W. of El Paso. "A letter from El Paso says: "Reports from the newly discovered gold diggings west of here continue favorable. About a hundred and fifty men are now working, taking out from $8 to $12 per day. There is a regular stampede from this part of the country."

An Abolitionist Emissary.—The Austin Gazette publishes a letter from Grayson county, Texas, giving an account of the arrest of a white man who had been tampering with negroes, and owing to whose abolition harangues they had become insolent and unmanageable. The following is an extract from the letter: He confessed, and stated that he was not here of his own accord, but he was an emissary of the enlightened and society—that they paid his expenses to come and see what could be done among the slaves in Texas—and furthermore stated that he was not the only one of the same sort, but there were many more on the same business, and were all suspected. He was simply ordered to leave the State."

Contrary to the general impression, the Post Office Deficiency Bill became a law on the last day of the session of Congress. It was saved from defeat by the House unexpectedly receding from the amendment providing for the restoration, with a few exceptions, of all the inland service suspended on the 4th of March, 1859.

A despatch from Trenton, N. J., says that the Rev. Jacob S. Linden, who was convicted of the murder of his wife by poisoning her, has made a full confession of his guilt, and that he is to be hanged on Friday next, 6th inst.

Judge Stockton, of the Supreme Court of Iowa, died at his residence in Burlington, a few days ago. He was first appointed to the Supreme Bench by Governor Grimes in 1856, and subsequently elected to serve six years.

New Mexico.—The Hon. S. Baird, of Albuquerque, in a recent letter in regard to the state of things in New Mexico says: "The Indians are at war with us now on all sides, so that we are not safe on any road in the Territory. Corn is worth six dollars a hundred, and flour ten dollars a hundred. Fort Defiance is to be broken up and a new one established at Bear Spring. The posts at Taos, Santa Fe, Albuquerque, Los Lentes, Valverde, Mesilla, and Fort Union are all to be broken up and one strong post to be built on the Canadian. The Navajos have fought the battle by the light twenty-five cents per acre and a credit of five years—is equal almost to a donation, and that Congress has no right to give away the public domain to States or individuals. Furthermore, aside from the constitutional objections, the bill is unjust to old soldiers who hold military bounty lands, as it greatly reduces their value. It opens a large field for iniquitous speculations, makes an unjust discrimination between Americans and foreigners, by prohibiting the former, if single, from having the benefit of the bill, while the foreigner, without being the head of a family, is given those privileges. The bill draws partial distinctions between pre-emptors, and seriously affects the revenue from the public lands. The question was taken in the Senate on the passage of the bill, notwithstanding the President's objections, and the veto of the President was sustained. The vote stood 28 to 18, two-thirds of the votes cast being required to pass the bill over the veto.

Dreadful Catastrophe at Sea.—In the last issue of the Christian Advocate, we briefly mentioned the loss of the United States steamer Walker, by a collision at sea. The following particulars of the disaster are furnished by Quartermaster Clifford: "The United States coast survey steamer Walker, Lieutenant Commanding J. J. Guthrie, left Norfolk, Va., on Tuesday, the 15th, for New York. At half-past 2 A.M., of the 21st, when 8 inch from N. N. E. half E., came in contact with a schooner. At the time of the collision, Lieut. J. A. Sewall, the executive officer, was on the watch. It was about a quarter past two in the morning. We saw the schooner ahead, coming before the wind, and put the helm hard apeort to clear her—The schooner was close aboard of us. The lights of both vessels were burning clear. The atmosphere was cloudy, and the wind blowing fresh from the northeast. The schooner therefore struck the starboard bow and of the port guard and wheel-house, cutting her down to the water's edge, and carried away her own head-works. The schooner hung for a moment, then swung aboard side, and carried away the forward and quarter boats of the steamer. Getting clear of the schooner, we worked ahead, and found the Walker was sinking; cut away her mainmast, hoops, and got everything movable on deck, to make a raft for the men. Everybody cool, and the officers behaving with great pleasure of manner. Lowered both starboard boats and dropped them astern for use when the vessel went down. By this time every soul was on deck except those who may have been killed or injured by the collision, and a sick man on board, near seventy years of age, almost helpless, had been carefully lifted out and laid in one of the boats. As was ordered by. The man stayed by the steamer until she was sinking, and then, with all coolness, each of the men passed took to the boats. Many of the crew went down with the steamer never emerging to the spars and portions of the wreck, and expected to be saved in that way. The captain stayed on board until the steamer went down, and just before she disappeared from sight jumped into the water; and was picked up by one of the boats. Lieut. Sewall was drawn down in the vortex, and, after remaining for a considerable time floating on a portion of the wreck, was also rescued by one of the boats. A heavy sea was running, and many of the men were doubtless washed off the spars and drowned from the mere exhaustion of holding on, while others were killed or stunned on rising to the surface by concussion with spars and other parts of the wreck. The steamer had entirely sunk from sight in thirty minutes after the collision. Many of the crew were rescued by the boats, in which were about forty-four persons, and they were in turn picked up by the schooner H. G. Porter, Capt. S. S. Hudson. He did nobly, keeping his vessel about the spot where the wreck went down until 2 o'clock in the day, and using every endeavor to render us comfortable and afford the desired assistance. Finding that it was useless to remain longer in searching for the missing, Capt. Hudson stood into Cape May, where he arrived about 4 o'clock on Thursday afternoon." The above account is corroborated in all particulars by that of Lieut. Commanding J. J. Guthrie. He states, in addition, that on arriving at Cape May, a schooner was there with a tent in her forecast, her head spars carried away, and her cabin-er injured. The name of this vessel was the Fanny, and the time of her arrival was such as to make it almost certain that she was the author of the accident. While in Cape May the officers and crew were provided with much needed refreshments and clothing by the citizens. A heavy gale was blowing at the time, and a rough sea running, which caused the steamer to careen and settle much more rapidly than she otherwise would have done, as well as prevented those engaged in the work of rescue from saving all those who were enabled for a time to keep themselves above water. It is hoped that as a number of schooners were in the vicinity, others may have been picked up, and, indeed, from the manœuvres of them, the Captain states that it is almost certain that such is the case.

The 85th Anniversary of the Battle of Bunker Hill was celebrated on the 18th ult., with appropriate ceremonies, at Boston and Charleston.

The Baton Rouge Gazette says the population and wealth of that city have doubled within the last two years.

The Jury Excuse.—A party who proceed by appointment from the National Almanac Office, established by the Navy Department of the United States at Cambridge, Mass., under the charge of Commander Charles H. Davis, United States Navy, arrived in St. Paul, Minnesota, some time ago; upon a journey of one thousand miles northwest of that city, for the purpose of observing, with astronomical instruments, the eclipse of the sun on the 18th inst., at Cumberland House, in the interior of British America.

Commercial Intercourse Between Japan and the United States.—On the 19th ult., a Committee of the New York Chamber of Commerce had an interview at the Metropolitan Hotel, with the Japanese Ambassadors, when the President of the Chamber, Wm. Peet, addressed the Ambassadors. He expressed the hope that for ages to come, Japan and the United States will be bound together by friendly relations; that peace, unfettered commerce, and the effects of benevolence will mark their intercourse—thus helping on the civilization and happiness of the human race. To this address the Ambassadors, through their interpreter, made the following reply: The Embassy acknowledge the pleasure they feel in receiving the delegations of the distinguished Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York. The Embassy feel the importance and the great advantage which will arise to their own country by the proposed general commercial intercourse between Japan and the United States. The Embassy appreciate the objects and aims of commerce, in its most extended shape, and therefore desire a reference some evening this week, with a committee of the Chamber, in order to consult upon details connected with commerce of the United States and of other nations." The New York Courier and Enquirer says that an evening had accordingly been selected for a conference between a committee of the Chamber and the Ambassadors.

An Abolitionist Emissary.—The Austin Gazette publishes a letter from Grayson county, Texas, giving an account of the arrest of a white man who had been tampering with negroes, and owing to whose abolition harangues they had become insolent and unmanageable. The following is an extract from the letter: He confessed, and stated that he was not here of his own accord, but he was an emissary of the enlightened and society—that they paid his expenses to come and see what could be done among the slaves in Texas—and furthermore stated that he was not the only one of the same sort, but there were many more on the same business, and were all suspected. He was simply ordered to leave the State."

Contrary to the general impression, the Post Office Deficiency Bill became a law on the last day of the session of Congress. ALLINE ELWIN: A TALE OF ALABAMA.

BY FANNY SHELDON.

Chapter VII.

"Look round the world, and see what fate is there,
Which justice can pronounce exempt from care."

One day, as Alline was seated alone, with her head reclining upon her hands and her spirits more than usually depressed, she was aroused by a step at the door. She turned hastily, and met the commanding form and dark brilliant eyes of Edgar Glanville. As he advanced, she arose and bowed to some coolness.

"Miss Elwin, I suppose," said he, as he extended his hand.

Alline returned his greeting cordially.

"How is your mother to-day?" he asked, with much kindness, for he noticed her tearful eyes and depressed looks.

"She is very weak and declining rapidly," answered Alline.

"I am truly pained to hear this, Miss Elwin; but you must not grieve that her stay with you is to be so short, for you know that her death will be but a calm sleep, upon which will break a glorious splendor, in holy rapture, the beauties and never-fading brightness of heaven. Yes, all her hopes and yearnings will end in glad fruition—faith do right, and prayer to praise; and for yourself and little sister, can you not trust Him who has promised and whose word can never fail—can you not trust Him who hath said that the orphan is his especial care, and that he will never forsake or leave them desolate?"

"Yes, Mr. Glanville, I have long since learned to calm and control my own feelings to cheer and comfort the distressed; and it is my earnest prayer, that I may always be able to sacrifice every selfish wish and emotion, that I may not pain and that I may be more able to comfort and support the dear ones who look to me for consolation.—But my poor sad heart has had none to cheer and sustain it, none on whom it could lean for sympathy and encouragement but God; and there are times when I feel the loneliness of despair, as my heart yearns for human sympathy and I find it not. But I am detaining you from my mother, and she is anxious to see you."

As she led the way to the couch of her mother, Alline thought much of the kind words and sympathizing looks of Edgar Glanville. She listened to his deep-toned voice and earnest, holy conversation, his brilliant, elevated language and fervent prayers, till it seemed there was a connecting link between his heart and hers; for he, too, had known affliction. Yes,

"The heart glowing raptures that beamed from his eyes
Seemed saddened by sorrows and chastened by sighs,
As if his young heart in its youth had grown cold
With its love unrequited and its sorrows untold."

Alline was engaged one day in teaching little Mary to read—a task of which she never wearied; the child suddenly ceased reading, attracted by the varied hues of the western clouds as they mingled together or floated off into the ether dim. It was a glorious sunset, and as the child's gaze seemed to fix in rapture upon it, Alline, too, turned to contemplate the scene. Soon her attention was attracted by an exclamation from Mary, and turning, she beheld the child upon her knees, her tiny hands clasped, and her large, swimming, dark eyes raised in—il she read aright—trembled wonder; but before she had time to break the silence, the child exclaimed:

"Just so, Ally, just so last night I saw the angel fly away, away, away through the bright pretty clouds with mamma, and we called and tried to keep her back, but on and on they flew, shaking their long white robes in the air, till I could no longer see them; but, oh, I knew dear mamma was glad to go, for I heard sweet music as she went into those bright, bright clouds, just like those shining ones up yonder. Oh, was it not a beautiful dream, Ally? But yet when I woke I felt lonely, as if mamma was indeed gone, and I could not let her go not even with the sweet music and bright angels—could you, sister?" she asked, while the troubled look deepened upon her prophetic face.

While the child was speaking, Alline's face had also become shadowed not only by a presentiment of coming sorrow, but as it to add gloom to the strange words of the child, the clouds, which had been so bright and varied in their beauty, had mingled together, and their blended colors, instead of increasing the lustre, had deepened into dark heavy masses, with only a bright golden edge, that served to deepen the gloom beneath.

Alline drew Mary to her side with a nervous shudder, and telling her not to mention her dream to her mother, she passed with the child into Mrs. Elwin's apartment.—She strove to shake off the weight which had fallen upon her spirits, by renewed exertions of industry and of attention to domestic duties, and partially succeeded.

Chapter VIII.

"Oh, maiden, beware ere thy life become
A weariness soon, where joy has no home;
Wilt thou banish each wayward thought, and sea
How a trusting heart groweth sad for thee?"

We left Emma West at the little stream near her own home. She sat there long after Alline had left her. The shades of evening were deepening into twilight, and twilight was fast merging into darkness, when she arose, and with slow steps and a heavy heart began to ascend the path leading up the hill to her dwelling.

Never had it appeared so lonely or dreary looking to her before. But it better harmonized with her sad thoughts and anticipations better than would have more cheerful scenery or a brighter landscape. She entered her parlor, and threw herself on a lounge, to await the hour that would bring Edward Leslie. She declined taking her tea on the plea of a severe headache, from which she was really suffering; and thus she avoided meeting with the family. She did not wish them to learn the cause of her low spirits and altered looks, and thus she shunned their inquiring gaze and anxious questions.

The parlor had been lighted some time, and still she lay as if asleep. A form darkened the doorway. In a moment she started up, and stood in the centre of the apartment, and though her whole frame quivered with suppressed emotion, she calmly advanced and greeted Edward Leslie kindly, though coldly, for she could not in a moment become estranged from one she had known so many years; for childish remembrances came throngling around her, transporting her back to the halcyon days of almost infancy, and she could not in her heart feel unkindness toward a companion of those merry, happy hours, or speak to him as if a stranger. He appeared to feel her chilling demeanor, for after lending her to a seat and taking one beside her, he said:

"Emma, are you well this evening—you look pale and fatigued?"

"I am quite well, I thank you. But if I were not, I know not why it should disturb you, Edward."

"What do you mean, Emma? Why it should disturb me! Do you really not know? Would you have me believe that you have yet to learn that I love you as my very life; that I have no hope with which you are not connected; that I ask no boon, breathe no prayer, but your dear happiness is first? You cannot mean, Emma, to feign ignorance on a subject which has occupied both your thoughts and mine so long. Why these averted looks and cold words?"

"Ah! why, Edward? Because you, whom I have loved with all the devotion of a trusting, confiding heart, with all the strength of woman's nature, to whom I would have yielded, yes, have yielded the first, purest and most holy emotions of my soul; because you have deceived me. I believed you high-minded and magnanimous; that your bosom was the home of all that was generous, noble, and just; that your heart was the abiding place of truth and honor. It was for these, Edward, that I loved you; this is what I dreamed of for years. But I have had a sad awakening. Yet, though all the hopes I have cherished are dead; though the bright hues of fabulous brilliancy with which I had painted my future have dissolved into darkness and desolation, deem not that I regret, no, better that I suffer now than hereafter."

"Emma, dear Emma, what is this of which you are speaking? Surely you are not well, or your mind is deranged. Tell me, what is all this?"

"Yes, you taunt me with it too! But I am not deranged."

"Emma, I beg you to explain this to me. If I have wounded your feelings in any way, I have done so unconsciously I assure you. Tell me what has caused you so much pain. It is but just that I should know; and who, dear Emma, would sympathize with you and soothe your sorrow as I would? It is certainly my privilege, for would I not shield you from all harm? Would I not make joy a portion of the very atmosphere you breathe? Yea, would I not give my life freely if convinced by so doing I could secure for you unalloyed happiness—would I not do all this, and more if possible?"

"Edward, think not I hear this with indifference. I do not, have never doubted your affection for me; but you knew that your parents and friends were opposed to your marriage with Emma West, 'the poor, proud girl, in whose veins leaped the wild blood of hereditary lunacy.' You knew this and still persisted in your attentions, still prolonged an engagement which was but to end in my disappointment. You also uttered direct falsehoods to screen yourself from the censure you, perhaps, justly merited. This you have done; yes, this it is that has weakened the tie that has united us so long. I could have borne the sneers and insults of your family, and though refusing to fulfil my engagement with you, have still retained my confidence in you, still have believed you all that I had ever imagined you to be. But it is past. Take back this small circle of gold—this pledge of mutual affection; keep it for one more worthy, or better suited to mate with the patricidn family of the Leslies."

"Emma, this from you! I am deeply grieved; for if, as you say, you are deceived in me, I am doubly so in you, for I never could have believed that you would have thus thought and spoken to me. Better is it, indeed, as you say, that our engagement should cease now, for, Emma, dearly as I have loved you, yes, and as I still love you, I could never be happy myself, or render you so, if you suspect me of baseness such as this, and believe me so wanting in all that ensures confidence and respect. I leave you to your own reflections. The time may come when, perhaps, you will do me justice, and think more kindly of one whom you have deeply grieved, and whose hopes of happiness you have thrown so idly by."

"Mr. Leslie, you are no doubt exulting in your freedom and release from one so incapable of doing you justice.—Take this ring; it will serve, perhaps, in its glittering beauty, to bind you to another heart whose quivering strings will vibrate in agony equal to mine own, and whose love will find a tomb equal in depth and darkness to that which the cruelty of your friends, if not yourself, have consigned mine."

"I will not take it. I never wish to see it. It will serve to remind me of a time when joy, hope, and love were tomates of my breast; when no clouds darkened my sky, and when the future glowed with anticipated raptures to be shared by you. This is what it would bring from the dim past, and this would only make the present more hopelessly sad, for never again can my heart yield such love as it has lavished upon you."

"But you must receive it, for it has become despicable to my sight, and I will not retain it! Will you take it now?"

"No, no, Emma; ask me not this?"

"Then let it perish as has all else that gladdened my heart," and she crushed the sparkling gem to pieces beneath her tiny foot, in angry excitement and impotent rage.

And in thus doing Emma West severed the last link that bound Edward Leslie to her.

He turned away fully conscious that no union with one of so ungovernable a temper, and in whose nature there lurked so much undoloed revenge, could never have been happy herself or render others so. Yet he deeply felt her unkindness, and grieved that his idol had fallen from the height on which his imagination had placed it. He had loved Emma with a depth of feeling of which but few men are capable. But he was one to give and receive unbounded confidence; and now that he knew and felt Emma's happiness, as well as his own, could better be secured by this separation, he uttered no vain regret and felt no despair. He had other aims and other objects in life; to these he now resolutely turned every thought and all his energy.

And what were Emma's meditations when left alone with only the silent communings of her own heart? Upbraidings and self-accusations, bitter regrets and unavailing remorse, that she had parted in anger with one that she knew had given her the first and purest love of a bosom in which all good, noble, and elevated feeling had found a home.

"Ah!" she exclaimed—

"I have deemed his love so light a boon
That I have cast it idly by,
As winds may waft a flower at noon
And leave it low in dust to die."

REV. BENJAMIN M. DRAKE, D. D.

MR. EDITOR: I have been asked publicly as well as privately to furnish the friends of the late Dr. Drake with some of the particulars of his illness and death. Aware that no obituary is looked for, I will just say that a Discourse embodying our estimate of his character and some of the incidents of his life, has been prepared, and will in due time be published.

Dr. Drake's connection with the itinerant ministry began in 1820. He was transferred to the Mississippi Conference in 1821, and continued to be effective until the time of his death. During that entire term of ministerial service his labors had been confined to the Southern part of the Conference; seldom passing above the center of the State, and then upon mere flying visits. His first year after his admission into the Mississippi Conference was spent in South-western Louisiana. He was several times stationed in New Orleans, and from the time of his first appointment to that city in 1823 dates the permanent organization of the Methodist Church there.

Filling almost all the ministerial offices recognized by us, and eminently fitted to have filled them all, he had efficiently served the Church for more than forty years.

From 1828 to 1858 he had been a member of the General Conference, taking part in all its discussions, and a leading man in all the Church's great interests. He was for four years President of Elizabeth Female Academy, the first Methodist school in the State; and he was for a short time President of Centenary College. It is a matter of deep regret that the productions of his pen were not more abundant, nothing of his labor in this department remaining but his life of Steele, and occasional addresses and articles for our periodicals. He was a thorough Biblical scholar, and had received from Centenary College the degree of Doctor of Divinity. He was a courteous gentleman, a devout Christian, and the finest specimen of a Christian minister, in every position he was called to occupy, we ever saw. He was always cheerful, always dignified, always prayerful, always prudent, always kind.

For years past he had felt the pressure of age, and looked forward to the time when the abatement of his strength might be accommodated by the abatement of his labors. But necessity seemed to demand the continuance of the sacrifice, and he cheerfully made it. Although his health was evidently declining, at our last Conference he consented to become the Presiding Elder of the Fayette District, and entered at once upon his duties. Once during the winter he had an attack of pneumonia, and was compelled to abide at home. As soon, however, as he recovered he was at his post again, and stood firmly there until the Chief Shepherd called him away. He had been suffering for two years past with symptoms of disease of the heart. The paroxysms grew more frequent and painful, but as neither riding or preaching aggravated these symptoms, his pastoral duties were not interrupted. Still, those of us who watched him closely saw that his gait was altered, and that deep lines were drawn upon his solemn, noble face. In the intervals of suffering he appeared strong, and his friends said that he grew more mighty in word and doctrine" as he grew old.

He was in this city on Wednesday preceding his death, and besides attending to his business, he called to see several of his friends. During the day he suffered a violent paroxysm of pain from which he did not recover for some hours. I saw him on Thursday as he returned, and although he pronounced himself well, and expressed his purpose to start to his Quarterly Meeting at Rocky Springs (some 50 miles distant) the next morning, I saw that he looked haggard, and I remonstrated against his going. He said that he knew he should die suddenly, but that he hoped it would not take place soon—adding, I have made my preparations, and am ready, with or without warning. He was prevailed on to abandon his trip, and remained at home. During Friday he visited some of his neighbors and seemed well and cheerful. On Saturday he rode about his farm as usual. On Sunday morning he woke, seeming to be sad, and said, "This is a beautiful morning, and they will have a large congregation, but I shall not be there, and the preachers are young men." Again at 11 o'clock he made the same remark, but with increased sadness. As there was no service in the Methodist Church in his neighborhood he was prevailed upon to remain at home while his children should go to the Presbyterian Church. He saw them to the carriage, waved them a cheerful adieu, and then said to his wife, "now come to and let me read you a beautiful chapter from Deuteronomy." He then read the 33d chapter, with Clarke's commentary, dwelling with special interest upon the 12th verse. In the afternoon he read and repeated many beautiful hymns, and at twilight sat upon the gallery and sung, remarking that his mother used to love to sing on Sunday evenings. On Monday he rode into his farm, and appeared to be free from pain. After supper he sat and conversed with his family until 9 o'clock, when he complained of the return of pain. The paroxysm lasted for an hour, but was not so severe as usual. Prayers were had and he retired to his room. He talked freely with his wife, and said he thought it his duty to try to preserve his life, although he felt no fear of death. He then slept, but disturbedly, until 2 o'clock, when the pain returned and he sat up. He did not seem to apprehend his approaching end; nor was his suffering such as to alarm his family. He said to his wife that he felt no fear of death, for he knew he had served God sincerely for more than 40 years, and "now his promises they comfort me; yea, though he slay me yet will I trust in Him." After sitting awhile the pain subsided, and he returned to bed. His pillow was adjusted, and turning his face a little from the light, he closed his eyes as if to sleep. In a moment a sort of suffocating sound was heard; his wife sprang to his side, and the good man breathed but twice.

"The voice at midnight came;
He started up to hear;
A mortal arrow pierced his frame;
He fell,—but felt no fear."

Thus has passed away one of the holiest men the Church ever produced. A man to be admired and loved, remembered and imitated; a man who walked with God, and is not, for God has taken him.

He was buried on the 9th of May, the day after his death, in the family cemetery near his residence, amid exhibitions of the most profound sorrow. On Sunday a funeral discourse was preached at Union Chapel to a large concourse of friends. I may mention a fact connected with the service which, while it was a fair tribute to the worth of Dr. Drake, evinced the spirit of a liberal Christianity upon the part of others. Rev. Mr. Miller of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and Rev. Mr. Finney of the Presbyterian Church, had both voluntarily proffered to suspend the services in their respective churches on that day. Both of these brethren and their flocks were present.

LAUNER BLACKMAN.

MR. EDITOR: In the last 20 years I have seen in different Methodist periodicals the name of Launer Blackman some half a dozen times; the last, over the signature of your interesting correspondent, Rev. J. G. Jones.

My opportunities for knowing justify me in stating that there has never been in the West a Methodist preacher of any prominence, who bore the Christian name of Launer. The good man, the mighty preacher, and laborious presiding elder, Launer Blackman, was the man who left his mark in the West. I knew him well; have heard him preach; met him at my father's table frequently, and in his place of business; also have handled letters addressed to him. The memory of such a man is worth preserving. Do, Mr. Editor, help me to save his name at the same time.

COTTON AND MONEY.

The New York correspondent of the Picayune says: "From the tone of the Asia's letters it is not improbable but what we shall have advices next week of a reduction in the rate of interest by the Bank of England. Money in the open market was a drug, and parties holding it were very glad to loan, where the security was being up, on terms 1 to 3 below the bank minimum.

The effect of this case is plainly seen on the Liverpool cotton market, great activety prevailing, and prices on the rise.

The firm and healthful appearance of the cotton trade has very naturally imparted a cheerful feeling in this and all the Southern markets, for the near approach of the season's close, and the absolute scarcity of desirable cotton, renders it almost certain that present figures will be very generally sustained.

In addition to the increased consumption, scarcity of prime cottons, and cheap money, it must not be lost sight of that the markets abroad have also been vastly strengthened by the firm tone that has pervaded the markets on this side.

The present cotton season has been the most profitable of any that has preceded it, and it has rolled wealth of the South in a manner not to be mistaken. The manufacturers of England have also reaped largely the benefits of this great Southern production, for the trade of England in cotton fabrics was never so profitable as at the present writing.

All eyes are now directed to the next crop, and if it has been demonstrated this year that four and a half million bales can find a market at an average of 11c for Middling, where would prices go if misfortune befel the crop, and the product was cut down to three and a half millions.—On the other hand, with a continued increase in the manufacturing demands of the world, is it not likely that even with a crop of five millions bales, the whole would be readily taken at the average prices of the present season? The chances are certainly two to one in this favor.

FERNANDINA.—Fernandina is a new seaport on the Atlantic coast of Florida, and is the eastern terminus of a railroad which passes quite across the State to Cedar Keys on the Gulf. It is thought that a great many goods will be carried by this route on their way to or from the Gulf ports, in order to avoid the perils of navigation near the Florida Keys. Fernandina is by no means a new seaport. During our last war with England, 1812 to 1815, while Fernandina was a Spanish neutral port, large quantities of cotton were sent there from Georgia, bought by northern and European merchants, and shipped to Europe at fabulous prices. Its fine harbor is said to have contained at one time, "during those days," 300 sail of square-rigged vessels. In 1816 peace was re-toned, and commerce flew to its former houses, leaving Fernandina in peace and quiet. In 1819 Florida was ceded to the United States by Spain, by the treaty made by John Quincy Adams and Don Onis. Fernandina, like Rip Van Winkle, is now waking up from a long sleep.

Moderate desires constitute a character fitted to acquire all the good which the world can yield. He is prepared in whatever situation he is, therewith to be content; has learned the science of being happy; and possesses the alchemic stone which will change every metal into gold.—Dwight.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

OWEN CONERLY died in Pike county, Miss., June 2nd, 1860, of pleura-pneumonia, aged forty-two years. Born of pious parents, he was early taught the precepts of true religion. Honest and upright, he was just in his dealings with his fellowmen. A true friend, a kind husband and an affectionate father, tranquility was a leading trait in his character, and though not an active member in the Church, for he always deemed himself unworthy, yet he confirmed what he was able to her prosperity. A short time before he died he clasped his hands together and said, "The way is narrow, but clear and beautiful." He called his wife to his bedside and requested her to remain with him. He bade each of his family farewell; taking them by the hand, he told them to be good children, and "meet him at the final resurrection. An aged mother, a disconsolate widow, a large family, together with several brothers and sisters, and a large circle of friends, are left to mourn his untimely loss.

Brother JOHN S. THOMPSON died near Spring Hill, Marengo county, Ala., May 7, 1860. He had been a faithful member and active and useful steward in the M. E. Church for many years. He was about 55 years of age, and had been a member of the Church from his youth. He leaves a wife and six children to mourn their loss. He sent for me a few days before his death, and made all the arrangements for his funeral and talked as calmly as though he was making arrangements for a short journey. He said all was well—he had no fears as to his future happiness; he only regretted to leave his family, to whom he was greatly devoted. When he could speak no more, he was asked if all was well; he nodded his head, and sweetly fell asleep in Jesus.

T. S. NEBNAUER, SEN.

MISS ALMEDA GRIFFIN died in great peace at Bedgouth, Franklin parish, La., June 4, 1860, at the residence of her father, Wesley T. Griffin, in the fifteenth year of her age. She was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South; was devotedly pious, and when death came, which was not unawares, she was fully ready. Though she suffered long and intensely, she did not murmur, but waited in patience until death came, and without a struggle or a groan, her soul entered into that rest which God has prepared for the righteous.

PROGRESS OF PROTESTANTISM IN MISSISSIPPI AND THE SOUTH-WEST.—No. XXII.

MR. EDITOR—In 1814 John Shrock was on Rapide circuit, in Louisiana, where he was indefatigable in his labors, and did a good deal of his characteristic preaching, which was often more a ministry of reproof than of consolation. The state of society at that time in the Red River Valley and adjacent country was rude and vicious, and very few reliable church members were to be found anywhere. The preachers were not only subjected to the most trying hardships in the way of long rides, ferryless and bridgeless streams, bottomless mud, and bad accommodations generally, but they were constantly exposed to the insults of rude and wicked men. It was somewhere in that region that Drury Powel was beset by a company of fewl fellows, who gave evidence of an intention to mob him, but who quailed and skulked away when Powell presented a bold front, and said to them, "if they were indeed a set of ruffians, and would give him a ruffian's chance by attacking him one at a time, he would whip the whole of them." It was, I think, at St. Martinsville that a company of the "baser sort" took Richmond Nolley, the most unresisting of men, while he was preaching, and were going to duck him in the bayou, when a stout negress suddenly attacked them with her hoe and rescued the preacher.

John Shrock was duly apprised of this phase of Louisiana society, and so far from conciliating this class of men by passing their sins unreproved, he seemed rather to court a conflict with them by denouncing their vices in all their degrading effects, and referring them to their final doom. The year did not close before he had his courage tested at Alexandria. He was preaching there in the Court house one Sabbath, when a company of outsiders came about the windows, and with various gesticulations and grimaces, tried to disturb him in his discourse. He looked them full in the face and told them "if they did not repent of their evil ways they would catch something hotter than boiling soap one of these days." As the allusion to the boiling soap was the gist of the offence, it needs some explanation.

There lived in a small house in the suburbs of Alexandria a woman with two grown daughters, of very doubtful reputation; one, night a company of mischievous fellows beset the house in order to tease the inmates for the sake of a little fun. The woman was boiling soap, and there being a convenient hole in the back of the chimney through which the assailants occasionally peeped to annoy the infuriated inmates, she threatened to throw a good pail of soap into the face of the next one that did it. Soon after one who had not heard the threat came along, and hearing the confused and boisterous jawing of those within against those without, he thrust his face to the hole for a peep, when he was met, greatly to his discomfort, by a gould of boiling soap. The allusion of Shrock to this in a congregation where the affair had been laughed over for some time, so enraged these disturbers of public worship, that they banded themselves into a company of about twenty, and swore lustily that they would duck Shrock in Red River if he ever attempted to preach there again. Before his next appointment some of his friends tried to dissuade him from attempting to fill it, but all to no purpose; he enjoyed the excitement of opposition too well to back out. Seeing he was determined to face his adversaries, his friends secretly joined themselves into a company about equal to the opposition, and agreed to protect him if he should be assailed. When the time came he rode boldly up, and having hitched his horse, he detached the lash from a loaded horse-whip, took off his coat and laid it across his arm, and with the handle of the whip reversed, walked towards the Court-house. As he passed through the astonished crowd near the door, he politely invited the "gentlemen to come in, as the hour for service had come," and the invitation was promptly complied with. Walking up to the judge's desk, he laid his coat across one side, being careful to put his loaded whip near at hand, and after repeating and singing a few verses, knelt and prayed with his eyes open, thinking it safest, in that occasion to watch as well as pray, as he anticipated an attack every moment. The preliminary exercises, such as they were, being over, he told the congregation "that he had been duly informed of the threats made against him, and he was fully prepared to meet any attempt to execute them, pulled up his sleeve and showed them his arm, saying he was brought up a blacksmith and knew the strength of that arm; unbuttoned his collar and exhibited his short, thick Dutch neck, saying, "a large neck indicated a spinal column of corresponding strength, and then asked the congregation if they thought the Almighty had given him such unusual powers to let a set of ruffians run over him in a free country, for doing his duty? He had been told that they had threatened the life of Drury Powell somewhere the realoints, and that he had left the country before his time was out, on account of it. It might be so, but he was not one of the running sort, and could not be got away on such terms. He understood that they were going to duck the preacher in Red River that day, as some of their ilk had attempted to serve poor, unoffending Nolley, at St. Martinsville; but he would advise them to let the preacher alone lest something might get hurt. Finally he intended that day to think as he pleased; to speak as he thought, and to quit when he was done." He then announced his text, and preached, Brekon, a good deal more like Peter than Barnabas. The religious exercises being ended, he gave out his appointment, and added, "he understood the court-house would probably be denied him thereafter—if so, that large cottonwood tree on the commons, near the bank of the river, would answer his purpose, and he would preach there." Taking up his saddle-bags and coat, and clubbing the handle of his loaded whip, he passed out, not without hearing several saying to their fellows, "that's the man for me! I like a man that has nerve enough to take care of himself. I stand up for Shrock from this day!" When he was near his horse he heard his name called, and, turning round, saw a man approaching him with a quick step. "Do you come as a friend or foe?" inquired Shrock, squaring himself about with a bold front, and tossing up the loaded end of his whip-handle. "I am your friend, Mr. Shrock," replied the man. "Then advance," said the preacher. The gentleman continued, "I come to invite you to dine with me to-day, and hereafter to make my home your home in Alexandria. You are the very man we need here to manage these cowardly disturbers of our worship, and we'll stand by you." Thus ended "the irrepressible conflict" in Alexandria, in 1814.

Various versions of Shrock's belligerent propensities, as manifested on this occasion had been circulated through the Conference, so that when he appeared at the first Conference, attended by a Bishop, to be ordained Elder, to which office he had been previously elected, he was called upon for a true version of the affair, which he gave with an air of self-complacency, but to say boasting. When he finished, Bishop Roberts looked at him as he only could look at an erring brother, and said, "put up thy sword Peter!" Under this mild but deserved reproof, brother Shrock said he dwindled away to a point in his own estimation, and felt that "an auger hole" was large enough to contain what was left of his self-esteem. These items I repeatedly got from his own lips, for I had a long and intimate acquaintance with him, especially during the last years of his residence in Mississippi.

John Shrock was an extensive reader, for his opportunities; an orthodox Methodist; was well posted in our doctrines, discipline and history; was a safe counsellor for young ministers, and was himself an interesting and, at times, a powerful preacher. But there were sharp points in his character, which often fretted and even exasperated some, both in and out of the Church, with whom he was associated. This was a misfortune, not to say a fault, for it seemed to lessen his chances for usefulness. His health he thought was failing, and, after having travelled only four or five years, he married and located. His after life was just such as I have often witnessed in men, who in their holier and happier days had consecrated their lives and their all to the work of the ministry, and then, in an evil hour, took back by far the greater part of the offering by "asking for and obtaining a location." And though so many have been caught in this net, yet is not the net broken!

After his location he lived awhile, I think, in Catahoula Parish, then in Franklin county, and from about 1827 to 1840 in Madison county, Mississippi. For the first fifteen years of his local life, though himself and family lived cheap and worked hard (his wife often helping in out-door work), he was perpetually annoyed with debts he could not pay. Often did he sigh to be free, that he might once more re-enter the itineracy and be a happy man. He indulged the thought that if he was only out of debt, and could see his family on safe ground, where, with ordinary industry and economy, they could live above want, he would unhesitatingly seek a re-union with the regular pastors of the Church. But how untrustworthy are such thoughts, often indulged in, no doubt, to quiet the present upbraidings of a conscience yet alive to its duties and responsibilities! Brother Shrock thought he would, but when the opportunity offered he did not. It was about 1833 that, added to his own exertions, he obtained loans and donations enough from William Foster, senior, of Pine Ridge, to free him from debt, and leave him with a snug little farm, well stocked, and worked by several efficient hands. Then was the time he ought to have resumed the regular pastoral work. But the price of cotton was up; Bank facilities were abundant; friends were willing to endorse for him; land and negroes not very high yet, but evidently advancing; why should he not take advantage of these "flush times" to make an independent fortune in a few years, so as to place his family above contingencies, and have something to fall back on in old age? The matter looked plausible, it could hardly be wrong under the circumstances; the decision was made and he went into it soul and body. Negroes were bought on long credit, lands were bought and sold as prices appreciated, and all was hurry and bustle a few years. Then the price of cotton went down, the Mississippi Banks broke as by general consent, merchants failed, and the masses everywhere seemed verging to bankruptcy.

Brother Shrock soon found himself oppressed with enormous debts; creditors enforcing their claims by law; securities begging to be released, and refusing further endorsement. His health perceptibly gave way under the onerous burden, his mind was perplexed and careworn, and hopeless insolvency, like a horrid goblin, perpetually danced before his imagination. It was late in the fall of 1839 that I spent a night with him at the house of our mutual friend and brother James Adams, near Canton. I found brother Shrock suffering from disease, and so oppressed in mind as to awaken deep concern among his friends. "Brother Shrock said I, "you now have an opportunity to illustrate by your example the sustaining and comforting power, of that gospel you have so long preached to others. Commit your case in earnest, believing prayer to God, depending on Him to sustain and comfort you in your afflictions, and in His own good time to bring you out of your distresses." "Brother Jones," said he in reply, "I have no heart to ask the Lord to help me out of these troubles, for he did not help me into them. I was embarrassed with debt a long time, until God in His good providence brought me out, and I ought to have staid out, and returned to the work to which I had acknowledged myself called of God. But like a fool and madman as I was, I determined to accumulate property, and rushed headlong into worldly plans for its acquisition, and now I am ruined for the balance of my life. I know it is not the will of God that I should commit sin, and the best I can do is to pray to be mercifully preserved from falling into sin."

Thus ended my last interview on earth with my old friend and brother, John Shrock. It was a lesson to me, having acknowledged myself called of God to the regular pastoral work, I felt more than ever determined never to leave it in order to engage in secular pursuits, except in cases of unavoidable necessity.

Soon after this brother Shrock removed with the remains of his shattered fortune to the Republic of Texas. It was said his exit from Mississippi would not have been creditable to a minister, had not the spirit and practice of a bankrupt country cast the veil of charity over its flight. He died soon after in Texas, where or how I have never learned. He had a large family, and must have numerous descendants in Texas, and I bespeak for them the Christian attention and prayers of the Church.

With all his misfortunes and faults I was attached to plain, blunt, unsophisticated John Shrock. May his children and descendants all become consistent Christians, is the earnest prayer of my heart.

LETTER FROM SUMMERFIELD.

THE Commencement exercises of "Centenary Institute," at Summerfield, Alabama, were inaugurated on Sunday, June 24th, by a sermon from Dr. Lovick Pierce, and closed on Wednesday night succeeding, by a grand concert under the direction of Professor Giefler, and were of an unusually interesting character. Dr. Pierce preached a sermon on the duty of every one to ignore self-legislation, and adopt the council and submit to the government of God. His effort would have done credit to him in the prime of life, and elicited the commendations of every one present. Time has dealt gently with this worthy minister, and at the age of four-score he preserves all the freshness of heart and mind, which so eminently characterized his earlier years.

No man of the church has directly or, remotely done more for Methodism in the South, and Christianity in the world than Dr. Pierce. He has given several sons to the ministry, and consecrated his long and useful life to the pulpit and the press. He will go down to the grave with an untarnished escutcheon, and rise on the last day with a crown of wondrous brilliancy. Dr. C. W. Taylor on Sabbath evening, lectured on woman in China and America in connection with his special interest the Sabbath-school cause. By his genial manners he won a long catalogue of friends, who will cherish a pleasing recollection of his visit to our Methodist Athens. Rev. J. Baldwin preached at night on the impossibility of merely worldly pleasures satisfying the soul's hunger for satisfaction.

On Sabbath morning a most profitable class-meeting was held in the church. There was the venerable Ebenezer Hearn, the pioneer of Alabama Methodism. He told us that long years ago, when the spot now made illustrious for head and heart culture was an almost uncultivated wild, he came to it to preach to the scattered inhabitants, the "unsearchable riches of Christ." He was the first minister that ever preached and organized a church in this community. It did his heart good to see the fruitage of the tree, the seed of which he had long ago planted. The Lord hath made "the wilderness like Eden." Here, now, he found "joy and gladness: thanksgiving and the voice of melody"—Brother Hearn is a good and grand old man, and the green turf will lie lightly upon his grave, and the flower and the evergreen will be planted above it by his sons and daughters in the Church, as emblems of hope and immortality.—He was followed by another member of the Old Guard Rev. A. J. Crawford. He stated with tremulous emotion that while a young man, he was riding by an enclosure, and heard within the voice of penitence, prayer, and praise. He stopped and surveyed the scene. It was brother Hearn holding a prayer and class-meeting. Conviction seized hold of his heart, and soon after he found peace in believing. Brother Crawford is an old soldier of the war of 1812-14, a relative of General Jackson, whom he resembles in several points, a pioneer preacher, and a most excellent superannuated preacher of the Alabama Conference. Brother Marrah, another of the veterans was present as pastor of the church, making melody with his sweet-toned voice. Seldom does one witness such a scene, and hear such speeches as was our privilege on this heart-blessing occasion. On Monday and Monday night the young men of the male department entertained us with well written and declaimed speeches. Brother Connelly is almost without a rival as a teacher of young men. The Rev. J. W. Harmon, delivered the annual address before the "O. K. A," and "Franklin" literary societies. His address was a most popular one and well calculated to improve the young men to whom he addressed himself. It abounded in wholesome advice, excellent sparkles of wit, and frequent climaxes of eloquence. At its close the Rev. Mr. Connelly in behalf of the young gentlemen, presented the orator with a heavy and handsome gold headed cane. When he comes to die, may he have Christ as his rod and staff upon which to lean. Tuesday was the joint anniversary of the two (Castalian and "L. M. J.") literary societies of the Female College. The young ladies read distinctly a number of beautifully composed essays, after which Rev. P. P. Neely, D.D., addressed them upon the subject of "music." It was wonderful to witness the amount of erudition which he had elicited upon his theme. It was in passages overwhelmingly eloquent, calling down the most thunderous applause from his appreciative auditory. Upon the point of the universality of music's language he spoke of the national airs of the world, of the songs of the Spanish muleteer, the warning Savoyard, the pibroch and ballads of the highlands of Scotland, the weird-like strains from the wild reeds of the savage Calabrian, the French Marseillaise, the English "God save the Queen," and America's, Hail Columbia. I will quote, as best I can, his patriotic remarks just here. We feel the germs of a thousand victories, stirring our souls, as we hear, on the day of our national jubilee, the strains of go pealing over this broad continent; and gathering inspiration from the memories of the past; we take our sons by the hand, and directing their gaze toward our national ensign, as it floats in holiday triumph over the village green, we teach them to sing in all the fullness of their fresh young patriotism,

"The star spangled banner,
Oh long may it wave,
O'er the land of the free,
And the home of the brave."

Here the whole school arose and sung with startling effect, accompanied by several pianos and drums, the chorus he had just repeated. We never witnessed such enthusiasm. For several minutes it was as unsubduable as the war of Niagara's thunder. When it had subsided somewhat the orators rich trumpet-toned voice rose high over the din of applause, exclaiming:

"Oh America! thou art ever immortal, while virgin lips and virgin hearts, like these, invoke thy perpetuity, God grant, that when the day of doom shall hang its pall upon the earth and sky; and when the angel of destiny shall look out from his throne sublime, God grant, that then, he may behold that glorious ensign of freedom, still floating

"O'er the land of the free,

Another rapturous round of applause here greeted the speaker. But your space will not allow a more extended notice of this peerless prose poem of music. The Dr. won a green laurel, and he is worthy to wear it.—On Tuesday afternoon, valedictories were read by representative members of each of the societies. Rev. E. Hearn and the "Governor's Guards" of Selma, presented a set of books to the societies which were received in a brief speech on their behalf, by the Rev. H. A. M. Henderson. At night we had a concert, and a most fascinating dialogue and tableaux, entitled "Universal Nature." Miss Austill of Mobile, was the beautious Queen of Universal Nature, and superbly, aye, regally did she perform her part. On Wednesday morning, the graduating exercises come off. Compositions were read by thirty young ladies of the graduating class. Miss Nanny Bryson read the valedictory—which was excellent. The President, in a few heart-moving words, presented the diplomas. Rev. Dr. Sassoett, delivered the regular commencement address, on "Home and its appropriate influences." The fame of the orator must be the surety of his success on this occasion. On Wednesday night, the grand concert was given. Professor Giefler's baton was wreathed with musical glory. The concert was equal to any we ever attended. We know of no music teacher who has more taste and perseverance than Professor G.

At the close of the inimitable concert, B. J. Harrison, Esq., made a speech for the Board of Trustees. He stated the institution was enjoying the grandest success of its history and that the principals of the two departments, would be continued. This was received with violent applause. Mr. Montgomery is so widely esteemed by the patrons of this institute, that he has gained sobriquet of "Old Popularity." Richmond will be in the field, during the coming vacation and doubtless, the halls of Centenary will be thronged with three hundred young ladies next year. We of Alabama are proud of Centenary—of its faculty alumni, trustees, and patrons, all its varied glory. May a score of centennial crowns yet be hung upon its noble and massive brow!

B. A. M. HENDERSON.

Summerfield, June 27th, 1860.

WHITWORTH COLLEGE.

It has been our good fortune to attend the first Examination of this promising Institute for the education of young ladies. And as the exercises were creditable alike to Teachers and Pupils, we take pleasure in its publication.

We were somewhat disappointed by the non-arrival of the Rev. C. C. Gillespie, (as expectation was on the tip toe to hear the Commencement sermon.) But candor compels us to say, your appointment was well and ably represented in the person of our President Rev. G. P. Lee. He seemed familiar with the subject and acquitted himself with honor, and to the entire satisfaction of all concerned: subject—Prov. 23 and 23. "Buy the truth and sell it not, also wisdom and instruction and understanding." We have no disposition to demonstrate the discourse, as our business is now with the school, suffice it to say it was terse, eloquent and beautiful, showing wisdom and instruction, above price.

On Monday morning, June 18th, at eight o'clock, the examination of the elementary branches began; English grammar, reading, and spelling. The plan is a large platform elevated some three feet above the audience; the various departments in turn, beginning at the lowest, pass the ordeal in the presence of the President, Teachers, Board Trustees, Visiting Committee, and spectators. We occupied the Methodist Church,—capable of accommodating from three to five hundred—which was for the most part well filled. Its walls were handsomely decorated with the handiwork of the girls,—exquisitely wrought needle work, paintings in the various styles taught, Grecian and Oriental; all exhibiting the varied tastes and selections of the scholars.

Piano and Guitar occupied prominent position from which we enjoyed such music as could charm Calypso and her nymphs.

The neat and tasteful dress, pleasant and smiling faces of the pupils, and their easy and courteous department, together with their evident desire to secure the approbation of their parents and friends, at once prepossessed the minds of spectators in their favor, as all must have been pleased with the evidence they afterwards afforded of substantial progress and improvement. The system of teaching the Grammar, by analysis and composition of sentences, as well as analysis and parsing of words, we consider a great improvement over the old method, as also the acquisition of a knowledge of Geography. This study we consider only a thing of memory, and consequently the mere outlines are impressed on the young minds, and leave after years to fill up the deficiency, as may be required. We have here no system of hum-drumming, reviewing, and re-reviewing, descending to all the minutiæ of countries and cities, rivers and lakes, staple productions, commerce and trade of each small locality of earth and the world. Here also we mark an innovation, and I am glad to know the world of letters and sciences, is not bound down to one ideaism. Monomaniac proclivities are not characteristic of this school, nor prevalent in the age and era we enjoy. The class in Rhetoric and Philosophy particularly pleased me, as the examination in these (as all the other studies) was thorough and impartial. These advanced classes showed a proficiency and acquaintance never equalled in my observation, they had been but one session of five months, to master these. Too high an estimation of the labor and indefatigable zeal of the teachers cannot here be awarded. Thoroughness of instruction is a marked feature, not so much the extent of range. Some pretty original compositions by the little girls closed the exercises of the first day. The second day was devoted to Mathematics, and reading composition by advanced girls.

President Lee is laboring to demonstrate that the female mind is as able to comprehend this difficult science as the male. This is a mooted question, we only hope he may prove it by succeeding sessions—notwithstanding in this the girls did well. The reading of composition interspersed with instrumental music constituted the entertainment of the first night—with most we were well pleased. The thoughts and conceptions were such as might be attributed to more mature minds, yet in all existed an innocent originality, showing the varied talent of the fair authoresses.

The reading was distinct and natural, and perhaps for those that were making their debut before a large public audience (considering the timidity and modest demeanor of inexperient school girls) most remarkable. This is all we can possibly expect of beginners to acquit themselves as adepts. The strictures I have seen in one of your city newspapers, can but ill apply to our school, (we copy as a caution) "and this leads to another evil prevalent to some extent, in all or most of our institutions for female education; with some young ladies, the habit of deception has in these seminaries become almost inveterate. And they are taught this habit by the professors themselves, they are permitted to read compositions in public as their own production, which they know were written by another hand, it may be one of their own instructors. Is it strange that before they are graduated they are adepts in deceiving the teachers themselves? Another instance is this, a class is examined before a large and admiring audience, and not a word missed. The audience think the class are well acquainted with the part on which they are examined. But the young ladies know they have been a fortnight or three weeks preparing that very lesson for the examination. Here is gross deception, to which the teachers are principals and pupils accessories. From such morality may we ever pray, that our daughters may be delivered. Much also might be said about the ostentation and extravagance that are cultivated, instead of economy and unassuming demeanor which are more becoming, and which most parents desire their children to learn." There has been too much of truth and sound reasoning in the above, as I am persuaded all well informed persons, would prefer an hours exhibition of each individual talent and progress. But we have anticipated, nor have we discovered any such double dealing in the working of Whitworth College. Indeed its principal has explained to us publicly the awards of merit were conferred without regard to distinguishable genius or grades of intellect; those only preferred for proficiency in application. The government of this institution is prompt without austerity, positive but mild and no better proof of this can be adduced than the universal love and respect of its scholars to their teachers. On Tuesday night was given a concert; all the music scholars contributing to the entertainment. Miss Molly Noble graduated, reading her valedictory and touching "Forget me not" to throbbing hearts and sorrowing schoolmates. She is the first fruits of this young institution and well may they be proud of such an alumni. She is in society attended with the prayers and endearments of all who know her. I have been more particular in my report and have trespassed on your space, but the cause will justify me, because this is a happy and promising era of the college and the country it represents. All is yet in embryo, but its advantages for health, religious society, and good and true hands at the helm, offer superior inducements to parents to send their daughters. Wednesday was set apart for laying the Corner-stone, depositing the charter and other treasured dates of the college, in which ceremonies, the Masonic Fraternity from this and adjoining counties participated, after which we adjourned to the church to hear an address by the Rev. H. F. Johnson; this closed the exercises and the festivities of our prosperous town, Brookhaven.

LETTER FROM NEW ENGLAND.

Amherst College, Mass.

THE scientific halls of this institution are situated in one of the most beautiful and picturesque sites of New England. Embosomed among its green hills and majestic mountains, with which they are surrounded upon all sides, where the intense beauty and sublimity of its landscape is seen in all its loveliness.

Upon one side the dark and rugged green of Mount Hollyoke, Mount Tom, and the Moundnock, with their lofty peaks, deep gorges, bold ridges and projecting rocks. Upon another, the white and green mountains, range after range, extending around the western horizon forming in the distance, a beautiful prospective with that soft and exquisite coloring upon which the eye rests with peculiar pleasure. The intervening valley of the Connecticut with occasional glimpse of the river in its windings. Little villages nestled among its woodlands. Northampton, with its rising spires and elegant country seats embowered among lofty shades. Meadows blooming, the tall grass waving in the breeze, little farm houses dotting the surface among fields of corn and grain, form a picture of unrivalled beauty, unsurpassed in any country of the world; with that variety calculated to inspire a poetic imagination with the love of the Muses, or the fine arts, for

"Who can paint
Like nature; can imagination boast,
Amid its gay creations, hues like hers?
Or mix them with that matchless skill,
And lose them in each other, as appears,
In every bud that blooms?"

The prospect when viewed from the observatory of this institution is perfectly charming; reminding us of that seen from Acropolis at Athens in Greece, where the Bay of Talmais is seen beyond the mountains of Pentilicus and Parnassus. The College buildings are situated upon a terraced slope, arranged with artistic taste, and adorned with our rich forest trees of dense and magnificent foliage, which appears to great advantage.

Little fountains, grape plots, small flower gardens laid out in European style, gravel walks winding around its green slopes, give an air of elegance and refinement of taste, calculated to impress the mind of the student in his clerical pursuits, with that love of the beautiful in its most attentive forms, for such "Scenes must be beautiful which daily viewed,

Please daily, and whose novelty survives,
Long knowledge and the scrutiny of years."

Nature has a language of its own, it speaks to the soul in notes of melody.

"There's music in the sighing of a reed;
There's music in the gushing of a rill;
There's music in all things if men had ears;
Their earth is but the echo of the spheres."

The Octagonal building with its beautiful tower, dome, and wings of its different apartments, has a most picturesque appearance. Wood's geological Cabinet in this edifice, contains "20,000 specimens of rocks and fossils, both Americans and foreign. Six thousand of minerals of the rarest kind, all labelled: with the largest meteoritics in the world, except that of the Imperial Cabinet in Vienna." We saw one imported from Africa of an astonishing size, of solid iron, which cost one thousand dollars. Other specimens from our own country of smaller dimensions, but equally solid. A concrete or a singular petrifaction, in shape of some fruit, resembling marble. The variety were well arranged for study, and most interesting to an observer of the wonders of nature.

The Nineveh Gallery.

One wing attached to the building, was expressly designed for the exhibition of the remains of that ancient city. "Its walls are lined with six sculptured slates which once adorned the Palace of Sandsnapalus, at Nimroul. Above them are twenty-five Fresco paintings of other figures found in the same ruins, the originals of which are seen in the sculpture gallery of the Louvre at Paris in France; also a brick from the walls of the same palace. In the horizontal cases are cylinders, gems and coins from the ancient city." These were all obtained by Dr. H. Lobdell, a young man of enterprising genius, who fell a victim to the climate—deeply lamented. His virtues, learning, and antiquarian researches, gave promise to this young man, of a future reputation of no ordinary character to adorn our country, when he was cut down in the midst of his successful effort, in the bloom of manhood. The Cabinet takes his name in memory of his noble enterprise, which enriches this institution with relics of such immense value, and Biblical knowledge.

The Appleton Cabinet.

This building is 110 feet long, and 45 broad, with a convenient lecture-room attached. The lower story contains the Tchnological specimens of the "Olyzoum Moodie;" the Bird tracks in stone, which occupy the whole length of this hall, are nine thousand in number. They were perfectly impressed upon the sand before the formation of the rock in which they were embedded, as distinctly visible, as if sculptured in marble, showing the shape of the foot, and length of the step in its trail; giving evidence of a bird of a mammoth size, which must have existed at the period of that huge animal, the Mastedon. The Condor of South America, and the Ostrich of Africa, appear like small birds when compared to these. They were peculiar to this Continent, as no specimens of the kind are seen elsewhere. One slab has been sent to the British Museum, in London. They were found along the Connecticut valley. In the contemplation of these curious remains, the Naturalist has a wide field for investigation and research.

The Adams' Zoological Cabinet, in a hall above, contains 2,500 specimens of 700 species of vertebrated animals; 8,000 species of shells; 5,000 species of articulated animals, and 200 species of radiated ones; and an Herbarium of four thousand species of dried plants; a private collection of 800 species of Liebens.

The Williston Hall

Is a beautiful edifice, with an elegant tower. Its different apartments are appropriated for a Chemical Laboratory, Libraries, Literary Societies, and halls for meetings of the Alumni of the College. A building for a Gymnasium is now in operation, in front of a beautiful grove, well calculated for physical exercises and amusements, essential for health and happiness of the students.

This Institution is in its infancy. Established in opposition to the Unitarian school of Harvard University, and upon strict Trinitarian principles, it is flourishing and in successful operation.

The celebrated Dr. Northrop, now in Europe, who has been supplying the pulpit of Spurgeon, and Exeter-Hall, was educated in this Institution.

CABINET AND MUSEUM OF CENTENARY COLLEGE.

MR. EDITOR. It is with pleasure that we acknowledge our obligations to some of our friends for the valuable contributions which they have made to the mineralogical cabinet and museum of centenary college. We earnestly hope that these contributions may continue to be made. Specimens of art and of the productions of nature are of great value to the student. They create an interest which words, whether written or spoken, cannot; they make instruction, that otherwise seems speculative, a reality.

We are indebted to the Rev. John G. Jones for a number of Indian curiosities. These consist in stones formed for various uses in their rude manner of life, too numerous to mention individually. There are also some specimens of carved work that show great ingenuity. We are also indebted to Rev. Dr. Keener for a box of valuable minerals, containing rare specimens of the ores of different metals; we feel specially anxious to obtain as many of these as possible; no branch of science is so likely to confer benefit on man, and open up to his mind the wonderful creation and disposition of these ores by the great Architect of nature. The Rev. Mr. Godfrey brought to us a tooth of that mammoth animal, which in a geological sense, has but recently become extinct, measuring about eight inches in width, four in thickness and ten in length, including the crown and root. Mr. C. Goodman, formerly a student of this place, sent to us another of about the same dimensions, but the root decayed, also one of smaller size.

But the most recent and perhaps in some respects, the most valuable contribution that has been made, is a lot of curiosities sent by the Rev. Mr. Lambuth from China. These consist in fruits, reptiles, paintings, carvings, books, maps, shoes, and a variety of others, which we cannot mention individually, some of these showing their skill, others their rudeness, and others, the valuable productions of their soil and climate.

We again acknowledge our obligation to these gentlemen for what they have done, and trust that all who feel interested in the advancement of the college, will follow their example as far as may be in their power.

A. R. HOLCOMB.

THE GREAT BAPTIST SUIT IN ENGLAND.

THE following account from the London Times, of the great lawsuit between the "General" and "Particular" Baptists in England, will be read with interest. The Times favors the decision; we doubt its correctness, however much we may sympathize with liberality. The Times says: The master of the Rolls has just pronounced judgment in a case which, for more than one reason, merits public notice. The immediate interest of the story to be related is purely local, and its bearings, indeed, in any sense, are somewhat limited; but the narrative is immediately characteristic of our country and our times, and admits of easy and popular statement. We must begin, however, by a little historical preamble.

Among the religious sects of this country the Baptists hold no inconsiderable place. They are strong in numbers, decided in tenets, and renowned not only for fervency of zeal, but for controversial ability and theological learning. They are not, however, absolutely at unity with each other. As many as five varieties at least of the Baptist faith might be enumerated, each professed by its respective congregations; but to two only of these it is requisite to call attention now—viz: the General Baptists and the Particular Baptists. These titles would be likely at first sight to mislead the reader, for they appear to imply that a particular, and probably smaller, sect had seceded from the general body and established itself alone, whereas the truth is very different. The denominations of "General" and "Particular," as applied to communities of Baptists, do not denote any diversity whatever on the fundamental points of their creed. All Baptists alike, however designated, hold that the rite of baptism should be administered not to infants but to adults after direct profession of belief, and that the mode of administration should be by immersion, and not by sprinkling. The distinction of title between the two communities of which we are speaking is based on differences entirely independent of their peculiar creed, and which are found, in fact, in all Christian congregations, including the Church of Rome itself. The General Baptists are merely Baptists who believe in the design of salvation for mankind in general, without the preordination or election of any certain number, while the Particular Baptists believe that a particular number has been predestined to salvation from all eternity. The former, in short, are Arminians, the latter Calvinists; and the Calvinists are by far the more numerous body of the two. The congregations of the General Baptists are to believe, under 300 in number, while those of the Particular Baptists are nearly 2000. These we must now follow to one of their own churches, where a question arose of such importance as to be carried into a court of law.

The ancient city of Norwich is celebrated above all other cities of this realm for the multitude and variety of its ecclesiastical establishments. Under the very shadow of its cathedral, and in the midst of its 40 parishes, are clustered the chapels and meeting-houses of almost all denominations of Christians. Whether it is that the old Puritanism of the eastern counties still lives there, or whether the vicinity of Holland—so long the asylum of religious dissent—affected the character of the district, we cannot say, but since the time when spiritual freedom was first known it has been conspicuously illustrated at Norwich. Of course, in such a place we should look for establishments of Particular Baptists, but these congregations have more than an ordinary footing there. They have endowments or possessions of more than a century's standing for the benefit of their faith. Within a few weeks after the Scotish Lords were beheaded on Tower-hill a chapel was endowed at Norwich for the use and benefit of the Particular Baptists, to which purposes, though with a certain notable variety of usage, it has ever since been applied. To understand this variety, on which the whole case turns, the reader must recall what we observed respecting the distinctive tenet of Baptists. A Baptist strictly speaking, is one who, after open profession of faith, has been baptized by immersion; but, as this is only an overt act, it is obvious that the doctrines and customs of the Baptists might be embraced and exemplified by persons who had never submitted to that ceremony. It is also clear from the evidence before us, that this ceremony, however fundamental might be the tenet it expressed, was not always or by all Baptists regarded as indispensable to communion. Provided that persons accepted the doctrines and faith of the Baptists, went with them in their ways of worship, and evinced their sincerity in their daily lives and conversation, they might be admitted to Baptist congregations, even though baptism by immersion had never been performed. This latitude of action, however, was not universally recognized, and one of the churches in which it was not recognized, was this endowed at Norwich. There the system of "strict communion," as it was termed, had been adopted from the first institution of the establishment, and was regularly maintained until, a short time ago, the practice of "free," or "mixed communion," was allowed to creep in. This was what provoked the suit. Scandalized at such latitudinarian proceedings, certain members of the Norwich Church appealed to a court of justice, and asked that the powers of the law might be exerted to prevent any other Baptists than Baptists by immersion from receiving the benefits of the establishment. The infringement upon the old system had not been very outrageous. The consciences of those who held to "strict communion" had been duly considered by a separation of communicants into two classes; but this did not meet their views of duty, and they desired that, even when their own observances and conveniences had been consulted, purity of practice should be upheld still by the suppression of "free communion" in the chapel.

We shall not follow the course of the suit through the elaborate arguments of the counsel engaged. It will be enough if we state that, according to the judgment pronounced, the more liberal of the Norwich Baptists have the law on their side. The master of the Rolls, after all his research, and with all his acuteness, could not discover that actual baptism by immersion had been ever determined by Baptist authorities to be an indispensable condition of Baptists communion, and, as the deed of trust simply appropriated the endowment to the use of Particular Baptist without further limitation, the Court declined to sanction a restriction which had not been introduced by the terms of the instrument or the actual practices of the sect. The partisans of "strict communion" could not hold their ground. They might have been right in their generation, but the congregation possessed full power to alter the practice and substitute a more liberal usage when the change appeared advisable.

Such is the outline of the case just decided. Immediately, it affects only the old chapel at Norwich, and even in its more remote operation it does but inform Baptists generally that, in the eyes of the law, baptism by immersion does not constitute a necessary condition of religious communion on the principles which they themselves have defined. But there are other features of the case exceedingly striking. The incidental description of the Baptist diversities, showing the tendency of schism to reproduce itself; the sturdy rigor of principle which rebelled against the least infraction of doctrine or discipline; The calm and peaceable resort of the disputants to a court of law; the quiet and natural action of the court in a case so apparently strange—all these features are forcibly illustrative of English feeling and habits. Of the decision itself we can only say that we feel involuntarily gratified at finding it on the side of liberality. It is certainly singular that Baptists themselves should never have put on record a recognition of baptism after their mode as an indispensable condition of communion; but where faith and works are both forthcoming, where candidates for communion are not only sympathizers in all points of doctrine, but unexceptionable in life, conversation, and behaviour, we do not think that Baptists of any designation will suffer by opening their doors to them.

VISIT OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

The Quebec Chronicle says the Canadian government has been officially notified that the Prince of Wales will leave England on the 10th of July for Canada, and adds: "The royal convoy will make St. John's, New Foundland, their first landing point; proceeding thence to Halifax, from which place the Prince will go to New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. In the lower Provinces his stay will necessarily be very limited, and the arrival of the royal fleet in the Lower St. Lawrence is confidently expected to take place not later than the 5th or 8th of August. In Quebec, one entire wing of the Parliament House is set apart to the Prince and his most immediate attendants. And it may as well be stated in this place, as part of the etiquette observed towards royalty, that there will be the same observance of privacy in other invitations as at Windsor or Osborne; so that one of the rooms of Parliament, the Assembly Room, will be the royal dining room for the time, and subject entirely to the control of the household accompanying the Prince. Of course we are not, in Canada, entirely accustomed to these things; but we believe it is the only way in which what is properly a state visit can be carried out in harmony with the observances of the Imperial Court. Apart from the formality of select invitations to dinner, or of a public levee, the Prince, it is supposed, will naturally do at Quebec as he would do at home. He will see the interesting sights of the neighborhood without being obliged to travel in perpetual state. At the Governor's residence he will naturally occupy more of the position of a private guest than that of the Prince of Wales—precisely as he might be a guest at the house of any nobleman or gentleman at home. From Quebec, it is understood to be arranged that the Prince will proceed westward in one of the lake or river boats. Arrived at Montreal, the Prince will take up his quarters at the house belonging to the Hon. John Rose, now occupied by the commander of the forces, Sir Fenwick Williams. From Montreal, it is arranged that they Prince will proceed to Ottawa, probably by the river and the Carrilton and Grenville railway. Here the Royal sojourn will probably extend over several days. From Ottawa, his Royal Highness will go to Prescott by railway, and thence over the Grand Trunk to Brockville, at which part he will go on board one of the large lake steamers for Kingston. The next stage will be by steamer up the Bay of Quinte to Belleville, where an opportunity will also be afforded for a display; and from Belleville the Prince will take a special train of Grand Truck Railway to Toronto, where the private residence of the Prince will be the old government house. From Toronto it is expected that the journey to the

PAY TO THE END OF THE YEAR.

We have made out, and sent out, all our accounts, to the end of the present year. Many have responded and paid up, but many have failed to do so. The object we have in writing these lines is, to call upon all who have not paid up to the end of the year, to do so immediately, by remittance to the office, or by payment to our agents. The year is more than half gone, and yet we have much to collect of our accounts, and to clear off books, between this and January next. This work we must accomplish. Come friends, you have received your accounts, through the paper or through the preacher; the amount is not large in each case; pay up to the end of the year and let us all begin even again.

RELIGION AND NEWSPAPERS—"THE WORLD" AND "THE MESSAGE."

There are some recently developed tendencies of the times which should cause the friends of Christianity and Christian civilization to "thank God and take courage." We allude to the tendencies, in all, departments of culture, to distinctly recognize the Christian religion as the truth in itself, and as the divine life of all other truth. In education this tendency is obvious and acknowledged. Of the relation of education to religion, these columns have already sufficiently treated. But what is true of the relation of education to religion, is true also of the relations of all other elements and agencies of culture to religion. There is a natural connection between religion and the whole system of means for mental and moral development; a connection—as we recently said in reference to education and religion—not accidental and artificial, but organic and vital.

As books have as much—if not more—power over public sentiment and character as schools, it is as important that religion have its appropriate place and influence in literature as in education. After all that Christian people have said, and written, and done, to establish Christian schools, and to promote religious education, a greater work—a work of more power for good, and of more difficulty of accomplishment—remains to be done—the establishment of a Christian literature. Of course, by Christian literature, we do not mean that all books should treat of religion, any more than we mean, by Christian education, that all lectures, lessons, and recitations should embody religion. But we mean that in our literature, as in our education, we should have a distinct and reverent recognition of God and his Word.

We began this article, however, for the purpose of saying something in relation to the influence of religious newspaper literature. As to literature in general, our religious publishing houses are doing their duty, and accomplishing a good work. But newspaper literature has a power which has never been fully appreciated, we fear, by the Christian people of this country. And this power will become much greater in coming years, when improved mail facilities shall bring newspapers to every door on the very day of publication, and when every member of every family, even every child that can read, shall read the newspapers daily. While religious publishing houses are leavening general literature, religious newspapers are expected to exert a good influence on newspaper literature generally. That the Christian public is not alive to the importance of a recognition of religion in the newspaper press is seen in the fact that so little is done to make the religious press independent, and to give it power. Millions of dollars are raised to endow colleges, and to support religious publishing houses; but, what is done for the religious press? Nothing, absolutely nothing. Every religious newspaper, to exert the influence it ought to exert, should be peculiarly independent. It should be able to employ every mechanical and artistic facility, and to command the highest ability and the most elegant literary taste. It is far more necessary that a religious newspaper be independent of the whimsical fluctuations of popular patronage, than that a college should be, however important the independence of the latter. There never has yet been in this country a Christian paper of the true stamp—a paper that could dare, at all times, to say what ought to be said, regardless of popular error and prejudice. There never can be such a paper while the religious press is so peculiarly dependent as at present. The secular press is notoriously enslaved by popular opinion, and the religious press is too much so.

The time is coming when, if the regular religious press, under the control of the different Churches, is not made more independent and more powerful, private enterprise will establish newspapers, upon a religious stand-point, which will largely divide the patronage of Christian and religious-minded people. There are already tendencies in that direction. A daily newspaper, large and cheap, and powerfully edited, called "The World," has recently made its appearance in New York. It is a secular newspaper in Christian hands, and intended to be conducted in a Christian spirit. The money has been contributed by people of all religious persuasions, belonging to the different evangelical Churches. It distinctly recognizes the great primal truths of Christianity, without touching the controverted doctrinal and ecclesiastical points. Its very existence is proof of the increasing desire to have a more distinct recognition of the Christian religion in newspaper literature, as well as in general literature and education. Rev. Dr. Abel Stevens, formerly editor of the Christian Advocate and Journal, is one of its corps of writers.

We learn also that about September another religious daily, will make its appearance. It will be called the Daily Message and will be edited and published by a corps of well qualified Christian men, whose names are not only kept in the background now, but will be no better known to the public after the paper appears. The capital to the extent likely to be required, is already in bank, awaiting the completion of the press and other mechanical preliminaries. The press is to be the swiftest machine of the kind yet in use. The publication office is to be in the most eligible location possible, the very 'eye of New York,' under Barnum's Museum, at the corner of Ann street. The price of the paper, like that of the World, is to be one cent. The Message will be a decidedly religious daily, subordinating the secular to the serious, and aiming to do good by the wayside. Its policy and editorial leaders are not to be paralyzed and neutralized by adjoining columns of rapes, fights, and murder details.

A LITTLE TALK ABOUT NOVELS—MR. JAMES.

This may seem an unusual topic for a Christian paper; and so it is. Such journals have but little to say, as a rule, upon this branch of literature. We think it high time, however, that they should have something to say. Fiction is almost as generally read as newspapers. It is one of the leading elements in the education of the time, and is increasing in power. It demands the attention of Christian men. Is the influence of fiction good or bad? Many are ready with an immediate answer, yea or nay. And so are many ready with an answer to any question, however profound and far-reaching its philosophy. Many are ready answer yea or nay to the question whether the world was literally or figuratively created in six days, whether the moon is inhabited, or to any other question however abstruse. We do not propose a formal answer to this question. Like every other development of civilization, fiction has its use and abuse, its good and bad influences. Too much devotion to fiction-reading is certainly harmful, mentally and morally; yet we should be sorry to hear any man who pretends to literary culture say that he never reads fiction at all. And then there is good fiction and bad fiction, true fiction and false fiction; just as there are good pictures and bad ones, true philosophies and false ones. Fiction itself, we should certainly say, is a legitimate department of literature; as certainly so as poetry is, as certainly so as the imagination is a legitimate faculty of the mental constitution. Too much time given to the study of poetry, or to the exclusive cultivation of the imagination, is harmful; and, likewise, an undue amount of fiction-reading unfits for severer studies, for more solid reading, and dilutes the life-blood of moral principle. But we did not begin this paper for the purpose of moralizing upon novels, but to speak somewhat of novels themselves.

Mr. James, who died on the 10th of last month, at the early age of sixty, lived to see his once fashionable novels go completely out of fashion. We wonder, does the public taste really advance and improve, or does it only change? Will Dickens follow in the wake of James; and Thackeray in the wake of Dickens? Will Weller, and Pickwick, Oliver Twist, Capt. Cuttle, Micawber, and jolly Mark Tapley, be consigned after some years to the limbo of the two horsemen who so perseveringly went along side by side in the majority of Mr. James's novels? And will the Major, and young Pendennis, and Becky Sharp, and Rawdon Crawley, and Barnes Newcome follow? Who shall say?

For there is a fashion in novels. Any reader of this, who began to read novels even so late as 1840, will have gone through several fashions since then. Then James was in his glory. Then we read Scott in a binding of rough boards. Then, and for some years after, we laughed over the seemingly inexhaustible fun of jolly "Harry Lorequer." Then we devoured the novels (now, by the way, coming in again in England, slowly) in which the plot, and the misery of many lives, turned upon some trivial point of honor, which no reader would have cared a snap about; or upon some tremendous and inscrutable secret, which the practised novel reader saw through at p. twenty-five, and was consequently out of his misery for the other three hundred oct. pages of closely printed columns. Then Bulwer was writing naughty novels because it was the mode for him to do so. He, at any rate, deserves to have a new lease of literary life, for his second style, his newest fashion, is infinitely finer than his first. It is the most successful and brilliant literary summersault the world ever saw.

But to return to our question, which is put in all seriousness: is it improvement, or is it mere change, which makes men to-day insist on nothing short of Thackeray, who fifteen years ago were delighted with James and Scott, and the host of minor writers who are embalmed in the "select novels" of the Harpers.

Mr. James, this industrious novelist, is dead. It has so long been the mode to smile at him and his books and his horsemen, that it may be permitted, now that he is out of hearing, to say a good word for him. His works were not brilliant; they were not wicked, or satirical; they did not abuse any body. He did not know, as Charles Dickens so well does, how to mark a character by a phrase, and so to iterate and reiterate this phrase that you had it insensibly drummed into your memory: so that Pecksniff has become with us the moral algebraic symbol, so to speak, of hypocrisy; Micawber, of shiftlessness; Dombey and Son, of stupid pride. But then his books were gentlemanly. They were written in a kindly, humane, catholic spirit. He had no hobbies (except the horsemen, indeed). He did not stand in the market place and cry "snob" till every one of his hearers thought every other one was a snob. His books did not make his readers censorious, or pharisaical, or disagreeable. He was evidently a simple-hearted, high-toned gentleman; a man of the world, who knew Vanity Fair, probably, but who knew too that it was perhaps not best to lead young men and women thither. He had a fertile fancy, and a skill in the working out of his plots which some of our present fashionable novelists might take a lesson of. His chapters and episodes fit into each other like the stones of an arch. There is, to be sure, a little jog to about the style. But what stories have a finer atmosphere of reality than James's? Where does the reader, be he wearied or sick or idle, (and if he is none of these three he is not like to enjoy his novel) where will he lose himself so pleasantly as with those same two horsemen as they wander over sunny fields and through pleasant forests? No writer that we have now in mind had a finer eye for the effect of a pleasant landscape. He did not catalogue its trees and clouds for you, indeed; but he gave it you in such charming guise that you enjoyed it, as much, or even more than the two horsemen. It is objected to him that his characters and scenes were not true to nature and that he repeated himself. On the first objection it is enough to say that it does not matter. It is the business of the novelist, for the time being, to make you a believer; and this being a test of merit, James was successful beyond doubt. None of the great novels record probable events. The story and character of Don Quixote are of the most impossible; and is it at all possible that funny old Pickwick—the modern Don Quixote, by the way, as Sam Weller is Sancho Panza's legitimate successor—should have travelled and been cheated and embarrassed as he was? But who cares for that?—Thackeray's novels are the truest to life, of all. But the unanimous verdict of all womankind is that they are the falsest of all. To say that James repeats himself is only to rank him with Dickens, and especially with Thackeray, who is the greatest mannerist, and the most continual repeater of himself and his few characters, that ever gained and deserved a great name.

When Mr. James began to write, the novel was not yet what it is now, an essay on society. It was yet a story, belonging to the same delightful class as the Arabian Nights and Robinson Crusoe. Our novelists now are all tremendous moralists; and the story is really, in many cases, merely the sugaring of the pill which an anxious practitioner stands ready to ram down the public throat. Whether the sentimentalism of Dickens or the cynicism of Thackeray are healthier in their effect than the breezy, gentlemanly, though quieter tone of James and his illustrious original, Scott, is matter for serious doubt. To be persuaded by the greatest living master of English that all men are snobs and all women fools, is not the best heart-training for a young man. He is apt to look less keenly at himself than his neighbor, and to understand "all men" to mean all but himself and his idol, Wm. M. Thackeray.

Frankly, we hope that as novels seem likely to be part of the popular education, we may come back or go forward to something which shall be a more kindly presentment of human nature than we find in the stories of those who are now counted our masters of Fiction. We believe that it is possible for the novel to combine all the truth in delineation of Thackeray, all the pathos of Dickens, and all the wit of Charles Reade, with a broader, more humane, and more catholic view and presentment of life, than the first two have yet attained.

THE LATE DR. DRAKE.

The unexpected death of this excellent man and eminent Christian minister caused great sorrow in the Church and country, especially in the Southwest. In the Mississippi Conference, particularly, where he had so long labored, the mourning is general. In addition to the editorial article published immediately upon the reception of intelligence of his death, we have published the resolutions of the Natchez quarterly conference, a tribute from the pen of Mrs. S. B. Thomas, and a well-prepared memoir by Rev. W. H. Watkins, D.D. In addition to these, however, we have received resolutions passed at various meetings in different parts of Mississippi, and numerous private communications. Funeral discourses have been preached in various places. The one prepared by Dr. Watkins contains a complete synoptical biography, and is to be published. Rev. Dr. T. H. Capers, President of the Southern Female College, also preached a funeral discourse, which was listened to by a large and solemn audience. Resolutions have been passed by the Fayette Church, by another meeting in the Fayette district, by the quarterly conference of the Cayuga circuit, by the quarterly conference of Bayou Pierre circuit, and many others. They are all in the usual form, and manifest the deep grief caused by the death of this "father in Israel."

CAMDEN FEMALE COLLEGE.

The examination of the young ladies of this institution, says the Ouachita Herald, commenced on Monday last, and continued three days. On Thursday the commencement exercises took place at the Methodist Episcopal church, including a speech by Hon. H. L. Grinsted before the Literary Society, which was responded to in a neat and beautiful manner by Miss Kate McCollum, in behalf of the Society. This was followed by the reading of an appropriate and well written composition by Miss Rosine Sanders, one of the graduating class, who, according to our judgment, richly deserved the honors which were awarded her. Rev. Mr. Allen, principal of the College, then delivered an address on the subject of Education, which was characterized by good sense and sound reasoning. The exercises were concluded at night with a Concert by the young ladies. We attended the examination and exercises, and take pleasure in bearing testimony to the fact that the young ladies evinced a thorough and complete knowledge of the various branches of study upon which they were examined. Too much praise cannot be awarded to Mr. Allen, and his able and accomplished assistants, Rev. Mr. Baird, Miss Allen, Miss Fellows, and Miss Malone, for their successful efforts to build up in Camden a first class Female College The institution may now be regarded as firmly established, and if the same judicious course is pursued in the future, will continue to improve in usefulness and increase in patronage.

The Concert was a brilliant affair and the taste and skill with which the young ladies performed is sufficient commendation of their Instructress, Miss Allen, who is acknowledged to be one of the best performers in the Southern country, and who possesses a voice naturally sweet, and rendered still more charming by the highest cultivation. We are indebted to them for several hours of rare enjoyment, and in return wish them all, scholars and teachers, prosperity and success.

THE SCHOOLS AT GOLIAD.

Goliad, Texas, is on the San Antonio river, about 90 miles, we believe, below San Antonio. Should we be wide of the mark as to the distance, our geographical ignorance, or forgetfulness, rather, must be pardoned.—We have been at Goliad, and the public know it well as the place of the massacre of Fannin and his men, by order of Santa Anna, after they had capitulated as prisoners of war; or, rather, they were murdered across the narrow river, opposite Goliad, at the old Mexican town La Bahia. Goliad is the seat of two flourishing schools—Arcanma College, male, and Presbyterian, under the Presidency of Rev. J. E. C. Doremus, and the Paine Female Institute, female, and Methodist, under the Principalship of Rev. A. P. Leach. Both schools are needed, both beneficial to that country, and mutually helpful. We hear good news from Mr. Doremus, and also from Mr. Leach. It is a beautiful country, and a beautiful place.

THE METHODIST.

This is the title of a new weekly paper, to appear in New York, on the 14th of July, to be edited by Rev. G. R. Crooks, D.D., with Rev John M'Clintock, D.D., as corresponding editor from Paris. It is evidently in opposition to the Christian Advocate and Journal, now in the hands of the ultra abolitionists, and is of the Abel Stevens stripe of conservatism. A full advertisement appears on our third page, from which we learn that it promises to be an able and elegant newspaper. We forbear further notice until we see it.

NEW YORK LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE.

The most important literary event of the last month was the publication, by Messrs. Little, Brown and Co., of Boston, of the eighth volume of Mr. Bancroft's "History of the United States." The first volume appeared no less than 26 years ago. Mr. Bancroft was born in Worcester, Mass., in the year 1800; he entered Havard College at the age of thirteen, and most have been an unusual scholar, for he graduated with the second honors of his class in 1817. Thence he went to Germany, and studied at Gottingen for two years, going through a wide and deep course of varied learning. In 1820, in his twentieth year, he received the degree of Doctor of Philosophy at Gottingen. He next went to Berlin, traveled largely over the Continent of Europe, concluded his tour by traveling through England, and returned to the United States, at the age of twenty-two; perhaps the best informed man of his age—in literature and general knowledge—whom this country has yet produced. After holding for a short while the office of Greek Tutor, in Harvard, he started in 1823, in connection with Dr. Joseph T. Cogswell, the present Librarian of the Astor Library, a school in Northampton, Mass., where it was intended to prepare young men in a superior manner for College. Here he translated Keeren's "Politics of ancient Greece," and gradually worked out of the ministry, for which he was originally intended. He had preached acceptably in Germany, as well as here, I believe, and was, in fact, the Rev. George Bancroft, before he espoused politics, and became the Hon. George Bancroft. Several of our great men have passed through similar changes. In the old reviews we find mention made of the Rev. Edward Everett for instance.

In 1838 Mr. Bancroft became Collector of the Port of Boston. In 1844 he was not elected Governar of Massachusetts. In 1845 he was made Secretary of the Navy; and to him the country owes the establishment of the Naval school at Annapolis. From 1846 to 1849 he was Minister to England.

In 1823 he published his first work—a volume of Poems. In 1834 the first volume of his History was published. His public positions thereafter were great aids to him in the collection of important documents in England. The second volume in 1837; the third in 1840. These contained the history of the Colonization of the United States. The fourth volume, in 1842, takes in the events from 1748 to 1763; the fifth, comprising what happened in 1763-1766, showing the actual causes of the disruption, appeared in 1853; the sixth volume, 1766-74, brings us down to the very verge of the Revolution; the seventh takes in the stirring times from the spring of 1774 to the Battle of Bunker Hill, (June, 1775,) and its consequences—this was the epoch when America declared her independence. The eighth volume, now present, relates what happened for American Independence, not only in this country, but in Europe, from midsummer, 1775, to the adoption, by Congress, of the immortal Declaration of Independence, written by Thomas Jefferson, in July, 1776.

It is to be hoped that Mr. Bancroft, who is yet a hale and hearty, though slender and somewhat nervous, and white haired man, may be spared to complete his great work.

A late steamer brought the news, not unexpected, of the death of G. P. R. James, the veteran novelist. He was one year younger than Bancroft, having been born in London, in 1801. He commenced as author very early; and Washington Irving encouraged him, while Scott, then in his glory, and Professor Wilson, the lion among the critics, praised his first book, which, was published in 1825. From this "Richelieu," to his last, "Lord Montague's Page," published in Philadelphia in 1858, Mr. Allibone counts up in his dictionary just 75 separate books written by Mr. James, making a total of 189 volumes. This beats Scott, and he wrote faster than any body else. It is at the rate of nearly six volumes per year; and when it is considered that some of these were histories, which obtained the credit of at least fidelity, (for once he was made Historiographer of Great Britain) and that nearly all the rest were historical works, requiring also extensive reading, it must be supposed then he was no idle man.

He removed with his family to the United States in 1850, and I have been told liked this country amazingly. He used to contribute largely to Harper's Magazine, and wrote then, anonymously, I think, a story, which was not a story, but a medley of anecdotes strung together on the pleasant pretence of a story which was ever going to be, but never was told. The Harpers were also the original publishers of several of his works, written in this country. In 1858 he was removed to Venice, where he was British Consul, giving occasion for that little joke of Thackeray in the first number of the Cornhill, that Mr. James was now, singularly enough, "in the only place in the world where by no possibility two horsemen could be seen riding abreast."

It is known that Mr. James latterly always employed an amanuensis, to whom he dictated his stories; and it is stated that he often carried on two novels at once. He was a man, I have been told by friends who knew him well, of the most jovial and kindly temperament, with an inexhaustible store of ever-ready anecdote, and therefore, a ready and pleasant talker. He had a great memory, as he needed to have; and when he was in the humor to talk, any subject or chance allusion drew him out, and he went on from story to story, one drawn out by the other, of the most varied kind, and would sometimes talk thus for an hour at a time. In fact I have heard it said that his dictation to an amanuensis went on in the same way, as more like talk than anything else. His works have sold very largely in this country, they have been translated into German and French; and many editions have been printed in England.

The Morning Chronicle, one of the London dailies, which was once a rival of the Times, but has long been going down-hill, is about to meet with the fate of Pharaoh's lean kine; it is to be swallowed up by a fatter contemporary, the Post. The Chronicle is now seventy years old—old enough to die—and is remarkable for the many celebrated men whose pens have at various times been wielded in its service. Its first editor was Woodfall, the printer of the letters of Junius. Tom Moore used to send his satirical squibs there. Albany Foulonque, one of the most talented "editors" England has produced, was long engaged on it. Dickens' here made his debut as a writer in the "Sketches by Boz." Fox, Sheridan, and Burke, in their turn contributed to its columns. Byron there published some of his political poems; Campbell there attempted even to write political leaders. Lord Campbell there wrote theatrical criticisms; and it numbered among its other contributors, Macaulay, William Godwin, Leigh Hunt, Hazlitt, Allan Cunningham, and J. Payne Collier.

There is very little doing in the book way just now. Messrs. Mason and Brothers publish "Life in the Desert: or, Recollections of Travel in Asia and Africa," by Colonel L. Du Couret (Hudji-Abd'el-Hamid-Bey), Ex-Lieutenant of the Emirs of Mecca, Yemen, and Persia, Delegate of the French Government to Central Africa, member of the Society Orientale, Academie Nutionale, &c.; translated from the French.

Tilton and Co., of Boston, announce a new book, by the author of "Sir Rohan's Ghost," Miss Prescott, of Newburyport; and also, "The Recreations of a Country Parson," a series of Essays, by Charles Kingsley, I believe.

Ticknor and Fields announce the works of Mrs. Anna Jameson, (recently deceased); "English Puritanism and its Leaders," by Rev. John Tulloch, D.D.; and the Life of Francis Bacon (from an entirely new point of view) by Hepworth Dixon. They have just published a new series of stories by Hans Christian Andersen, some good, but mostly indifferent.

Harper's Magazine for August will contain the first of a series of articles which will be a new delight to its readers, namely, the "Lectures on the Four Georges," which Mr. Thackeray delivered in this country some years ago, and which are now for the first time to be printed. They have been largely added to, I understand, and will have a few characteristic illustrations. Here, in essay, Mr. Thackeray is on his own ground, and always does his best. Those who heard him will read these lectures with renewed pleasure; those who did not, have a treat before them.

The July number of the Cornhill Magazine contains a poem by Mr. Thackeray, "Vanitas Vanitatum," and another by Mrs. Browning, "A Musical Instrument," and another by a less known, but not less worthy poet, Matthew Arnold, called "Men of Genius." There are articles on the East India Company, and Electricity, which subjects are thought rather worn out here; one on "Physiological Riddles: How we act," which is the beginning of an interesting series; one on "Adulteration of food and its remedies;" and an amusing resume of editorial crosses, by the editor, in which he shows that even he, the great man, has thorns in his pillow.

They are raising in England a subscription fund, to present to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated, a statue to the late Lord Macaulay. Prince Albert heads the list with £100; and William M. Thackeray, Esq., gives £5, among plenty of others on the list.

The fifth and concluding volume of Ruskin's Modern Painters is advertised to be published immediately. It contains thirty-six illustrations on steel and one hundred engravings on wood. The topics treated are "Leaf Beauty," "Cloud Beauty," "Ideas of Relation—Invention Formal and Invention Spiritual." The price of the volume is £2 10s. in England, where a complete set of Ruskin's works cannot be got for less than about $85. Here they are republished by Mr. Wiley, who could probably sell sets complete for $15. Quite a difference.

Dr. Cogswell, the Librarian of the Astor Library, sailed a few days ago for Europe with a fund of $10,000 for the purchase of additions to that Institution. Six thousand dollars of this sum is from the liberal hand of Mr. Wm. H. Astor. The ghost which Mr. C. saw some months ago, was scared by the injudicious row made about his appearance, and has not shown itself since. I have a friend who has a liking for ghosts, and who has on several occasions visited the particular alcove where the poor ghost was first seen. He has gone at the proper hours, and with and without light; has waited patiently, and has seen nothing. Ghosts are very disappointing things. I never could see one, and I have been watching for many years.

Mr. H. B. Dawson, author of the "Battles of America," has had intrusted to him the entire manuscript correspondence and papers of the Hon. D. D. Tompkins, Vice-President of the United States and Governor of the State of New York, to be employed in a memoir, which Mr. Dawson is now engaged on. The communication of any additional matter relating to Gov. Tompkins, in private hands, will be gratefully acknowledged by Mr. Dawson.

El Monte—Los Angeles—Enchanting Region—Delicious Grapes—A Reflection—Descending the Mountain—Mine Host—Grapevines—Solitude Solemnized——Visalia—Tulare Co.—San Jose Valley—Midnight.

In this portion of California many things attract the traveller's eye. Long accustomed to solitude and desolation, the signs of life and being make one feel as if he had at last compassed the globe or jumped the long, long blank in history, and was once more on the confines of the world of action. Here is the little town of El Monte to begin with, a hotel where you may get dinner and pay for it, a lady to preside at the table to talk and ask questions, and when you go out, there are boys and men to look at the horses and to stare at you and wonder who you are and where you are going. But we must leave. See the fields enclosed, some with post and plank, some with willow hedges, and some with the broad-leaved cactus. Yonder on the left is the Catholic mission, embosomed in trees, a place of beauty, 'tis said. And now look over the plains—what mean those little holes and piles of earth? Is this another dog town? Nay, the noise of our wheels resolves the mystery. Why, the squirrels have come down from their lofty tree tops and have burrowed the earth for holes. Even so. California abounds with this species of squirrel, if indeed it be a distinct species. In some places they cover the land, and with their perforations have riddled the surface of the earth. The owl, too, dwells with them as with the prairie dog.

The squirrel is gray, like the common cat squirrel of the East, perhaps a shade darker, the same in form, motion, "caudal appendage," and general habits. They are a pest to the country. In spite of guns and poisons they multiply fearfully. Their fecundity is said to be wonderful. I saw thousands upon thousands and all were in fine plight, fat, sleek and playful. In dry, dusty plains, or near some farmer's wheat-field, they all seem to be in like condition.

Now we come upon a scene of enchantment—Los Angelos. Contrast lent its aid doubtless, but this is really a charming town. The beautiful stream which meanders by it, furnishing irrigation to the vineyards and gardens, the tasteful residences, the hedges of willow, the life and stir and obvious thrift of the place, all conspire to invest it with interest. To us it was like a magical creation. Aladdin's lamp could hardly have conjured up a brighter, more unexpected scene. I cannot give its history.—It is an old place, revised, enlarged, modernized. Spain has left her foot-prints, but young America will soon have left no vestige of her presence, except the grape vine. This will be spared for its own sake. Here is the School of America. Such grapes! Such clusters! Such flavor! I can taste them yet and hope to feast on them in time to come. As we returned in October they were in full perfection, and being compelled to lie over three days, we feasted. One delightful quality of the grape is that they may be eaten to repletion with impunity.—They are good, morning, noon, and night.

While the driver was changing horses, I strolled about the main street and finally stepped into a barber's shop. A large mirror hung upon the wall, and I concluded to take a survey of myself. Reflected in the glass, I saw a man with a slouched hat, innocent of shape, a shirt covered with the dust of long travel, too deeply dyed ever to be whitened again, a gray flannel frock, as uncanonical as a coat as could be; a face, oh horror! what a beard! I looked and yielded. "Can you shave me in five minutes?" "Yes, sir," said the man of the razor. When I resumed my seat in the stage, "What," said a passenger "have you been doing? You do not look like the same man." After a long inspection he made out the cause. "Beard or no beard" is hardly a moral question. At least my conscience is not involved. I am not "offended" with my brethren who have abandoned the razor, but a fleshy chin is not for me. To look like a preacher I must shave. I hope never to see that face again, that peered out upon me from the barber's looking-glass in Los Angelos.

It was late in the evening when we left, and as we approached the mountains the air grew unpleasantly cold. Blankets were in demand. The night was chilly enough for December. About midnight we crossed the mountains, a slow, laborious ascent, and the descent is made with difficulty. The road has been cut through the rock—a heavy, expensive job. The scenery by moonlight is wild, grand, awful. At sunrise, almost frozen, we draw up at a way-side tavern for breakfast. The shanty occupied the only spot on which a house could stand. Located in a mountain gorge "mine host" contrives by hook and by crook to provide for travellers. A wilder region it would be hard to imagine. Yet here of choice, an intelligent man with an interesting family has settled. His nearest neighbor is twenty miles, distant and while I remonstrated with him on account of his children, he cut me short by declaring that he had wandered long to find that place, and as to education for his children they needed only what they could pick up, and would doubtless make their way in the world without books. Our debate was earnest and we quit as controversialists usually do, each confirmed in his own opinion. At long intervals, we found some of the original inhabitants of the country—commonly called "greasers"—a lazy, thriftless set, unimproved and unquickened by the presence or example of the American. In this region, nature seems to struggle with herself, extremes meet, alterations of valley and mountain, rich and poor land, dry, sterile wastes and then bright sparkling streams with verdant banks. Behind, all sterility, just here "a streak of fat and a streak of lean," ahead, all rich, beautiful and attractive. Fort Tejon is one hundred and thirty miles from Los Angelos and seems to me to be one of the many expletive military posts which burden the government. For beauty and grandeur of location it is well chosen. On leaving the road, for three miles runs down a canon of awful sublimity. The towering mountains on each side, the little stream which murmurs along its serpentine path, the deep stillness which broods over the scene, invest the place with the sort of sacredness favorable to religious emotion.—A recluse could hardly find a more appropriate retreat from noise and show. It is solitude solemnized. On emerging from this deep, dark defile, we strike an open plain with a down grade for fourteen miles, a distance our ponies accomplished in an hour. But it is wearisome to think over this route, much less to describe it. Your readers could take very little interest in the details of our journey along these hills and plains. Suffice it to say, the road is good, the mountains high, the valleys rich, live-oak common, settlements more frequent, an occasional stream, one large one, Kearn river—and finally you strike the Tuba Valley, a region which begins to attract great attention in California.

After breakfast one morning we resumed our journey; the day was hot, oppressively so, and yet, in full view up on our right, the snow lay heavy on the Sierra Nevada range. The sun nearly melted us on the plain; how the snow resisted its burning beams, is one of the mysteries of altitude. It was refreshing to know that it was cool somewhere, and that if we had time we might reduce the temperature which was dissolving us. Presently we reach the town of Visalia, a new place, having a fresh, strong, growing look. I never saw a busier people. It is amazing how rapidly villages can grow on the Pacific coast. Nor are the buildings mere shanties, but substantial houses, many of them brick, two or three stories high, having quite a city air about them. In this neighborhood I first saw the magpie, the most numerous of all the birds in California. They do not chatter as I had been taught to expect, but seem quiet and sober, quite disposed to be on good terms with all the world.

This whole region is called the Tulare country. It is settling up with a very clever, substantial population. It is well watered, lands rich, timber (live-oak) abundant and burdened with acorns. Large spaces are enclosed and the mast thus preserved for swine. Hog raising is a paying business. Wheat grows finely, and one peculiarity is (I never noticed it elsewhere than in California) that the grain flourishes just as well under the shade of those immense oaks as in the most exposed places. In the east scarce anything will grow in the shade of a tree—here the stalks of wheat were as luxuriant close to the trunk of the tree as beyond the circle of its shade. This is both an agricultural and a stock raising section. Game abounds. The antelope may be seen in large herds, and deer are common, as I understood.

The dust of the plains is terrible to encounter. We hasten on, and soon we strike the far-famed San Jose Valley. It has been often described. Gilroy is a nice little town as you enter, and soon San Jose itself breaks upon the vision. This is one of the loveliest regions I ever saw. It is positively enchanting. Art and taste are combining with nature to give new attractions to this lovely valley, and the town is destined to distinction, for size as well as location. Tired, dusty and hungry, we stepped out of the stage and made our way to a restaurant, and fed upon fat things, at seventy-five cents a-head. With a large accession of passengers, we left at sunset, and in six hours were rolling through the streets of San Francisco.

It is midnight. Weary with a stage travel of two thousand miles, without rest, with little sleep—with your permission, Mr. Editor, I will retire, and wait the revelations of the morning sun, before I proceed with my story.

DENOMINATIONAL SCHOOLS—SUMMERFIELD AND GREENSBORO'.

MR. EDITOR: There is much opposition in various parts of the country to denominational schools and colleges, and it is only with the hope of being able to some extent to contribute in removing this prejudice from the public mind, that I send you this article.

The fathers both of Church and State are passing away, and the times demand pious and educated young men to fill their places. But from whence are such to come if not from religious institutions? It is a lamentable fact that our State universities and other similar schools, which are not under the control of some denomination, pay very little attention to the religious and moral training of the youth who attend them. Many a promising young man, with buoyant hopes and noble aspirations, leaves a happy home and pious friends, goes to some college where few moral restraints are brought to bear upon his youthful mind, religion not being appreciated by the students, and perhaps not by the faculty, falls into bad habits, disappoints his parents, and brings ruin upon himself. The question comes up, how can such as this be avoided? The answer is simple; by patronizing religious institutions; for while they educate the head equally as well as others, the heart is by no means neglected. As a proof of this fact, it may be affirmed, that of all the unfortunate college difficulties which have taken place within the last few years, not one occurred in a denominational seminary. This being the case, parents should feel it their duty to place their sons where they will be less exposed to the many temptations and frivolities so common to college life.

The citizens of West Alabama should feel themselves especially favored in having the Centenary Institute located in Summerfield, and the Southern University at Greensboro'—two of the most delightful places for educational purposes that the State affords. Old Centenary, which has been standing for years as a beacon light to all observers, and sending out from her classic halls pious and educated sons and daughters to bless and "refine the world," is a sufficient comment on herself. Her well deserved fame has been wafted to every community throughout the Alabama Conference, and all with one accord contribute to her praise. Parents who wish their daughters to be religiously educated and prepared for usefulness in life, should send them to Summerfield. And if they will commit the training of their sons to the Rev. D. C. B. Connerly, the principal of the male department of Centenary, and he does not, after a fair trial, succeed, they had better be taken home and put to plowing, or something else as useful. Mr. Connerly makes no special effort to please any one except himself, and can consequently give entire satisfaction to those who patronize him.

From an advertisement in the Advocate, I see that the first collegiate term of the Southern University was to close on the 4th of July. As was very much desired, the faculty have succeeded, I understand, in placing the moral and Intellectual standing of the institution very high. This institution, though young, bids fair to become one of the best colleges in the South. The building is magnificent; the faculty so far unsurpassed; the trustees prudent, persevering and intelligent; the agent is energetic and successful; the friends of the enterprise numerous; consequently, everything goes to strengthen the hopes already entertained for the success of the college. The bright dawn of a glorious career has already begun to rise, which should encourage the advocates of religion. During a recent revival of religion in the Methodist Church of Greensboro, most of the students of the University presented themselves time and again at the altar, many of whom were converted, joined the Church, and now give promise of a life of usefulness. It is the candid opinion of your writer that, if a man will have his son prepared for college by Mr. Connerly, and then let him graduate under the tuition of Rev. Dr. Wightman, of the Southern University, he will take a high stand in the world, be useful to the State and an ornament to the Church.

VIATOR.

GRAND CATHOLIC COUNCIL IN ROME.—The Metropolitan Record, organ of Archbishop Hughes says: "Our advices from the Eternal City, brought out by the Persia, inform us of the conception in the Capital of the Christian World of one of the grandest and most elevated political ideas of the nineteenth century. Some members of the Sacred College have proposed to the Pope the subject of the assemblage in Rome of distinguished delegates, administrative or deputized, from every Catholic Power in the world. This body, when organized, is to constitute a commission of inquiry into the actual condition of temporal affairs in the States of the Church and having collected a calm and unprejudiced statement on every topic, draw up a report suggesting to his holiness what amount of popular reform is really required and should be granted, as well as what portion or portions of the demands of his subjects should be refused. It is said that the suggestion has afforded much pleasure to the mind of the Holy Father.

PROF. C. G. FORSHEY.—Our old friend, the Superintendent of the Texas Military Institute, at Rutherville, called upon us yesterday, in fine health, and full of life and hope. His School, to our own personal knowledge, is one of the very best in the country. He is an accomplished gentleman, a thorough teacher, and one of the best disciplinarians.

CARROLL, HOY, & CO., have their card on third page. Mr. Carroll is the gentleman who lately gave $100 to the Washington City Church.

A PLEA FOR CAMP MEETINGS.

Is the era for camp meetings clean gone for ever? Will God be favorable no more to these once extraordinary means of grace? Once the people were content to go many miles, with much of their provisions cooked, and with cloth tents, and wagons, carts and carriages, to worship God in the grove, under a bush arbor.

These are the days of Conventions. I propose that we have some—yea, many, for religious purposes. Admit the Presidential canvass is going on—it will end after a while; admit the people are very avaricious, and the slaves will have to pick cotton; admit that in former days there may have been much of cooking and eating, dressing and promenading; yet something ought to be done. The people are dying, shooting, drinking, gambling, dancing. Many will not go to an ordinary meeting, not even to a quarterly or protracted meeting; to a camp meeting they will go. Here they sing, they pray, exhort, preach, talk, for four days together, and God deigns to bless. Sinners are convicted and converted, and it often occurs that more persons are thus saved by a camp meeting than by all the efforts of the circuit preacher during the year. In this way many become acquainted with our doctrines that otherwise would have remained ignorant and prejudiced to their eternal undoing.

Camp meetings are expensive: those who support them expend much in provisions, tiare, &c. But David said: "I will not offer to God a sacrifice of that which cost me nothing." Under the law, the first was to be offered to God—the first of men and beast—the first sheaf of wheat, the first ripe corn. One-tenth was the standing law. Suppose camp meetings expensive; they may be far less so than a prodigate son, less so than famine, or war, or pestilence, or the curse of God in some other form. Look at the Sabbath desecration in our land.—Shall it not pull down the wrath of a holy God upon us? And how shall we arrest this torrent, and arrest these threatened calamities? By the spread of sound and saving piety among the people, by camp meetings, or something else out of the old stereotyped way of the present day. There is no place where we shall be so likely to get our children, servants and neighbors converted as at a camp meeting.

Need I insist on this? It will hardly be disputed, if they can be conducted properly. Let me suggest some few things. In the first place, select a locality where is water, springs, wells or cisterns. (There is water coming out of the hills near the church on Sicily Island.) Then make cloth tents, with bagging and lawells, or osnaburgs. Two thicknesses will turn the rain effectually. Both these are needed on every plantation: the first for cotton, and the last for clothing. Make the first tent of osnaburgs sewed together, and stretch it on a ridge pole; then make a fly of the bagging sewed together, and stretch it over the first. These two will turn almost any rain. Before the tent door you can have a bush arbor, and one of bushes large enough to shade the congregation. Thither let us repair with our families and neighbors to worship in the spirit, with few duplies, but as much food cooked as possible, that our servants may worship as well as we.

LAY CO-OPERATION.

MR. EDITOR:—The following resolutions are on an important subject, and the publication of them may be of benefit. They were unanimously adopted at the third Quarterly Conference of Fayette circuit.

Resolved, 1st—That the present plan of lay-co-operation in the Mississippi Annual Conference is cumbersome, and to some extent inefficient, from its numbers.

2d. That we recommend that said plan be so amended, that but two delegates be allowed to each Presiding Elder's district, and two alternates to be elected at the District Stewards' meeting; or should the stewards fail to elect, then the Presiding Elder should nominate them each Quarterly Conference, and each Quarterly Conference shall be entitled to count as one vote. Whosoever shall receive the votes of a majority of the Quarterly Conferences shall be entitled to their seats, and it shall be the duty of the Presiding Elder to give them a proper certificate of their election.

3d. That the Mississippi Annual Conference be requested to memorialize the General Conference for a change of the discipline, so as to give the lay delegates in the Annual Conferences the right to vote on all questions of Church policy.

4th. That the above resolutions be laid before the several Quarterly Conferences of Fayette district, with a request that they adopt similar resolutions.

5th. That the Rev. H. F. Johnson, P. C., be requested to present the foregoing resolutions, numbers one, two and three, to the next Mississippi Annual Conference.

Will the Recording Steward, or the preachers in charge, in Fayette district, clip the above resolutions from this paper, and present them to the Quarterly Conferences of which they are members respectively?

It occurs to me, that it would be well for every Quarterly Conference in the Mississippi Annual Conference to take immediate action on this subject, that it may be settled at an early day. If not presumption in me to advise, could not the wish of the laity be arrived at in this way: let each Quarterly Conference instruct their lay delegates how to vote on propositions to retain, modify, or abolish the present system of lay-co-operation, and let the lay delegates have a meeting during the next Annual Conference, mature their plan and present it to the Annual Conference for its consideration.

I would not have written a word had I not been sending you the above resolutions.

SHARON FEMALE COLLEGE.

The annual examination of the students begins Monday, July 23d. Commencement day will be Thursday, July 26th.

Rev. S. F. Gard having resigned his place as President of the college, the trustees have elected Prof. W. L. C. Hunnicutt, who has been in Madison College since January, 1857. He graduated at Emory College, Geo. under Bishop Pierce, and was sent to us by the Bishop. His scholarship is unquestionable: and while we regret our loss in the resignation of Bro. Gard, we rejoice at our success in securing so able a successor.

We believe there is a bright future for old Sharon Female College. I believe it is the oldest institution in operation, in the State, and deserves a larger patronage.—When we get that Peeler donation we hope to enlarge some, and have several things more done, as we shall get others to help us. By the way, how have the notes of that donation been arranged? I saw that $8,000 was given to the colleges under the patronage of the Mississippi Conference. We have one and a half—Sharon one, Centenary a half. So Sharon will be entitled to two thirds of that donation, if not all, if the notices published give a correct statement of the facts in the case.

H. H. MONTGOMERY.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

SABINE CIRCUIT—Rev. E. W. Griswold writes: I commenced on my work Jan 3; found gloomy prospects; the people were surprised that a preacher with a family should be sent to them; at first they manifested unwillingness for us to stay; but once this difficulty came, others followed. They are severe, it is true; but not to my entire discouragement for one year. I have thirteen preaching places proper; have enlarged some—have now eighteen in a month, and ride hope ing to 500 miles to make my rounds, over a country too rough to ride much in a buggy; so I cannot do as much in the back circuit as I would like. Almost of my meetings are good congregations, attended and enjoyed. Some have joined the Church. But prospects are more gloomy now. What can be the cause? The judgments of God come upon us in rapid succession. Scarce has the spring sickness abated, which swept off many of the people, when a drouth comes that threatens great want, if not a famine. Emigration has caused corn to become scarce, so that at this time many have no bread. But, what is more fearful, there has been no rain on most of my work since the 28th February; corn is now dying in the fields; some are cutting it down to make use of it as forage. The cattle suffer much for want of their accustomed range, which has been burnt over two or three times. In all of my travels I have never seen such foreboding. For, should the drouth continue a few days longer, which would prevent planting and making late corn, I suppose there are fifty families that live within the bounds of my work who would not make bread; and whose teams, if living, would be too weak to haul hay from the necessary distance, from fifty to ninety miles.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

MONTGOMERY CIRCUIT.—Revs. L. P. Gholson and S. A. Pilley write: The church at Mt Meigs, on the Montgomery circuit, has been greatly blessed. The membership became greatly revived; class and prayer meetings had much to do with it. Our meeting lasted nearly three weeks. The entire community became interested. We had some as clear conversions as we have ever seen.—Seventeen whites joined the Church, most of whom were young ladies and young men. There has been a revival influence among the colored people for some months past. Some sixty have joined the Church, and mostly all professed conversion.

WEEKLY SUMMARY OF NEWS.

DOMESTIC.

CROPS IN MISSISSIPPI.—The Mississippi exchanges all speak of renewed prospects of large crops. Cotton had not been seriously injured by drouth; and corn had suffered only in a few localities. The abundance of rain that has lately fallen in most of the counties, has added largely to the promise of the future.

The first telegraph in Arkansas was opened on the 5th inst. It is the commencement of the Pacific line, and extends from St. Louis to Fayetteville. The line is to be continued to Sherman, Texas, via Fort Smith, Ark., which will make six hundred and seventy-eight miles from St. Louis toward the Pacific. The company is commencing operations at Los Angeles, so as to meet the line extending southerly from Vizella, on the Independence route. The company state that a continuous line from San Francisco to Los Angeles (four hundred and eighty miles) will be in operation by the middle of July.

ARRIVAL OF A SLAVER AT MOBILE.—The schooner Clotilde, having on board a cargo of Africans, amounting in all to one hundred and three, crossed the bar to-day, and anchored in the bay, where she was met by a steamboat, which took the negroes on board and proceeded up the river to some unknown point.

INKCMAN HONORARY.—The Cincinnati Daily Press, speaking of the death of Mrs. Williams, says: "When the body of Mrs. S. H. Williams, of Memphis, one of the victims of the steamer Ben Lewis disaster, was recovered, it was found that it had been robbed of a considerable amount of jewelry, and one of the fingers had been much lacerated by the fruitless efforts of the murderous thieves to get off a plain gold ring which was very closely fitted. The body was found floating in the current, dragging an oar, and when taken into the skiff its natural warmth had not disappeared; so that the wretches who robbed the unfortunate woman did so before life was extinct.

REV. HARDEN'S EXECUTION.—Belvidere, N.J., July 6.—The execution of Rev. Mr. Harden, who poisoned his wife, took place about half past one o'clock. A crowd appeared early, and remained on the scaffold with a firm and steady step, accompanied by Rev. Mr. Day, Rev. Mr. Kirk, and several deputy sheriffs. As soon as they reached the top of the scaffold, Harden knelt down and led in prayer, and after a few minutes arose and took his place upon with no outward signs of emotion. He bade adieu to those on the scaffold; the Sheriff then placed the cap over his face, descended to the ground, and cut the cord that held the drop. Harden fell with a heavy lunge, but, not breaking his neck, the death-struggle was violent, and several minutes elapsed before the body appeared devoid of sensibility, during which time his limbs were drawn up and dropped suddenly. After twelve minutes the physicians pronounced him dead, and the body was lowered and placed in the coffin, and then taken to his father's residence in Blairstown, where the funeral will take place on Sunday next. Harden made no speech on the scaffold, as had been expected; however, he made a full confession to his brother, yesterday, which will be published, but not in his own language.

THE NEW GOLD MINES NEAR EL PASO.—The San Antonio (Texas) Herald, of the 28th ult., says: Messrs. Bell Brothers, silversmiths of that city, assayed a small bag of dust from the newly discovered mines in the neighborhood of Santa Rita, and pronounced it in quality equal to the best of California gold. The Ledger publishes an extract from a letter written at El Paso, June 22d, which says: "I understand that specimens of gold from the mines recently discovered in Arizona, are to be forwarded to you. These mines are about one hundred and sixty miles from this place, fifteen miles from the copper mines, and about the same distance from Gila river. The miners are not averaging less than $6 per day, and are working with the rudest implements. The mines, so far as now known, range about fifteen miles along the creek where they lie. This is surface digging; the bed-rock has not yet been reached, but does not lie deep. Provisions are moderately plenty, and will be also tolerably cheap, as the country supplies a considerable quantity without hauling a very great distance. I assure you, gentlemen, this is no humbug; men are engaged as miners whose characters and resources forbid such an idea. The only drawback is, that perhaps the water will not hold out for extensive digging by a very large number of persons. These miners are on the water, which is now scanty. A considerable quantity of coarse gold pieces have been found, weighing about an ounce." Mining utensils are said to be in great demand in Mesilla, picks commanding twelve and shovels ten dollars. Over $1,500 worth of dust is said to have been gathered by three Mexicans in one week.

FOREIGN NEWS.

MISCELLANEOUS.—The firm of Acher & Co., of Berlin, have purchased the entire library of Baron Von Humboldt, which, it will be recollected, was bequeathed by the philosopher to his servant, M. Seifert. The collection numbers ten thousand volumes, many of them of great rarity, and not a few presented copies containing autograph inscriptions from the donors.

The Montreal Advertiser says native silver has been discovered in the township of Kingsey, C. E., on two lots. The owner of one has sold mining right for $1800; but the proprietor of the other has refused all offers yet made. The quantity of the metal found is considerable, and the locality is represented by returned Californians to resemble the Washoe district where such large discoveries of silver have been recently made.

SICILY AND NAPLES.—The Neapolitans were fortifying Messina, and concentrating 80,000 troops there, and considerable ammunition. The evacuation of Palermo is completed.—The Neapolitan frigates had left port. Garibaldi was forming twenty regiments for operation on the main land. The Neapolitans were in great force in Calabria. All the communes in Sicily had presented addresses, requesting annexation to Piedmont. The American vessel seized by the Neapolitans was the Charles and Jane, of Baltimore. The American Minister at Naples had demanded passports for his son and two others to visit the vessel at Gaeta. Advices from Ravenna to the 22d, state that at Rolla the Austrian Government compelled a Sardinian merchant vessel to hoist the Pontifical flag. At Pima, the harbor-master refused the steamer Havenot the papers necessary for departure, because it had hoisted the tri-color flag. The volunteers brought by Col. Medici, had been chosen with great care—amongst them were officers and engineers. It was reported that Garibaldi had held a council, at which it was determined to march on Fessano as soon as the plans were fully organized. It was thought the march would commence on the 28th of June. It was said that the Neapolitan Government determined to restore the two captured American vessels, had the American Ministers demanded reparation for the insult to the American flag. The King of Naples was ill.

One hundred more dead bodies had been discovered in the ruins of the houses in Palermo, which were destroyed by the bombardment. The damage occasioned by the bombardment was estimated by the journals at that place at £10,000,000 sterling. The Times correspondent writes that information had arrived confirming the departure of a band of brigands to assassinate Garibaldi. The information comes from such sources that it is impossible to doubt the truth of it.

GREAT BRITAIN.—The House of Lords had debated the slave trade question, and adopted a resolution in favor of the reappointment of a consulate at Mozambique, as a check to the slave trade. Notwithstanding the opposition of the Government, it was reported that the chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Gladstone, had determined to resign on account of the latest report adopted by the committee of the Commons on the Lord's rejection of the bill repealing the paper duty.

ROME.—General Lamoriciere is said to have issued an order of the day, announcing that the moment for marching against the enemy is approaching.

TURKEY.—Sanguinary disturbances had taken place in Albina. The Dragoman of the Austrian Consulate had been assassinated at Scutari. The army was exasperated at not having received its arrears of pay, and a military revolt was apprehended.—Fifteen hundred houses had been burnt in the Turkish quarter of Constantinople.

FRANCE.—Prince Jerome Bonoparte is dead. The Emperor Napoleon visits Savoy in July. Since the Emperor's return from Baden, the troops concentrated on the Eastern frontier of France have been withdrawn. It is reported that the new French loan will be £20,000,000 or £30,000,000 sterling.

AUSTRIA.—The Austrians were making vast military preparations in Venetia.

CHINA.—The China mail had been telegraphed. The steamer Malabar, having on board Lord Elgin and Baron Gros, was wrecked in the harbor of Gait. No lives were lost. Both Embassadors lost their credentials, and all their papers, and would be delayed at Gait until the 6th of June. Advices from Canton are to May 6th. The reply from the Chinese to the last communication of the British Minister, is to the effect that the Chinese are preparing to resist. The allies had occupied Chusan. Trade was improving at Canton.

NAPOLEON III AND PRUSSIA.—A pamphlet, by Edmond About, entitled, L'Empereur Napoleon III et la Prusse, has just appeared in France. The writer does not, as had been expected, demand the natural frontiers of France; he even protests very strongly against any such pretension. But he preaches to Germany union by means of sacrifices—that is to say, he calls on the petty Princes to unite under the Prussian flag. He, however, recommends that course subject to the condition that the Government of the Prince Regent shall adopt a policy in strict accord with that of the Emperor Napoleon to which he gives the greatest praise. The pamphlet terminates by a violent denunciation of Prussian bureaucratie.

The London Times, in one of its leading articles, says that the promised Neapolitan constitution comes too late. A letter, received from Palermo, says that Garibaldi's loss in the conflict of May the 27th and 28th amounted to upwards of nine hundred men. Gen. Garibaldi has ordered the demolition of Castellamare. The first division of revolutionary forces has been directed towards Syracuse. The municipality of Palermo has asked of Garibaldi for the immediate annexation of Sicily to the Kingdom of Italy. Garibaldi, in his answer, said he could not at the present time. Garibaldi is attempting to negotiate a loan at London of thirty millions of francs. A telegram from Rome states that Gen. Lamoriciere is making vast preparations, which indicate his expectation of making an attack shortly.

The King of Naples had given his consent to propose a liberal constitution, one of the conditions of which is an offensive and defensive alliance with Piedmont. The Ministry of Naples had sent in their resignation. The promulgation of the new constitution will take place during the month of July.

A Geneva journal says that Count Persigny and Lord John Russell have agreed to convoke a European Congress for the adjustment of the Savoy question.

AN ARCHBISHOP DEGRADED BY THE POPE.—The Archbishop of Florence, who chanted a mass in honor of the King of Sardinia, on the occasion of his recent visit to the annexed provinces of Italy, has been deprived of his office by the Pope, and cursed.

DEATH OF PRINCE JEROME BONAPARTE.—He was the last of the brothers of the Great Napoleon. Jerome was an indolent, good-natured voluptuary. His public life was a short one. He was a boy when Napoleon rose to power, and had scarcely reached adult age when he fell. From the age of twenty-one to thirty-one he shared his brother's prosperity, became admiral and commanded fleets, general and commanded divisions of the army, and king over a kingdom made expressly for him. After thirty-one, he was an easy, contented dependant on his wife's father, until the Bonaparte star rose again in the person of Louis Napoleon, who placed him in sinecure places of great prominence, and took his children, by the second marriage, to be the nearest to the throne of the imperial blood. Forty-five years of idleness and sensuality have elapsed since the kingdom of Westphalia passed away from him.

Jerome leaves three children—the elder is the Baltimore Jerome, the son of his marriage with the American Miss Patterson, born in 1805—a marriage which was annulled by the Imperial decree, but never with the sanction of the Church. The family meeting, which lately disallowed the title of this son to legitimacy in France, was doubtless held in anticipation that the decease of King Jerome might make it of particular importance.

The second wife of Jerome was the Wurtemburg princess, who affectionately adhered to him on his downfall, and for whose sake he obtained a shelter and support in Germany, when France expelled the whole line of the Bonaparte. Her surviving children are two—the elder is Princess Matilde, born in 1820; and married nearly twenty years ago to the Russian Prince Demidoff, but not living with her husband; the second is the Prince Napoleon, who was a red-republican under the republic, and is a thorough imperialist under the empire. For him, who is married to the Princess Clotilde, the Emperor, his cousin, was suspected of designing to rear an independent kingdom in Northern Italy, and to be not unwilling that he should have one in Sicily.

POLITICAL.

GENERAL JOSEPH LANE.—General Joe Lane, the candidate for Vice-President, was born in North Carolina, Dec. 14, 1801. In his fifteenth year he became a clerk in a mercantile house in Indiana. In 1821 he married, and settled as one of the Pioneers in Indiana. In 1832 he was chosen a member of the Legislature, serving in that capacity, with occasional intervals, until 1846. He supported General Jackson in 1824-'28-'32; Van Buren in 1836-40, and Polk in 1844. His course while in the State Legislature was marked by a devoted patriotism and a singleness of purpose to advance the prosperity of Indiana. He was most active in the arrangement by which the State was saved from bankruptcy, and her honor from the stain of repudiation. None but those who were residents of the State in that trying time can sufficiently estimate his valuable service on this important question. In the year 1846 he was a member of the State Senate, but resigned his seat when a call was made on Indiana to furnish volunteers for the Mexican war. He entered the army as a private, but in a few months afterwards was appointed Brigadier-General. He served with distinction during the war, and covered himself with honor. About August 1st, 1848, he reached Indiana, where a succession of public receptions were tendered him, but to which he had no time to respond, for on the 16th of August he was commissioned Governor of Oregon, without his solicitation, and reorganized the government; was elected delegate to Congress in 1851, and now is one of the United States Senators from the State of Oregon. In politics, Gen. Lane is a Democrat of the Jefferson and Jackson school, and is thoroughly acquainted with the history and politics of this country. His retentive memory and quick, active intellect, enable him to turn to immediate and effective uses the more important facts and incidents connected with our institutions. He is more a man of action than words—more practical than theoretical—and presents himself with a well-formed rather by a study of things than of their mere names.—N. O. Delta.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

The Picayune learns that the Rev. C. S. Hedges, of St. Luke's, in this city, received the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity, at the hands of the Faculty of the Masonic University, Lagrange, Ky., at the late commencement of that institution.

LABOR BEQUEST.—Wm. Euston, formerly a journeymen chairmaker in Philadelphia, but for many years a resident of Charleston, S.C., died suddenly recently, leaving an estate valued at $2,000,000. Being childless, he has left his wife a life interest in the estate, and one or two annuities to relatives. Upon the death of these parties the entire estate, excepting about $30,000, reverts to the city of Charleston, in trust for charitable purposes.

BIBLE SOCIETY IN CATAHOULA.—An organization has been effected at Trinity with the object of furnishing every family in Catahoula parish with a copy of the Bible. It embraces the leading men of the parish.

OLD-SCHOOL NEWSPAPERS.—The Presbyter, of Cincinnati, says the old-school have eleven weekly papers, located severally at Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago, Louisville, St. Louis, Memphis, New Orleans, Charleston, Richmond and Fayetteville. Besides these, we have, with the New-school Presbyterians, a partnership in the New York Observer, such as they have, with the United Synod, in the Christian Observer.

SHAKERS IN THE UNITED STATES.—There are four Shaker societies in Ohio, numbering 1,059; one in Connecticut, numbering 200; two in Maine, numbering 150; two in New Hampshire, numbering 300; four in Massachusetts, numbering 700; two in Kentucky, numbering 300; three in New York, numbering 1,050; making in all eighteen societies, each constituted of several distinct families or communities, regularly officiated with elders, deacons, care-takers, etc., of both male and female orders, according to their unique custom, and numbering in all some 4,600 members.

REMOVAL OF A THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—The World states that the Synod of the Waldensian Church has recently held an extraordinary meeting, at which it was unanimously resolved to transfer their Theological Seminary from La Tour, in their own country, to Florence. By taking this step they demonstrate their confidence in the stability of the Sardinian kingdom, and their determination to act on the aggressive.

CITY NEWS.

CITY POST OFFICE.—Mr. Blair, agent of the Post-office Department, arrived in the city on Friday, with an order to our Postmaster to deliver over to him the office. In the letter of the Postmaster General no reference is made to the causes and motives of the act. It is, however, generally believed that the removal, which anticipated by a few days the resignation of the Postmaster, has been produced by differences between our Postmaster and the Postmaster-General in regard to the accounts of the office—the Postmaster-General seeking to make the Postmaster responsible for drafts sent to him to collect which he has never been able to realize, and refusing to admit vouchers for like of clerks whom the Postmaster here has been compelled to employ in order to conduct the business of the office.

SUICIDE.—Mr. Edmond Armaud, a gentleman of one of the oldest families in Louisiana, committed suicide this morning, at 1 o'clock, at his residence, corner of Bourbon and St. Ann streets, by cutting his throat with a pocket knife. Mr. Armaud was a bachelor in affluent circumstances, of an amiable and sociable disposition, and had a great many friends. He had been suffering for some time past from ophthalmia, and was last testing his sight, with hardly any hopes of a cure. This made him very melancholy, and preyed on his mind; no other cause can be imagined for the fatal deed.

LADY NOEL BYRON.

When the only child of Sir Ralph and Lady Milbank was born it would have been considered a strange prophecy if any seer had told how that infant should be in character simply a good and true woman, without qualities or any remarkable intellectual qualities, without ambition or vanity, and yet that she should twice become an object of deep interest to the English people—her name on the tongues of millions, and her merits discussed, once with party heat, and again, after a lapse of more than forty years, with the warmth of well-grounded popular gratitude. Such, however, has been the lot of that quiet, beneficent, true-hearted Englishwoman, Lady Noel Byron. Her life began with sunshine; then it was shaken by a fearful storm, which clouded the rest of her life; but she, sitting in the shade, sent a multitude into the sunshine, and patiently wore away the last two-thirds of her life in making others happier than she could be herself.

While everybody assumes to know Lady Byron's history, none but her intimate friends seem to have any notion of her character. The chief reason of this is that Lord Byron gave forth two irreconcileable accounts of it; one when he first lost her, and another when it suited him to set up a case of incompatibility of temper. The long tract of time over which she has passed since his death would have settled the matter in all minds if Lady Byron had desired that it should. But she desired only quiet; and it is by her benefactions only that the chief part of her life has been recognized and will be remembered.

Her childhood was spent for the most part at Seaham, in Durham, where Sir Ralph Milbank's estate was situated. She preserved such love for the place, up to her latter years; that a pebble from its beach was an acceptable present to her. She was carefully scarce, and, for the time in which she lived, well educated. Mr. Moore and Lord Byron could have known but little of the education of girls at the opening of the century, and must have been bad judges of the minds and manners of sensible women, if they were sincere in their representations of Miss Milbank, as a blue, as a mathematical prude, and an Urth. Moore, who had no rigorous intellectual tastes, might have been sincere; and he no doubt was so in the plainness of his avowal that he "never liked her." Lord Byron knew better than he pretended. He knew that she was impulsive, affectionate, natural in her feelings and manners when he first offered to her; and none knew so well as he what she proved herself to be capable of under trial—how passionately she loved him, and how devoted she would have been, through good and evil report, if he had made her companionship possible. When he first offered to her, she was, in her girlishness, evidently taken by surprise. She refused him, but desired not to lose him as a friend. When he offered himself again she knew nothing (how should she?) of the profligate spirit in which the deed was done. Moore's account, in his "Life of Byron," of the way in which the second proposal was brought about, and the circumstances under which the letter was dispatched, was the first that most people knew about it. When that book came out, every one saw how wise and how good was the guidance which the injured woman had preserved. Her enemies were then convicted on their own confession. To say nothing of what the women of England felt, there was not a man with an honest heart in his breast who did not burn with indignation over the shameless narrative of how the trusting, admiring, and innocent girl whom the poet had wooed before, was now made sport of among profligate jesters, and deliberately proposed as a sacrifice to the base chances of the libertine's self-restraint.

What her father was about to permit his child to enter into such a marriage seems never to have been explained. The less his child knew of Byron's moral entanglements, the more vigilant should her father have been over her chances of domestic peace; and the mind generous as he was sure to be about the poverty of his lover, the more should her parent have taken care that she should not leave them for a home which was to be broken into by nine or ten executions in the first year. Never was a young creature led to the altar more truly as a sacrifice. She was rash, no doubt, but she loved him; and who was not, in the whole business, more rash than she? At the altar she did not know that she was a sacrifice; but before sunset that winter day she knew it. It is a judgment may be formed from her face and attitude of despair when she alighted from the carriage on the afternoon of her marriage-day. It was not the traces of tears which won the sympathy of the old butler who stood at the open door. The undergroom jumped out of the carriage and walked away. The bride alighted, and came up the steps alone, with a countenance and frame agonized and limpless with evident horror and despair. The old servant longed to offer his arm to the young lovely creature, as an assurance of sympathy and protection.—From this shock she certainly rallied, and soon. The pecuniary difficulties of her new home were exactly what a devoted girl of like hers was fitted to encounter. Her husband bore testimony, after the catastrophe, that a brighter belle, a more sympathising and agreeable companion, never blessed any man's home.—When he afterwards rallied her cold and mathematical, and over-prim, and so forth, it was when public opinion had gone against him, and when he discovered that her fidelity and mercy, her silence and magnanimity, might be relied on, so that he was at full liberty to make his part good, as far as she was concerned.

Silent she was, even to her own parents, whose feelings she magnanimously spared. She did not act rashly in leaving him, though she had been most rash in marrying him. As long as others called him insane, she was glad to do so too; and when she left him for her father's house she regarded him as mad.—When Dr. Baillie and other physicians whose opinions were asked (not by her) declared him sane, she still abstained from acting on her own impulses or judgment. As all the world knows, the case was submitted, in an anonymous form, to Dr. Lushington and Sir Samuel Romilly; and the unhesitating decision of these two great lawyers and good men was that the wife—whoever she might be—must never see her husband again. When they knew whose case it was, they never swerved from their first judgment, but declared that they would never shut our countenance Lady Byron's return to her husband. Under the circumstances, the general sympathy was with the wife, to whose wifely merits the husband had borne such strong testimony at his most unsteworthy moment, and who had herself preserved so complete a silence under the insult and contempt with which he afterwards endeavored to overwhelm her. If her attachment to him had been more superficial, or if she had been vain or egotistical, or weak, or timid, she would have said something—something which would have let the public into the privacy of her griefs, and have broken down, more or less, the sacred domestic enclosure. All that was said, however, was said by him; and if there was always just and generous people enough to remember that they had only Byron's story, and that Byron's stories were not apt to be over and above true, great was the disappointment at such people when there appeared in 1836, in the New Monthly Magazine, a sort of disclosure, offered in the name of Lady Byron.

The first anxious remark was that there was no real disclosure; and the whole affair had the appearance of a desire on the part of Lady Byron to exculpate herself, while yet no adequate information was given. Many who had regarded her with favor till then, gave her up, so far as to believe that feminine weakness had prevailed at last. But she, on this occasion, gave another proof of her strength. The whole business was one of poor Campbell's freaks. He excused himself by saying that it was a mistake of his—that he did not know who he was about when he published the paper, and so forth. Lady Byron's friends knew, all the while, that she had no concern whatever in the transaction. The world did not know it; she refused to recognize the world's interference in her affairs. She had made no explanations hitherto; and she made none now. She suffered, perhaps, as much as a weaker woman could have done; but she did not complain. Many years after she wrote to a friend who had been on less unjustifiably betrayed—"I am grieved for you, as regards the actual position. But it will come right. I was myself made to appear responsible for a publication by Campbell most unfairly, some years ago, so that if I had not imagination enough to enter into your case, experience would have taught me to do so." We are not disposed to countenance the taint of the time about liars being an age of materialism in comparison with others, but if any one case could bring us to such a conclusion, it would be this. All can honor the women, of any age, who have borne the racking of the limbs rather than speak the word which would release them; but few have fitly honored this long endurance, through forty years, of the racking of the tenderest feelings, rather than gain absolution by the simplest disclosure. The source of this strength was unquestionably her love for her husband. She knew him to the last with a love which it was not in his own power to destroy. She gloried in his fame; and she would not interfere between him and the public who adored him, any more than she would admit the public to judge between him and her. As we have said, her love endured to the last. It was her fortune which gave him the means of spending his mode of life abroad. He spent the utmost shilling of the property that the law gave him while he lived; and he left away from her every shilling that he could deprive her of by his will; and what the course of life was which he thus supported he himself has left on record. Yet, after all this, the interview she had with his servant after his death shows what a depth of passion lay concealed under the calm surface of her reserve. It will be remembered that when Byron knew himself to be dying he called to his man Fletcher, and desired him to "go to Lady Byron," and * * * Here his utterance became unintelligible, till he said "You will tell her this;" and Fletcher was obliged to reply, "I have not heard one syllable that you have been saying." "Good God!" exclaimed the dying man; but it was too late for more. Fletcher did "go to Lady Byron;" but, during the whole interview, she walked up and down the room, striving to stifle her sobs, and obtain power to ask the questions which were surging in her heart. She could not speak, and he was obliged to leave her.

Since that time there have been many who have believed and said that no one person in England was doing so much good as Lady Byron. It was not done, as her husband gave out, by attending charity balls, or dispensing soups and blankets and moralist sentiment. Among the multitude of ways in which she did good, the chief and the best was by instituting and encouraging popular education.

We hear at present (and glad we are to hear it) much about the teaching of "common things;" but, years before such a process was publicly discussed, Lady Byron's schools were turning the children of the poorest into agriculturists, artisans, sempstresses, and good poor men's wives. She spent her income (such as her husband left of it) in fostering every sound educational scheme, and every germ of noble science and useful art, as well as in easing solitary hearts, and making many a desert place cheerful with the secret streams of her bounty. There was a singular grace in the way in which she did these things. For one instance:—A lady, impoverished by hopeless sickness, preferred poverty with a clear conscience to a competency under some uncertainty about the perfect rectitude of the resource. Lady Byron, hearing of the case, wrote to an intermediate person to say that the poor lovable could never be a subject of pity, as the poverty was voluntary, but that it seemed hard that the sufferer's benevolent feelings should be limited; and she had, therefore, ventured to place at her call in a certain bank £100 for benevolent purposes; and, in order to avoid all risk of unpleasant remarks, she had made the money payable to this intermediate correspondent. This was her way of cheering the sick room; and the same spirit ran through all her transactions of beneficence.

No one could be more thoroughly liberal towards other people's persuasions, while duly valuing her own. No one could be further from pedantry, while eagerly and industriously inquiring after all new science and literature,—in order to learn, and by no means to display. When we say, as we truly may, that her life was devoted, after family claims, to the silent promotion of public morality (without the slightest mixture of cant or dogmatism), of science, of education, of human, and especially of domestic, happiness, wherever she could center her blessings, we may ask how a married woman's life could be better spent? and, perhaps, how many women so tried could so have spent their lives? What domestic life might and should have been to her, all must feel who saw her devotion to her daughter, not only in youth, but yet more in attendance on the slow dying of that one child, and even more still in her labors and sorrows for her grandchildren. It might have been said that she lived for them, if she had not at the same time been doing so much for the world beyond. Those who are gifted with insight and with a true heart might also see by other tokens what domestic life might and should have been to her. They might see it in the conscience, so worn, while so calm, steady, and thoughtful. They might see it in the wretched health which made her living from year to year a wonder even to her physicians; and in the restlessness which indisposed her to have a settled home, after the name of home had been so spoiled to her; and in the few and small peculiarities which told of strained affections and of irremediable loneliness in life. They might see it, too, in the love which she won and unconsciously commanded; and especially in the solace and the care which surrounded her in her decline, and the love and gratitude which watched by her pillow as her life ebbed away. This one child of a happy home grew up almost unconscious of anything beyond it. In her youth she found herself suddenly the subject of the world's conversation, if not of this interest of all England; and she could not but know, when dying, that, notwithstanding her love of privacy, and the steadfast silence of a long life, she would be mourned from end to end of the kingdom, and that her death would create a sensation wherever our language is spoken, and referred to with tenderness in all future time, when popular education, and the power of women to bless society with all gentle and quiet blessings, engage the attention of lovers of their kind.

She was born in 1792; married in January, 1814; returned to her father's house in 1810; and died on the 16th of May, 1860.

ARRIVAL OF THE GREAT EASTERN.

A brave, brave sight we had yesterday afternoon—the Great Eastern careering in from the ocean depths, with her six masts and hundred furnaces. Amazement seized every beholder. Had Bellingshoke himself been at hand he would have been fairly stunned out of his ad admirari, it was a veritable, legitimate sensation, and our reporters have done it no more than justice. The Great Eastern is a wonder. Nothing like it has ever before floated. Ordinary steamers and ships are like cock-boats by her side. We have given the figures of her huge dimensions, but these naked numerals convey but the vaguest idea. The immense steamships in the English and the American navy hardly equal half her length or breadth, and yet such vessels as the Himalaya, the Persia, the Adriatic, and the Niagara, have hitherto been regarded as absolute prodigies to marine architecture. Mrs. Malaprop to the contrary, "comparisons are" not always "odorous." This is an age of comparisons: Simple estimates, in these days, are out of the question; for while you are grasping one idea, you are required to put it side by side with another, and proximate which is the longest, the largest, or the heaviest. Yielding to this necessity of the times, we yet know of nothing that can stand comparison with Mr. Scott Russell's steamship except Noah's ark. But even Noah's ark could not match it. Let us see. The length of the ark was 300 cubits, its breadth 50 cubits, and its height 30 cubits. The scripture "cubit," as stated by Sir Isaac Newton, is twenty-five inches and about sixty-two hundredths. Bishop Watkins makes it somewhat more—nearly twenty-one inches and about sixty-eight hundredths. Reducing English feet, and calculating the tonnage after the old law, we have approximately the following table:—

	Noah's Ark, according to Sir I. Newton.	Noah's Ark, according to Bishop Watkins.	Great Eastern.
Length between perpendiculars,	515.02	547	680
Breadth,	85.94	91.16	83
Depth,	51.56	54.70	58
Keel, or length for tonnage,	464.08	492.31	630.02
Tonnage according to old law,	18,232	21,762	23,092

Noah's ark is quite overshadowed. Magnitude, however, is not the only peculiarity which the Great Eastern possesses. No other vessel afloat has two sets of engines and two propellers; nor is the cellular construction to be found entire elsewhere in naval architecture, though sometimes used at the top and bottom of its bridge structures.

Apart from the above mentioned peculiarities, this vessel embodies nothing novel. Her materials are put together in the form and manner usual to other ships constructed on the "wave principle."

But this "wave principle" claims a word of remark, for it and the builder of this ship are inseparably connected. About a quarter of a century since, the British Association of Science rightly conceived that its mechanical section might be worthily occupied in an inquiry concerning the form of ships, and the effect of force on their speed and steadiness. The inquiry was entrusted to the same Scott Russell who was the constructor of this vessel, and to an associate, Mr. (afterwards Sir John) Robinson. They commenced experiments, and reported year after year to the Association. In 1838 and 1839 they showed how a solid body, moving in the water, produced a particular kind of wave; how, at a certain velocity, the solid weight rode on the top of the wave without sinking into the hollow; how, if the external form of a vessel bore a certain resemblance to a section of this wave, the ship would encounter less resistance in the water than in any other form; and this originated the "wave principle," since then so widely talked of and so successfully applied. In 1841, the Committee presented a report of not fewer than twenty thousand experiments upon models and ships, some of which afforded remarkable confirmation of the efficiency of the "wave principle" in ship building. It is true, that, before the labors of this Committee commenced, the form dictated by the "wave principle" had been approached by some descriptions of vessels, both in this country and in England, but to these men is unquestionably due the credit of the first scientific demonstration. In this new principle is involved the fact, that the gre

BY FANNY SHELDON.

Chapter IX.

"Now feebly in the exhausted frame,
Slow, languid, quivering, burns the vital flame;
From the glazed eye-ball sheds its parting ray,
Dim, transient spark, that flattering fades away!
Faint beats the hovering pulse, the trembling heart;
Yet fond existence lingers ere she part!

It was a bright, unclouded morning in August. Alline was sitting in her darkened room, gloomy, wretched, and lonely, watching the pallid face, and short, quick breath of her dying mother. The large, wondering eyes of little Mary were fixed intently upon her, as she sat there waiting for the Minister and a few friends who had been sent for to pray with and administer the holy sacrament to her who had for long weary months and years struggled with illness and sorrow, but whose weary soul would now soon be borne to God by hovering angels who waited, perhaps impatiently, for the last breath that should release the immortal from the mortal part.

They had drawn near, and with prayer and praise had partaken of the precious emblems, when the solemn stillness was broken by the convulsive sobs of anguish which forced themselves upon the bosom of the usually calm, self-controlled Alline. As these deep sobs well up from her bosom she cannot force them back, for she feels that it is the last time she will ever kneel by the bedside of her mother; that never will she partake of the body and blood of her Savior with her again, until she shall divine it anew in that home above—

"Happy home on the eternal shore."

But for a moment only does she allow herself, to weep thus, for, as Edgar Glanville approaches her and in liquid harmonious tones of holy melody, breathed forth in song these words:

"When trouble like a stormy cloud,
Has gathered thick and thundered loud,
He near my soul has always stood;
His loving kindness oh, how good!"

she bade the flood of sorrow roll back to its accustomed channel of silence, and calmly turned to her mother, and clasped her thin, cold hand in her own, and in accents of suppressed emotion exclaimed,

"Mother, dear mother, is there aught you would say to me before I am left without your tender love and care?"

Mrs. Elwin's large, dreamy eyes fix in a long, loving glance on the face of her child, and these words fell with ineffable sweetness on the attentive ears of Alline: "My child, what has your mother left unsaid that she could now say to you? You have been a blessing and a comfort to me through many long, weary years; I mourn that I must leave you and my darling little one so lonely and forsaken, for, oh, I know your pathway will be strewn with thorns; that there are many alluring amusements, that there will be much to excite and attract your mind from holy purposes and pious thoughts through life; but, oh, my child, keep yourself pure in heart, and be earnest in devotion to your God,

And thy feeble steps will be upheld
That tread earthin lonely wild;
The Father of the fatherless
Will guard my darling child.'

Be to your little sister all that I have been to you; seek her happiness, and let her welfare be the first wish of your heart; remember, Alline, it is a holy trust, pray that you may be faithful."

"Mother, I will! She shall never suffer, if my exertion or care can shield her; her heart shall never know sorrow if mine can bear it for her; I shall never breathe a prayer but her happiness shall be first."

And sacredly through after years was this vow fulfilled.

Mrs. Elwin now turned her dying eyes to her husband in a long, wistful gaze, and murmured forth, "Farewell, farewell." With these parting words on her lip they thought her gone, but in a moment she revived, and with an expression of intense happiness and surprise, she exclaimed, "Oh! I see a bright crown held out for me."

And with these words, the heart that had throbbed so long, ceased to beat, and her spirit returned to God who had tried and exalted it in the fiery furnace of affliction.

Alline could scarcely realize that she was indeed gone, and exclaimed, "No, oh no! not dead! not dead! It can not be that I am all alone!" As soon as it was possible she was led from the chamber of death to her own room, and there in abandonment of grief, she threw herself upon her knees to implore health and strength to bear this, her heavy affliction, with calmness and resignation. She knew that new trials awaited her, and that there would be new duties for her to perform to her sister and father.—To them she must now turn every thought, and she determined for them to live, for them to hope and struggle on.

The remains of Mrs. Elwin were borne to the silent resting place of the dead, followed by many who had known and appreciated her in earlier, happier years; but by few who sympathized with the desolate Alline. The orphan girls returned to their silent home. Alline tried to engage in her household duties, but never before had she found it so difficult a task. She listened to the childish prattle until she became interested, and for some moments she was indeed beguiled from sad thoughts and dark misgivings. But she soon became again lost in meditation. Life, with its purposes and aims, was viewed calmly; its work and destiny, its affections and duties; and placing her little sister, who had fallen asleep by her side, on the bed, she sat down in that lonely room from which all that had made her home so dear had just been taken. She realized for the first time that she to whom she had ever looked for guidance and counsel was indeed gone forever. Her father was, there beloved and respected, but to him she had never accustomed herself to go for sympathy and support; and as he now sat with his face buried in his hands, his form bowed in grief, she felt that he needed comfort and help even more than herself, and she yearned to speak words of consolation to him. But all was so silent and strange that she could not break the spell which seemed to have settled upon every thing; there was the couch with its snowy covering, the vacant chair, and the books which had been read by her mother, and in which she had taken delight and found strength to help in time of trouble. Yes, everything was the same, but oh, how changed, how gloomy they now appeared. The shades of evening deepened; the moon gleamed out from dark clouds to be enveloped again by still blacker masses which moved on awfully majestic through the heavens, like the death pall of a doomed world. The few straggling beams which gleam in at the windows serve but to render the shadows still darker, and oh, how heavy falls this outward night upon Alline's heavy heart. But after waiting some time, hoping that the silent form before her would speak or move without her aid, she became alarmed, and shaking off with a powerful effort her mesmerism of grief, she arose and knelt by the side of her father. Gently she removed his hands from his face, as she said, "Father, father, look up, your child is here, you are not all alone; this mutual sorrow will bind us closer together; we will help each other bear it, and by faithfully performing our duties in this life, comfort ourselves with the assurance of a meeting time to come."

The grief-stricken parent passed his hand over the head of his child gently, in a soothing manner, as he murmured, "My good child, my noble Alline, I have been selfish in my sorrow, I have been scanning the backward way, and losing myself in the shadowy scenes and paths of the past. I have passed through all the varied events of my life from early manhood to the last sad parting, and how much I see that I might have done for her who is now past all human aid. But then it is, ever, that we know not the value of the jewel we possess till we have lost it."

"These regrets are vain, my father; all feel thus when deprived of loved ones, I have no doubt; for who of us ever do all that lies in our power to do; happy is that being who, in reviewing his or her life, sees no duty not performed, nothing remaining undone which might have been accomplished."

After thus cheering the aged man, she arose and lighted a fire upon the desolate hearth, brought a candle and prepared a cup of tea for her father. As the fire began to glow and sparkle, Mr. Elwin roused himself, and endeavored to shake off his grief, and to repay by at least a grateful look the kindness of his child. Days and weeks passed on, and Alline's grief settled into a holy calm, and though her mother was not there, her presence and holy example to linger around the home she had blessed by her example and christian excellence.

Chapter X.

"Speak kindly to the erring!
Then yet may'st lead them back,
With holy words and tears of love,
From misery's thorny track."

One night, a few weeks after the death of Mrs. Elwin, Alline was seated alone with her little sister, awaiting the appearance of her father. He was absent later than usual, and she had begun to be very anxious for him, for, since left alone, he had been more estranged from home and more neglectful than Alline had ever known him to be.—The pale face and attenuated form of his wife was ever before him when at home, and like many others he had sought to drown his grief and chase away his sorrow by mingling with those whose lives and presence were a disgrace to manhood. Alline had waited long, anxiously listening to the slightest sound that might indicate a coming step. One, two, and even three, the old time-piece had struck, and yet no step. She arose and laid her sister down and went to the window. The moon shone with her pale, mellow light around; all without looked dark, and it seemed that this silent brightness but served to render the shadows more gloomy and dark. Tears of sorrow coursed down her cheeks.

"Can it be possible," she exclaimed, "that my father can be so inconsiderate as to leave us here all alone the entire night. O, Father in heaven, forsake us not, watch over and protect us."

As she thus stood with her face pressed close against the pane, as if to cool her feverish, excited brain, she saw a form approach the gate and enter; he leaned against the post as if to steady himself, and then approached the door. Alline could scarcely believe her eyes; she had never seen her father under the influence of wine before. Her heart for the first time beat with fear. Instinctively she shrank away to her own room; she had left the door of his room open for him, and she now heard him as he groped his way to it and passed in. She thought of her little sister, her own youth and inexperience, and feared that she had not tried as she should have done to make him happy at home, and determined to be more mindful and attentive than she had ever been, that she might if possible win him to higher and better purposes. She sat long by the bedside of little Mary ere she retired for the night; one little arm of the child was thrown up above her head, and the other hung in repose over the side of the couch, the dark hair was thrown back from the clear, open brow, and the jetty lashes drooped downupon her rosy cheeks, her parted lips showed the pearly teeth within, and Alline, as she gazed with sad pleasure upon the beautiful sleeper, was struck by the resemblance which she bore to her sainted mother. A thrill of pain vibrated through her bosom as she saw that not only had the child inherited the beauty of her parent, but her frail constitution had also been transmitted to her, and with all a mother's tenderness in her heart she bowed her form and renewed her vow to God that her sister's happiness should be her first care through life, sought strength and comfort from on high, pardon for her erring parent, and forgiveness for her own past offences, and then sought to obtain rest before she began the duties of the day. Oh, how sweet must have been the repose of that motherless girl; angels watched while she slept, and the music of their tuneful harps breathed melody to her dreaming ears. At breakfast next morning Alline appeared pale, weary, and exhausted looking; while the heavy eyes of her father presented a sad contrast to the sparkling-faced and bright-eyed little Mary.

Alline had said but little. Mary seemed unusually talkative. "Papa," she said, after looking at him attentively for some time, "did you come home last night? Ally and I waited for you so long, I thought you would never come, and we were all alone! Nobody loves us now! Do you love us, Papa?" she asked.

Mr. Elwin seemed startled by this question. He looked up come what surprised, and said, after a pause, "Why, my daughter, do you think I do not love you and Ally?"

"I do not know, Papa, I thought if you did you would not leave us here at night, alone."

"Hush, Mary, papa will stay with us to-night, and we will make him so happy that he will not care to leave us again," said Alline.

"Were you lonely, my child," he asked, after some hesitation, looking intently at Alline. I was detained at the club longer than usual, last night, but I will stay with you to-night and all other nights. God helping me, I will endeavor to quit the wine-cup; to bid adieu to associations which are fast leading me to ruin. I will retrieve my life, yes, the past shall suffice to have wrought evil, I will henceforth serve God. Alline, I ever see the sad face and mournful eyes of your mother fixed upon me; as I seek the scenes of evil and sin. And, as I have held the wine-cup to my lips and heard the wild strain of riotous mirth echo around, I have seen the sorrowing face of your mother look out of its glittering depths, and tremblingly whisper a remonstrance, which I tried to heed, but could not; and in those moments how I have loathed myself for my want of moral courage."

"Begin not in your own strength, father; if you do, you will depend upon a broken reed. Seek strength from God. He alone can aid you and strengthen your good resolutions," said Alline.

Surely, her prayers had reached a throne of Grace.—Thus let us hope there had begun a work of reformation, and though it might be long in completing, it would yet stand forth a bright monument of the efficacy of prayer, and the abundant goodness of our Creator.

For two years had Alline suffered and prayed, cheered only by a few bright hopes which she scarcely ever dreamed of realizing, so often had disappointment been allotted her, and by a few transient gleams of sunlight which had ever faded away into a night of darker desolation. This dreary life was a trial to one whose heart, although disciplined by much sorrow, was naturally joyous and enthusiastic. Duty was her guiding principle, and had now become "the passion of her soul." These trying scenes had only strengthened her resolution and confirmed her patience. These had their reward, though it seemed long deferred.

RUSSIAN BIBLE.—A new translation of the Bible into the vernacular Russian has just appeared at St. Petersburg. The first part comprises the gospels of Mathew and Luke, translated from the original Greek.

METHODISM IN FRANCE.—The Methodists in France count at present, 152 chapels or places of worship; 29 ministers; 6 coiporters; 72 local preachers; 1446 members; 65 on trial; 203 teachers; 1891 pupils in the Sunday-schools.

A GREAT CHANGE IN FRANCE.—In France, the most prominent men of letters, hitherto nominally Catholic, and for the most part really infidel, are now advocating the historical, literary, missionary, and theological claims of Protestantism. Some of these writers, though brought up in the bosom of the Romish Church, avow fearlessly the superiority of Protestantism as a system of religious faith.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MRS. MARY SHORES, wife of Wm. R. Shores, and daughter of John Kilgore, was born in Hancock county, Georgia, January 1860; and died in Tallapoosa county, Ala., May 14th, 1860. No one had performed the duties of wife and mother more exemplarily than she did, and she had been altogether true and reliable as a neighbor. She had been a member of the Methodist Church for more than twenty years, and had lived an humble and devoted Christian. For several years her health had been infirm, and for some twelve months it had been declining very rapidly, and during most of that time she had suffered very much. Her disease was so complicated and depressing as to greatly affect her mind. But her sufferings have ended, and her redeemed spirit has gone, "where the wicked cease from troubling, and where the weary be at rest."

MRS. ELEERY MATTHEWS died at Port Gibson Miss. May, 1860. She was born in Northampton co., Va., in 1770. She was married to Wm. Frisby in 1791, and in 1806 emigrated to Mississippi Territory, and settled at Natchez. Her husband died in 1811. In 1818 she attached herself to the Baptist church. She was married to William Matthews in 1827, and in 1830 was again widowed. In 1831 she removed to Port Gibson, and for the sake of Christian fellowship, joined the Presbyterian Church, in the communion of which she continued until her death. Age and infirmity had rendered her helpless, and she had been confined to her bed for three years. In all her sufferings she was patient and trustful. She had given her life to God when health and strength were hers, and when these failed her confidence was unshaken. To the writer of this brief sketch, she said a little before her death, "I cannot but long, but I do not fear to die. I know that my sins are forgiven, and Jesus is my light, my truth, my way. I have suffered much, and if it is God's will I am content to suffer more. My trust is in him." Thus passed away a Christian mother, whose example was worthy to be followed.

MARY ANN BINION, wife of J. H. Binion, died May 30th, 1860, in Noxubee county, Miss., in hope of a glorious immortality; aged 44 years. The morning before she died she called together her family, and exhorted them separately to avoid sin, do all the good they could; bade them cheer up and not weep, for she was happy; embraced her husband, and bade their all adieu. One of her arms becoming cold, she said, (holding it up) Alin is death, and exclaimed, "O death, where is thy sting! O grave, where is thy victory!" Such is the death of the righteous. May her husband and children live the life of the righteous, and their last end be as hers.

Our little boy, JOHN Z. NICHOLSON, died on the 4th of June, 1860, aged 2 years, 5 months, and 21 days. Our little Jacky has left his home on earth and gone to his home in heaven. He has passed on before us, and fastened our hopes in heaven. We rejoice in the thought that we shall again live with him, in a country where there will be no sickness, sorrow, pain, or death. W. S. GEORGE O. OILMER, son of George N. and Caroline F. Oilmer, was born in Lowndes county, Ala., January 2d, 1851; and died June 20th, 1860. He was baptized by Samuel Armstrong in 1854. He was calm and rational till the last moment. A few moments before he expired he prayed, repeating the Lord's prayer with feeling, dwelling upon the part—"And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil." He has been called away from the evil to come.

MRS. MARGARET McDOWELL was born Dec. 23d, 1831 professed faith in Christ under the ministry of Rev. E. A. Flowers in 1853, and died at Mount Carmel, Wilkinson Co., Miss., June 3d, 1860.

JAMES S. McDOWELL, her husband, died June 18th. He was born in Amite Co., Miss.; was converted to God at Sharon, under the ministry of Rev. H. M. Youngblood in 1853. Aged about 33 years. He died calmly, hopefully, as a Christian.—Each of them, as we trust, in holy triumph.—Bro. M. was deeply exercised in mind several days; acknowledged that he had thought too much of this world, but that he was forgiven. He was so happy that he expressed even a willingness to give up his four children. The world is poorer than when these good people lived. Although acquiring riches, their alms as well as prayers "went up" largely. The poor of their neighborhood have lost their best friends. Bro. M.'s last words are said to have been most beautiful happy, eloquent. "The boat! the boat! There! there! now! now. Come aboard. See! she rounds to!" They both died well.

J. J. CLARK.

GEORGEANA AWLDS, wife of J. W. Awlds, and daughter of John and Rosetta Williams, was born in Thomas county, Ga., April 21st, 1837; embraced religion at a camp-meeting when about ten years of age, in Barbour county, Ala. She moved to this State with her parents; married on the 1st of January, '57; died at her home in Union Parish, La., on the 7th of May, 1860, leaving two little children to the care of others. Up to the day of her death she lived a faithful and devoted member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and died in full assurance of a glorious inheritance.

MICHAEL DICKINSON, my venerable uncle, died in great peace and heavenly tranquility in Auburn, Alabama, 21st May, 1860; in the eighty-fourth year of his age. He was born near the Tumbling Shoals, on Reedy River, South Carolina, December 28th, 1776. He was reared in perilous times, and had many hair-breadth escapes with his life, while quite young. He grew to manhood, amid toils and danger, with out iron constitution, and I question whether another man in a thousand can be found who has gone through the same amount of physical labor, and suffering, and lived as long as he did.—When he was about thirty-four years of age he professed religion and attached himself to the Baptist Church, and about the same time three of his brothers joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, and all became preachers, two of them died in the itinerant work, in the South Carolina Conference, viz: Charles and Thomas. The other, a local preacher, Willis, still lives.—The subject of this sketch "ran wild, for a time, but finally yielded to temptation, and went far astray, and for many years drank in iniquity like water. But through the instrumentality of the children, who became religious as they grew up to maturity, he was reclaimed and restored to the communion of the Baptist Church, where he remained a short time, and in 1847 connected himself with the Methodist, where his children had found refuge; and from that day seemed to dedicate himself afresh to God, and the work of his salvation. He loved the institutions of Methodism. He remarked to me, some years ago, when I visited him, in his peculiar way. "What a fool I was for not joining the Methodists" at first; why class-meetings and love feasts are the very thing! O, if I had only had their benefit I should never have sneksilidden." He lived to see his four sons, a grandson, and several nephews, all efficiently engaged in the work of the itinerant ministry of the Methodist Church, which was a source of great comfort to him in his old age. In his last days he seemed calmly staid upon God, had clear views of the atonement of salvation by faith in Christ, spoke with rapturous delight of meeting the dear loved ones who had preceded him to the "better land." He breathed his last in the arms of his youngest son Robert R., where he long had a comfortable home, which he has now exchanged for a home in heaven.

JAMES HAWKINS GALLION, was born May 23d, 1803, in Lexington Kentucky, removed to Louisiana in 1831, was married to Eliza June 28th, November 28th, 1833, and died April 15th, 1860. He joined the Church at the first Camp-meeting held at Bayou Wallace, now known as Pleasant Hill, in 1837; obtained pardon a short time after, at a meeting held on Bayou Samigal; lived in the enjoyment of religion for a number of years, prayed in his family; but, "the deceitfulness of riches and the cares of this world," caused him to deviate from the path of rectitude; but when he came to die, he prayed earnestly and fervently that he might be again reinstated in the favor of God. His prayers were answered, and he died shouting victory. He leaves a wife and four children to mourn his loss.

P. P. MATTHEWS.

LOUISA S. FOSTER, was born in Matthews county, Va., October 26th, 1805; in 1831, removed with her husband and two infant daughters to Lebanon, Ohio, where they resided about four years; and thence emigrated to Mississippi, where at Vardeen Depot, in Carrol county, May 22d, 1860, she gently closed her earthly pilgrimage. Much might be said of her many virtues, her uniform and consistent piety. Delighting in the services at the sanctuary and closet; she bore constant testimony that her life was hid with Christ in God; and her loved voice still lingers in our ears, when in the absence of her husband, she has so often gathered us around that family altar, and so earnestly and pleadingly commended us to the watchful care of that eye, which never slumbers or sleeps. For many years she had been severely afflicted. But now, my mother, thy sufferings are ended and we will strive to meet thee in that bright land where parting are o'er. M. W. G.

GEORGE M. WEATHERBY died on the 4th of June, 1860, in Holmes county, Miss., in the 70th year of his age. Brother Weatherby was born and raised in Georgia, but has resided many years in Mississippi. He was converted and joined the Church about forty years ago. Soon after he joined the Church he was appointed class-leader, and has been engaged in the service of the Church in that capacity nearly ever since. And a model class-leader he was; punctual to meet, and faithful to lead his class. The Church at Richland has sustained an irreparable loss in his death; perhaps we shall never see such a class-leader again. Brother Weatherby's piety was consistent and uniform, he lived a Christian and died a Saint. The affliction that preceded his death was long and painfully distressing, all of which he bore without a murmur. His family had all preceded him to glory except his companion, whom he left on a bed of death.

SISTER SARAH WEATHERBY, relict of George M. Weatherby, died on the 28th of June, 1860, in the 70th year of her age. Sister Weatherby was eleven days younger than her husband, and died sixteen days after him; thus their sojourn on earth was near the same, she only living five days more than he. She was converted at the same camp-meeting, and joined the church at the same time with her husband; thus they commenced life's journey near the same time, and commenced to run their christian race at the same camp-meeting. Sister Weatherby's piety was unobtrusive; she was so until to her temper, calm and quiet in spirit, with a character adorned by all the christian graces. She bore with christian patience and resignation the death of her husband, which took place while she lay on her own death bed.

Thus have passed away two servants of God, who lived together for near half a century, with an attachment and affection which is only less remarkable than their exemplary piety and zeal in the cause of religion.

J. WALTON.

JOHN WESTLEY, son of Major John G. Blackwell, died of consumption in Raleigh, Smith county, Miss., on the 15th June, 1860, aged sixteen years and eight months. He bore his affliction with Christian fortitude for about fifteen months. He was a generous and noble-hearted youth, devoted to the cause of religion; a dutiful son, and an affectionate brother. He was born in Raleigh, Miss., and was beloved by all that knew him. He leaves a father and mother, and several brothers and sisters, and many relatives and friends to mourn his loss. J. D. W. D.

REV. JOHN HAMPTON was born in Hancock Co., Ga. July 4th, 1809. Embracing religion early in life, he joined the Methodist Church. Was married to Miss Mary Dixon, Dec. 17th, 1835. In the winter of 1858 he settled in De Soto Parish, La. With wife and children about his bed he died at home, May 31st 1860. During the last ten years he was a Local Preacher. Soon after he came to this vicinity, he was employed by the Planters to preach to their servants. In this work he was earnest and faithful, and did great good. "I heard his last sermon: text, Mat. 3, xii: "I am not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." As a preacher he was not endowed with popular gifts; but in this sermon he had a gift more to be coveted, "an unction from the Holy One." He was peculiarly tried with darkness on his dying bed. He "was led into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil." In response to my inquiries, he said: "All is gone but my faith. Jesus is the Saviour, my Saviour—I cannot doubt Him." A few days before his death, I said, "Father, I shall not see you again. On to-morrow I shall see brother S. who was your preacher last year; have you a message?" "Yes, tell him: Meet me in Heaven!" Angels came and ministered unto him. Transports of joy beamed from his languid eye. And lifting his thin hands and waving them in holy triumph, he exclaimed: "Yes, tell all the world to meet me in Heaven!" H. F. ALEXANDER.

Pleasant Hill, La., June 30, 1860.

MRS. CYNTHIA ANN CARSTARPHEN, wife of Rev. Joel D. Carstarphen, of Newton county, Miss., and daughter of Mr. Brazeale, of Tuscaloosa county, Ala., was born July 1, 1810, and professed to be born of God in her 12th year, at Hickory Flat camp ground, in Green county, Ala., and died April 10, 1860. She was a devout Christian, manifesting a desire to do the whole will of God. The Bible was her constant companion, and the writings of Carvasso, over which she pored, while hungering and thirsting after righteousness. She firmly believed the doctrine of entire sanctification, and sought the Lord with her whole heart, till she was enabled to triumph, and praise God, "that the Blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin." In her death the Methodist Episcopal Church at Spring Hill has lost one of its beloved members, and her family an affectionate wife and mother. But our loss is her eternal gain. In the hour of death Christ was both near and precious to her soul, and made her dying bed feel soft.

JOHN FRANCIS, infant son of Francis W. and Belle R. Pike, died on Monday evening, June 25th. Farewell, darling, 'tis hard to give thee up, 'tis hard to part with our lovely babe; our blue-eyed boy; but the Lord gave thee, and the Lord hath taken thee away. We do not murmur, ah, no! but oh, father, help us to bow submissively to thy will.

PROGRESS OF PROTESTANTISM IN MISSISSIPPI AND THE SOUTH-WEST.—No. XXIII.

Mr. Editor—The truth of history requires that a prominent place be allotted Rev. Thomas Griffin, among the pioneer preachers of Mississippi and Louisiana, in connection with the Methodist Episcopal Church. Were I to indulge my feelings, my long acquaintance with, and changeless affection for him, would lead me to write much more than would be justifiable in a fugitive sketch for a weekly paper. I first enjoyed his singular, but powerful preaching, when a lad, and continued to be thrilled with his peculiar eloquence and pathos when I got to be a man of grey hairs. We had several preachers cotemporary with Thomas Griffin, whose manner and style of preaching was quite out of the modern course, among whom he was the most conspicuous. Whether the times developed their peculiar characteristics, or whether they were copying after some leading spirit, or whether they were providentially raised up to suit the then prevailing state of society, I am not at liberty to determine. He this as it may, the hero of my present sketch, was as celebrated for his attractive peculiarities, as he was for his personal piety and true evangelical zeal.

Thomas Griffin was of Welch extraction, and was the son of John Griffin and Mary, his wife, whose maiden name was Andrew, both Virginians. He was born in Cumberland county, Va., September 24th, 1787. About 1792 or 1793 his parents moved to Oglethorpe county, Georgia, where they reared their family on the frontiers of civilization, amid the perils of hostile Indians. His mother was a Baptist, and his father what he called "a Highland, or Dryfooted Baptist," one who stood on the bank, and pointing to the water said, "that is the right way," but took care never to go there himself. Thomas grew up to manhood familiar with the hardships, dangers, and rude manners of frontier life. He acknowledged himself to have been wild and wicked, and full of fun and frolic in his youth, but often the subject of deep religious impressions. His mother appears to have been a true christian, and more in earnest for the personal salvation of her children, than to have them outwardly connected with her own denomination. There was something in her soul that responded to the warm-hearted zeal and piety of the Methodists, so that she not only attended their meetings herself, but contrived to have her children with her as often as convenient. The result was that Thomas was awakened and converted through the instrumentality of the Methodist preachers, as many a poor heedless sinner has been.

Owing to the conflicting views of the Baptists and Methodists on certain points, he had some trouble in settling his religious creed, but after such an investigation of the matters at issue as his limited education, directed by an honest conscience, enabled him to make, he became a Methodist all over, inside and out. He had a short, but severe struggle about giving up the fashionable costume of the day, and donning the old-fashioned, round-breasted, colonial coat and vest, which were still adored to with great tenacity by the Methodists of those days. He however purchased the materials, and set off to the tailor's shop to have him a suit made that would indicate to all beholders his church relations. As he proceeded something seemed to whisper to his heart, "Tom, you're a fool!—going to have this piece of broadcloth spoiled by a fashion that you will be ashamed to wear, especially if you should backslide and want to leave the Methodists, as many have done before you." The conflict was hot in his mind as to the cut of his new coat when he entered the tailor's door. "So many new fashions these days, Mr. Griffin," said the tailor, "how will you have it cut, sir?" "Just so," responded Mr. Griffin, making a circular cut with the hand down his side in the shape of a schooner bottom. He said just there the devil gave him up on the subject of dress, and he continued to wear the round breasted coat to the close of life. Soon after his conversion he began to feel "inwardly moved by the Holy Ghost to preach the Gospel?" He tried to excuse himself from undertaking such a life long responsible work on the ground of his utter want, as he thought, of both moral and acquired abilities for the work, but still his awful voice sounded within, "woe is me if I preach not the Gospel." It soon became evident to the family that Tom, as he was usually called, had his heart set on becoming a Methodist itinerant preacher. "It won't do, my son," said his father, "the pay is too inadequate to the amount of sacrifice and labor required. The Methodist church is a bad paymaster. If you go, I shall expect you to find yourself one of these days among strangers, destitute of money and clothes, so that you will have to come back home for a supply."

But Thomas had now decided on the path of duty, as clearly indicated by what he believed was a divine call to the work of the ministry, and in 1810 he was duly admitted on trial in the South Carolina Conference, which then included Georgia. His first year he traveled Montgomery circuit, in North Carolina, as the junior of John Gaines well, having Jonathan Jackson for his Presiding Elder. In 1811 he was in charge of Brunswick circuit, in the south-eastern corner of North Carolina, with Aaron Mattox as his assistant. At the spring Conference for 1812, he was received into full connection, and ordained a Deacon, and with Lewis Hobbs and others, was transferred to the Mississippi District of the Western Conference, and appointed to Washita circuit. It is not necessary to mention all the circuits and districts he traveled in the vast territory west and east of the Mississippi river during his itinerant career. I would rather speak of the characteristics of this unique and laborious servant of the church. He found the population sparse, and the state of society exceedingly rude and disorganized in Louisiana during his four or five years term of service there, either as circuit preacher or Presiding Elder.

In addition to his many privations and toils, his purse was often light, and his wardrobe scant. While on Bielly Island, on one occasion, he began to think his father's prediction about his destitution of money and clothes was about to be realized. His purse was in a state of collapse, and the well-worn pants he had on was his last wearable pair. Considerably after nightfall he was threading his way along a dim path towards the hospitable residence of Micajah Pickett, jun., when his horse fell and deposited him among some brambles, which made sundry rents in his pants. He soon recovered his horse, and after a short search, regained the path, but was deeply mortified on discovering the condition of his apparel. Something seemed to upbraid him with, "just as your father told you, Tom! Here you are in these western wilds almost without either money or clothes; last pair of pants used up! You'll have to give it up at these rates, and go at something else, or go back home as your father invited you to do when you should realize the fulfilment of his prophecy." With these unpleasant foreboding thoughts, he plighted at brother Pickett's, and soon began to apologise for the unsightly appearance of his clothes, by relating the story of the brambles. "O, never mind that," interposed sister Pickett, "I have got a brand-new pair already made, and just wailing for you to come and get them." "Get thee behind me, Satan," ejaculated brother Griffin, as he received his new pants from the hands of the kind donor, "thou art the father of lies. After all thy suggestions about my destitution, here I have a new pair of first rate pants."

Brother Griffin was a man of sallow complexion; square-built, rather stoop shouldered; muscular and active, with a sharp face and quizzical eye, that would attract observation in any company. He was remarkable for his ready wit and withering sarcasm. His strong point in preaching was his life-like delineations of every phase of character, which sometimes led strangers to suppose that he had, in some way, got their history, and was making attacks on them from the pulpit. He generally painted the vices of any community to life-like colors, and lifted up his thundering voice in denunciation against them. One or two anecdotes will illustrate how this was done in Louisiana. In South-western Louisiana stock raising entered largely into the products of the country in those days, and was a fruitful source of neighborhood feuds, as some men were very much inclined to appropriate other men's stock to their own use. When Brother Griffin was on the Louisiana District he had a quarterly meeting somewhere about the Vermillion Bay. It was very common in those days to have two sermons preached at eleven and twelve o'clock on the Sabbath. The preacher on the circuit preached the opening sermon that day, which he delivered in a precise and logical style, accompanied with but little feeling. When he closed, brother Griffin rose up, and with one of those ominous looks which made the audience feel that he was going to do something, without affording any clue as to what it would be, he commenced by saying, "My hearers, the brother who has just closed preached you an elegant sermon, but my belief is he overshot you. I intend to come down to your capacity, and give you a batch of new-fangled divinity; something that you can understand." After this introduction he took up the prevailing vices of the country, and delineated them in all their moral deformity and damning tendencies. Among others he paid special attention to the too common practice of branding other people's cattle, and supplying their families with pork from their neighbor's hogs. He gave a very graphic description of the process of hog-stealing: how the hog was captured, his ears taken off and thrown to a hungry dog, and the hair singed off with prairie grass, in order to destroy all the flesh marks, to prevent detection, &c. The audience became intensely interested, all eyes were fixed on the preacher, and all ears were attentive, as picture after picture, drawn from living examples, passed in rapid succession before the mind. One man became so interested that he unconsciously drew himself forward until he suddenly dropped to the floor in front of his seat. "Curious gospel that," said one, after the sermon was over. "Let us try and keep that preacher here," said another. "I'll give fifty dollars a year to keep him here to save my stock."

At one of his preaching places in Catahoula parish, a pedagogue, who had avowed himself a Deist, was pretending to "teach the young idea how to shoot," when brother Griffin came there with his "new sharp thrashing instrument, having teeth," and preached one of his raking sermons, taking as one of his positions that "Deism and licentiousness generally roomed together in the same heart." The school-teacher pretended to be greatly offended; declared that Griffin was too rude and unpolished to preach to intelligent and refined people, and swore if ever he attempted it there again he would give him a thrashing. Some one apprised Griffin of the threat, to which he replied, "I never judge a man's character by the clothes he wears, nor by what he represents himself to be; if I wish to know just what he is, I take the back track, and hunt up his antecedents, and all I wish now is to be put on the back track of this disciple of Tom Paine, so that I can find out where he is from, and what he has been doing heretofore." Fortunately for his purpose he got a correct outline of his history by his next appointment, and appropriated a part of his discourse to the subject. "My respected hearers," said he, "when last I was here I took as one of my positions, that Deism and licentiousness generally roomed together in the same heart. I now propose to give you one representative example to illustrate that position. There lived, not many years ago, in one of the Districts of South Carolina a professed disciple of Tom Paine, who was arraigned by due course of law before the tribunal of his country, not for saying prayers or building churches, but for shedding blood! Yes, my hearers, for shedding blood! Not the blood of his fellowmen, but the blood of his neighbor's hogs! Of this offence, committed without the fear of God before his eyes, and by the instigation of the devil, against the peace of society, and the lives of hogs not his own, he was found guilty and sentenced to thirty-nine lashes on his bare back at the District whipping post. After receiving the Sheriff's receipt in full, in the way of knots, gashes, and cross marks, and having now the fear of hog-heads before his eyes, he left the country 'for parts unknown.' The next place we find him is in that celebrated school of learning generally known as Natchez Under-the-hill, where he spent about three months in the study of natural philosophy. He prosecuted his studies with such untiring devotion that he soon exhausted his cash and credit, so that he was ejected from the boarding and lodging department for non-payment of dues. Possessing some little versatility of mind he assumed the profession of a school-teacher, and the last I knew of him he was pretending to teach a little country school in one of the parishes not far to the west of Natchez, and threatening to whip a certain Methodist preacher for exposing the licentious tendencies of Deism."

The school teacher, no doubt, from fear of provoking a personal application of the illustrative part of the discourse, assumed great gravity, and after the service was over, remarked in some who had heard his threat, that "Mr. Griffin improved on acquaintance, and he reckoned it was best to have a few such preachers in the country, so he would not interrupt him."

It will be difficult for those who never heard his scathing denunciation of vice to appreciate the power with which he spoke. If he was led to describe the deceiver and seducer, he was "a whitewashed, hollow-hearted, hypocritical, double-faced monster of iniquity, with a heart as black as night." If he attempted to show up the self-conceited and presumptuous sinner, he was "one of your real gospel sighting, heaven-neglecting, God-provoking, devil-daring, hell-deserving rebels against the Majesty of the universe." The drunkard in his estimation "was far worse than the frantic suicide who would take a pistol and blow out his brains, thus ridding his family at a pest, and leaving his property for their maintenance; whereas the drunkard, after carsing and disgracing his family with his besotted example, afflicting them with his drunken revels, wasting his property, breaking the heart of his wife, and hanging his poor ragged, uneducated children on the horns of poverty, is in the end also a self-murderer." If the superannuated debauchee was held up in order to show that "the way of transgressors is hard," he was considered as "the very frazzle-ends of humanity; his debauched carcass would disgrace a wolf-trap, if put in it for bait; if he should die by the wayside, a decent turkey-buzzard would consult the dignity of his beak before he would condescend to pick out his blood-shot eyes; if hell itself could be raked over, it is doubtful whether a more deeply-fallen spirit could be found." These examples will suffice for the present.

Another striking characteristic of brother Griffin was a natural, unstudied flow of the most unbearable wit that ever fell from the lips of man. He never manifested any feeling of levity in the pulpit himself, he was rather remarkable for his solemn, grave, and earnest countenance when preaching, yet his transitions from the pathetic to the ludicrous were often so sudden and unexpected, that you would be hurled from the center of gravity into a paroxysm of laughter in spite of all your efforts to the contrary. He was full of sympathy, and often preached with such pathos that his vast audiences were moved from center to circumference. O, it was a luxury to sit unobserved at night on a camp-meeting occasion, when he would preach one of his original sermons, where one might laugh and weep alternately for an hour without restraint. People would sometimes pretend to be greatly offended at his plain dealing with their delinquencies and sins, but still he had so many points of attraction about him, that vast crowds from all the region round about would flock to hear him, and no man of his day made his mark deeper on the public mind than he did.

I will defer other points in the history of this truly unique, but good and great man, to my next number.

J. B. Jones.

ETTIE EVANS; OR, THE BLIND BLACKSMITH.

BY LETHA FONTELLE.

"How excellent is woman when she gives
To the fine impulses of her spirit way;
Her virtues blossom daily, and pour out
A fragrance upon all who in her path
Have a blest fellowship." —Willis.

It was a dark night in December. Leaden clouds veiled the pure azure behind them, and only here and there, looped up, disclosed the pitying eye of some fair star.—Peering into the darkness, you might have seen an old man, half blind, tottering through the streets of a country village, and pausing ever and anon to adjust in his pocket the bottle which his unsteady pace endangered, and to curse the wayward boys that followed him with gibes and flying stones. They had caught sight of the bottle as he emerged from the low grocery, and to annoy him, aimed at his dearly purchased treasure. As the old man screened it in his arms, and poured forth a volley of oaths at what he imagined the unevenness of the street, the boys, already reckless, became wild with excitement, and redoubling their raillery, hurled their flinty weapons in quick succession. Their victim bore up bravely until a violent blow caused him to groan with agony, and rushing into the nearest shop he sank down exhausted. The men present hastening to his assistance, found the blood streaming from his face, and carefully removing it, discovered in horror that one of his eyes was cut open! The poor man was taken home and a physician called, but the lost sight could not be restored.

The remaining one had been seriously injured by a scale of hot iron, and pow, affected by the inflammation of the other, ceased to afford even its former feeble aid. The poor blacksmith was wholly blind!

Let us look in upon him after the first tumult is over, and the throng which had gathered there, partly from curiosity, partly from sympathy with this afflicted family, has dispersed. On a low bed, in one corner of a dimly lighted room, lies the wretched inebriate. He has been completely sobered by pain, and lies now more quietly, as if half asleep under the influence of an opiate. Beside him sits his weeping wife, striving in vain to be calm, with the keen sense of this added affliction. Through her sad tears, and through the veil of long and hopeless grief, you can discern bright traces of her early beauty, and on her pale lip lingers still the sweet expression which characterized her girlhood.

But while his eyes are closed forever to the light of day, they seem newly opening to the varied visions passing before him. A manly youth appears, and leading on his arm a maiden in the first blush of beauteous womanhood. The old man, enchanted, feels no pain, and the tumult of the last three hours fades from his mind. He sees the lips of the young man move, and leaning forward listens intently. Rapturous expressions eloquently uttered in the glowing language of the heart, which the blind man recalls at once, though for years unspoken, unremembered, fall on his ear like forgotten melodies. As a stream, which long pent up, gathers fresh power by confinement, and at length with one mighty effort bursts every barrier, and rushes forth impetuously, but in so deep a channel, that after the first moment, the rich music of its waters serves only to entrance the timid gazelle on its banks, the impassioned youth pours forth his tale of love; and deep, and low, and rapid as the tone was, the listener heard it all. His heart was filled with rapture as he caught the first timid avowal of the maiden's answering affection, and bowing his head, he was silent with his new happiness. The full moon rose as they plighted their warm vows, but quickly passed behind a cloud, dark as the one which had enveloped his later years. A mingled sense of the beautiful early past, and the gloomy present, half charmed, half overwhelmed him, and as the noble youth pressed the fair hand he now could call his own, he half awakened from his reverie, and feeling a soft touch upon his fevered brow, he opened his arms and breathed one word—"Mary!" He clasped his broken-spirited wife to his bosom, and they wept in each other's arms with something of that early feeling which oppression and neglect had stifled, not destroyed. When the first outpouring of the heart's anguish and awakened tenderness had passed, and the repentant husband had sought and obtained full forgiveness of his much wronged wife, she raised her grey head from the bosom that had once so proudly plumed it, and wiped the tears and blood from his wrinkled face, while her own eyes filled anew as she gazed on the sightless orbs which could behold her no more.

Leaning against the wall at the foot of the bed, and gazing on the pair, was their son, a frank, noble-hearted young man. He had contributed largely to the support of the family, and by his industry and perseverance, became well skilled in his father's handy occupation. Having long been attached to the active, rosy-cheeked daughter of a neighboring farmer, his opening prospects had led him to hope that he might soon be able to claim her hand. But he must toil on with the bitter feeling of hope deferred in the performance of his added duties—You could read the resolution in his pale, compressed lip, and firm figure suddenly drawn up to its full height. But the decision made, he yielded again to sadness.

But who is that sweet girl with the figure and expression of a Psyche, and a step so light that it would not startle a fawn or crush a trailing Arbutus? Now she bends over the poor blind man, almost wild with his double agony; calms him by her late like voice; cools his fevered brow by the soft pressure of her hand, and bathes his sightless eyes while the tears gush silently from her own. Now, she lays her bright young head on the bosom of his almost heart-broken wife; twines her white arms around her neck; soothes her by tender caresses; encourages by her beautiful faith in God; and kisses the tears from her pale cheeks, until the poor woman smiles with awakened hope on the gentle being who thinks not of herself, but presses back the tears from her full eyes and stills the beating of the heart that she may remove the weight from another's. Now, she leaves them both a moment, runs to the young man and whispers something in his ear. A warm light fills his eye, and an eloquent smile irradiates his face. He presses the fair girl to his heart with whispered blessings. The old man groans; she is again beside him, and soothes him by her gentle words, until he forgets his pain, forgets his hopeless condition, and only mourns that he can no longer behold his darling Ettie.

His Ettie! Can that sweet child with a graceful form that a sylph might envy, a classic head and face of perfect beauty that a thought might dimple over with smiles, or subdue to the quiet expression of a Madonna; she, with the shade of intellect on her pure brow and the fire of genius in her bright eyes; she the child of that old man? It is even so. A mere child, with wisdom on her lip and all the graces in her heart! The daughter of a poor blacksmith, with the stamp of superior intellect on her brow, and the grace and beauty of a Psyche! Is it then so wonderful?

Have you never seen the scion of a gnarled oak in the wide forest, growing in its young life in the deep shade of the old parent oak, and scarcely growing, giving no promise that it would not be the image of the prototype from which it sprung, but rather that the increased gloom and narrowed space would cause it to expand yet more awry? Have you not seen such a one, after the woodman's axe had thinned the neighboring forest, and loosened the soil about its roots, lift up its head in gladness towards the skies and spread its arms in the warm sun and the pure air, growing in beauty?

Would you like the key to this anomaly? It is a very simple one, though of choice material: The improved Public School, and a pious, refined teacher in the Sunday School.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL CELEBRATION AT CLINTON.

Mr. Editor: For the last two or three years, in the summer, the different Sabbath schools of our town have united in a celebration, and accordingly we had one on Saturday. At nine o'clock, the scholars and teachers of the Institute, and the Baptist, Methodist, and Episcopalian schools, met at the Methodist Church, and forming a procession, marched to the Silliman Institute Grove, headed by a fine band of music. The Institute Grove is a beautiful one, and has an almost impenetrable shade. There was a stand erected for the speakers, and seats in front for the congregation. The exercises were opened by an appropriate hymn, sung by the scholars. This was followed by an address from R. J. Bowman, Esq., a lawyer of this place, and the superintendent of the Methodist school. His subject was, "The Bible," and his speech was justly admired by all. About a dozen of the boys and several of the girls next spoke, and all did themselves credit. Rev. Sereno Taylor, an aged and loved Baptist clergyman, then gave us an excellent address on education. We then went to a good dinner, which had been prepared by the citizens of the place.—After dinner all left but the young folks, who remained and played different games until late in the evening, when all returned home, hoping to attend many more such pleasant celebrations, and feeling thankful for the blessing of Sunday-schools, and those which it brings with it. DEATH OF JEROME BONAPARTE—THE ACTS OF HIS LIFE.

The Death of Jerome Bonaparte, Ex-King of Westphalia—The American Branch of Bonapartes—Their Claim to Legitimacy—Visits of the Bonaparte Family to America, etc., etc.

We learn by the Panoa of the death of Prince Jerome Bonaparte, ex-King of Westphalia, uncle of the Emperor of the French, and the last of the brothers of the great Napoleon.

Jerome Bonaparte was the last and youngest brother of the Great Napoleon First, and the only remaining member of his parents, Charles and Letitia Bonaparte.

Jerome was born at Ajaccio on the 15th of December, 1784, and at the time of his decease was consequently seventy-six years old. Like all Frenchmen who participated in the stirring events of his time, his life was full of vicissitudes. At an early age, during the Italian campaign of his brother Napoleon, he was placed with his sister Caroline at the educational institution of Madame Campan, in Paris, from which he was transferred to the College of Juilly, where he continued his studies until Napoleon was placed at the head of the Consular Government. Before he had completed his fifteenth year he was put into the navy, where it was the ambition of the First Consul to give him an opportunity to win distinction and place himself at the head of the French navy. In 1801, at the age of eighteen, he received command of the corvette L'Epervier, and was ordered to join the expedition commanded by his brother-in-law, General Leclere, which Napoleon was about dispatching to St. Domingo, then in a state of servile insurrection, the negroes being commanded by the famous Toussaint l'Ouverture. Soon after his arrival at St. Domingo, however, General Leclere sent him back with confidential dispatches for the First Consul, announcing the successful landing of the expedition and the capture of Cape Francois, and he soon afterwards returned with troops. The result of the expedition is well known to the reader of French history. It cost the life of the brave General Leclere, and proved, on the whole, disastrous.

About this time, while at Brest, he gave himself up to indulgences common to seafaring youth, and Napoleon himself replied as follows to a letter addressed by Jerome to one of his friends, in which an interesting account was given of his adventures on shore: "I have seen your letter, M. l'Enseigne de Vaisseau, and am waiting with impatience to hear that you are on board your ship, studying a profession intended to be the scene of your glory. Die young, if you ever intend to disgrace your name; for if you live to sixty without having served your country, you had better not have been born." Soon after the receipt of this letter he sailed for Martinique, and resided for a while with the mother of the Empress Josephine.

Towards the end of the year 1802, hostilities having recommenced between France and England, and Jerome having cruised about for several months on our Southern coast in the hope of meeting an opportunity to distinguish himself, finally put into New York, to escape the fate of many of his brother officers who had been taken prisoners, as the English had sent out such a superior naval force that it was useless to contend against them. Here he found that the fame of his brother had already preceded him, and wherever he appeared he was greeted with the most flattering attentions. All Americans at that time likewise felt an interest in the fortunes of France, which had so recently rendered such effective service in our struggle for independence, and in this metropolis, as well as in Philadelphia and Baltimore, he mingled in the best society.

In 1803, on the 24th of December, being then in his twentieth year, he was married, after a short courtship, to Miss Elizabeth Patterson, a young lady of Baltimore. The marriage ceremony was performed by the Rt. Rev. John Carroll, Bishop of Baltimore, and brother of Carles Carroll, of Carrollton, the last signer of the Declaration of Independence—agreeably to the rites of the Roman Catholic Church and the laws of the United States. The ceremony was preceded by a marriage contract drawn up by Mr. Dallas, afterwards Secretary of the Treasury, and witnessed by M. Sotin, Commissary of Commercial Relations of the French Republic, and Alexander Camus, afterwards Minister of Foreign affairs of Jerome's kingdom of Westphalia, John Comegys, and the Mayor of the city of Baltimore. Miss Patterson, his wife, was born of a Scotch family in the North of Ireland.

She was reputed to be an exceedingly beautiful and accomplished lady, and fully worthy of the most illustrious nuptials, and it is believed that the attachment was both mutual and ardent. For more than a year the young couple remained in this country, visiting objects of interest, and in the spring of 1805 they embarked for Europe in the American ship Erin.

During the voyage the ship narrowly escaped capture by several English cruisers, and finally arrived at the port of Lisbon, whence Jerome, in his anxiety to apprise the Emperor personally of the circumstances of the marriage, took post horses and proceeded with all speed to Paris. Here a terrible reception awaited him, for he learned upon his arrival that his marriage had been annulled, and despite all efforts to the contrary that his brother remained inexorable. Meanwhile, the Erin, on board of which the young wife remained, being in feeble health, sailed for Amsterdam, where Jerome had agreed to join her, and from there take her to France.—But upon arriving at Texel, the captain of the vessel received a formal and peremptory command to depart, the Emperor having ordered that the wife of Jerome should not land.

She accordingly sailed for England, where she took up her residence, and in the following month, on the 7th of July, 1805, gave birth to a son, the present Jerome Napoleon Bonaparte, a resident of Baltimore. Jerome subsequently brought all his influence to bear to appease the anger of his brother, but his endeavors were fruitless, and Napoleon would not even allow his wife to visit Paris.

In March, 1805, the Emperor caused his Council of State to enact a special decree "forbidding all civil officers of the Empire to receive on their registers a transcript of the act of celebration of a pretended marriage contracted by Jerome Bonaparte in a foreign country."

In the following May, the Emperor, in a letter to Pius VII, requested him to grant a bull annulling the marriage. The following is an extract: "I have frequently spoken to your Holiness of a young brother, nineteen years of age, whom I sent in a frigate to America, and who, after a sojourn of a month, although a minor, married a Protestant, the daughter of a merchant of the United States. He has just returned. He is fully conscious of his fault. I have sent back to America Miss Patterson, who calls herself his wife. By our laws the marriage is null. A Spanish priest so far forgot his duties as to pronounce the benediction. I desire from your Holiness a bull annulling the marriage. I could easily have this marriage broken in Paris, since the Gallican Church pronounces such marriages null.

"But it appears better to me to have it done in Rome on account of the example to sovereign families marrying Protestants. It is important for France that there should not be a Protestant young woman so near my person. It is dangerous that a minor and distinguished youth should be exposed to such seduction against the civil laws and all sorts of propriety." This letter contained many misrepresentations, to which it is here unnecessary to allude, but it failed to effect the desired object. In a long reply, covering the whole subject, the Pope showed that there was no authority vested in him, nor could any precedent be found in the history of the Church, for dissolving the marriage, and, like an honest man, Pius VII came to the conclusion that he neither could nor would annul the marriage between Jerome Bonaparte and Elizabeth Patterson.

Finding that to persist in his opposition to the will of the Emperor would defeat his object and only offer him a life of exile, Jerome accepted a mission to the Emperor of Algiers to demand the restoration of Genoese sailors and citizens who had been captured and carried into slavery. This embassy he filled with ability, returning from the expedition with two hundred and fifty captives whom he set free upon their native soil. Early in the ensuing winter he took command of a line of battle ship, went to the West Indies, captured six English merchantmen, on his way home was chased by an English fleet, and to escape capture, stranded his ship on the coast of Brittany. Reaching Paris he was decorated with the Cordon of Legion of Honor, promoted to the rank of Admiral and created a Prince of the empire.—Jerome, however, was not at heart a sailor, and soon after, at his own solicitation, was placed at the head of a column of soldiers of Bavaria and Wurtemberg, in the reduction of the fortresses of Silesia and directing the blockade of Glogau. In March, 1807, for the ability he here displayed, he was promoted to the rank of a General of Division in the Grande Armee.

Up to this time, it is said, the Prince had kept up a constant correspondence with his wife, and entertained the hope of being able to claim her in a legal way; but being finally assured that the American marriage would never be recognized, he yielded at last to the imperial policy of Napoleon, and to use his own language, immolated himself upon the altar of the Napoleon dynasty.—Accordingly, on the 12th of August, 1807, he married the Princess Frederica Catherina, daughter of the King of Wurtemburg, and a few days afterwards, in the twenty-second year of his age, he was proclaimed King of Westphalia. Though boyish in many of his actions, and indulging in frivolities unbecoming a king, such as playing at leap-frog with his courtiers, and other equally undignified feats, his court was never disgraced by immoralities unbecoming a man.

In 1812 he was called by the Emperor to join him in his expedition to Russia, in which he commanded the German division. He was in the battle of Mittlbun, and achieved a handsome success, but at Smolenski was unfortunate, and in a freak of passion was dismissed by the Emperor. Napoleon, however, regretted it afterwards.

In 1813, when the French were compelled to evacuate Germany, Jerome was obliged to fly before the march of the Russian and Saxon troops, and with his staff retreated to Cublentz. The Cossacks, however, did not remain long in his capital, and Jerome soon returned. On the 25th of October he received the tidings of the battle of Leipsic, and that evening he left Cassel for the last time, supported by his body guards. He remained several days at Cologne, but was at last compelled to separate from his devoted followers, and fled to France.

During those vicissitudes his wife, the Princess Frederica, was his constant companion. In 1814, on the abdication of the Emperor, they were compelled to leave Paris, and took refuge in Trieste, where they were at the time Napoleon landed from Elba.

Here they embarked for France on a frigate provided by Murat, then King of Naples, and at the meeting of the Champ de Mai, he took his seat in the Chamber of Peers. The battle of Waterloo was near at hand, and Napoleon was straining every nerve to bring into the field his immense army. Relying on the discretion of Jerome, he confided to him the important work of opening that last great battle, which he did in a charge at the head of 6000 men. Everybody knows the rest.—Napoleon's empire was swept to the four winds. Jerome listened to Paris, assumed a disguise, and, by permission of his father-in-law, joined his wife at Wurtemberg. The King granted him the castle of Elvengen for a residence, on condition that he should never leave it and keep no French in his service; but his restrictions were so irksome that he finally obtained leave to withdraw and settle in the Austrian empire. He purchased a magnificent chateau near Vienna and a mansion in Trieste, between which places his time was generally divided, though he subsequently often visited other parts of Europe where his family resided.

The resolution of 1848 put an end to those difficulties. The proscrits of 1815 re-entered upon their rights, and the star of the Napoleonic dynasty rose high again above the political horizon. The Prince, Louis Napoleon, elected by the French people, was placed in the Presidency of the second Republic. He named the former King of Westphalia a Marshal of France and Governor of the Invalides. The Presidency of the Senate was also conferred upon him, and when the Constitution of the Empire was promulgated, his rank in the Imperial family became next to that of the Emperor, and up to the time of his death he was the heir apparent to the throne, in the event of the death of the Prince Imperial. By the death of the Prince Jerome, his son, the Prince Napoleon, becomes, in case of the death of the Prince Imperial, the heir to the throne of France.

Prince Jerome, in person, was tall, and much slimmer than the first Napoleon, whom, however, in countenance, he very much resembled—without, however, possessing many of the remarkable intellectual characteristics of the first Emperor. For several years past he has resided, when in Paris, at the Palais Royal.

ACCEPTANCE OF HON. JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE.

Washington, July 6, 1860.

Dear Sir—I have your letter of the 23 ult., by which I am officially informed of my nomination for the office of President of the United States, by the Democratic National Convention lately assembled at Baltimore.

The circumstances of this nomination will justify me in referring to its personal aspect.

I have not sought, nor desired to be placed before the country for the office of President. When my name was presented to the Convention at Charleston it was withdrawn by a friend, in obedience to my expressed wishes. My views had not changed when the Convention re-assembled at Baltimore, and when I heard of the differences which occured there, my indisposition to be connected prominently with its canvass was confirmed, and expressed to many friends.

Without discussing the occurrences which preceded the nominations, and which are, or soon will be, well understood by the country, I have only to say that I approved, as just and necessary for the preservation of the national organization and the sacred right of representation, the action of the Convention over which you continued to preside, and thus approving it and having resolved to sustain it, I feel that it does not become me to select the position I shall occupy, nor to shrink from the responsibilities of the post to which I have been assigned. Accordingly, I accept the nomination from a sense of public duty; and, as I think, unlnfluenced in any degree by the allurements of ambition.

I avail myself of this occasion to say that the confidence in my personal and public character, implied by the action of the Convention, will always be gratefully remembered; and it is but just also to my own feelings to express my gratification at the association of my name with that of my friend Gen. Lane, a patriot and soldier, whose great services in the field and in council entitle him to the gratitude and confidence of his countrymen.

The resolutions adopted by the Convention have my cordial approval. They are just to all parts of the Union, to all our citizens, native and naturalized, and they form a noble policy for any administration.

The questions touching the rights of persons and property which have of late been much discussed, find in these resolutions a constitutional solution. Our Union is a confederacy of equal sovereign States, for the purposes enumerated in the Federal Constitution. Whatever the common Government holds in trust for all the States must be enjoyed equally by each. It controls the Territories in trust for all the States. Nothing less than sovereignty can destroy or impair the rights of persons or property. The Territorial Governments are subordinate and temporary, and not sovereign; hence they can not destroy or impair the rights of persons or property. While they continue to be Territories they are under the control of Congress but the Constitution nowhere confers on any branch of the Federal Government the power to discriminate against the rights of the States or the property of their citizens in the Territories. It follows that the citizens of all the States may enter the Territories of the Union with their property, of whatever kind, and enjoy it during the territorial condition, without let or hindrance, either by Congress or by the subordinate Territorial Governments.

These principles flow directly from the absence of sovereignty in the Territorial Governments, and from the equality of the States. Indeed, they are essential to that equality, which is and ever has been the vital principal of our constitutional Union. They have been settled legislatively, settled judicially, and are sustained by right and reason. They rest on the rock of the Constitution. They will preserve the Constitution—they will preserve the Union.

It is idle to attempt to smother these great issues, or to misrepresent them by the use of partisan phrases, which are misleading and delusive. The people will look beneath such expressions as "Intervention," "Congressional Slave Code," and the like, and will penetrate to the real questions involved. The friends of Constitutional equality do not and never did demand a "Congressional Slave Code," nor any other code in regard to property in the Territories. They hold the doctrine of non-intervention by Congress, or by a Territorial Legislature, either to establish or prohibit slavery; but they assert (fortified by the highest judicial tribunal in the Union) the plain duty of the Federal Government, in all its departments, to secure, when necessary, to the citizens of all the States, the enjoyment of their property in the common Territories. The only logical answer to this would seem to be to claim sovereign power for the Territories, or to deny that the Constitution recognizes property in the service of negro slaves, or to deny that such property can exist.

Inexorable logic, which works its steady way through clouds and passion, compels the country to meet the issue. There is no evasive middle ground. Already the signs multiply of a fanat

PAY TO THE END OF THE YEAR.

We have made out, and sent out, all our accounts, to the end of the present year. Many have responded and paid up, but many have failed to do so. The object we have in writing these lines is, to call upon all who have not paid up to the end of the year, to do so immediately, by remittance to the office, or by payment to our agents. The year is more than half gone, and yet we have much to collect of our accounts, and to clear off books, between this and January next. This work we must accomplish. Come friends, you have received your accounts, through the paper or through the preacher; the amount is not large in each case; pay up to the end of the year, and let us all begin even again.

HEALTH OF THE CITY.

The report of the Board of Health for the week ending July 15 shows the number of deaths to be 300—an unusually large list. Ninety-one of these are to be attributed to the extreme heat—viz: 40 from appoplexy, 42 from sun-stroke, and 9 from congestion of the brain. One death on the 11th, one week ago, in the Fourth District, is reported as yellow fever. The truth of this report depends simply upon the honesty or judgment of the physician. No person can be buried in New Orleans without a physician's certificate, stating the cause of death. The first cases of yellow fever are hard to distinguish from ordinary fevers. This fact, taken in connection with other facts—that no case has been heard of since, and that there are no cases in the hospitals, where the first cases nearly always appear—shows that there is no yellow fever in the city as yet, whatever may have been the truth of the above reported case. The public may rely upon the promptitude and fidelity of the Board of Health and the city press.

Since the above was in type, and just as we go to press, we learn on high medical authority, just what we had expected, that, after scientific examination, there is no truth in the report of a case of yellow fever. The physician is a German of no medical reputation.

THE BALTIMORE CONTROVERSY.

It is plain, we think, that the Baltimore Conference will leave the Methodist Episcopal Church, North. It is not necessary that we publish more about the matter until we learn the result. There is great difference of opinion among them, and unity of action is difficult. It is now generally admitted, by all the Northern Methodist papers, that the view taken by this paper, on the new Chapter, is correct—namely—that it subjects slaveholders to exclusion for a violation of the general Rules, if the administration is true to the Discipline. Whether the seceders will adhere South, or form a separate connection, cannot yet be determined. If the former, the old Plan of Separation of 1844, it is said, would save their Church property; if the latter, the property question must be risked. A separate connection would cause a larger number to secede than would adhesion South:—But between the North and the South it would die, unless it could prove a growing nucleus of a Methodist Church with a Discipline free from the slavery question, similar to the Discipline of the Southern Church. May God direct for the best.

LITERARY NOTICES.

FIVE YEARS IN CHINA, by Charles Taylor, M.D., (Published by Derby and Jackson.) Rev. Dr. Taylor was the superintendent of the first mission established by the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, twelve years ago, in China. After remaining in the country five years, he was compelled, by the failing health of his wife, to return to the United States, still hoping, however, that he might ultimately be permitted to return and prosecute the work to which he had devoted his life. This, however, to the great regret of the Church, seems now improbable. This improbability is sufficiently indicated by the fact that he has put his knowledge of that country in a book. He was remarkably successful in acquiring the Chinese language, and in making himself acquainted with the manners and customs of the country. He visited, at great risk of life, the camp of the Insurgents, and has given the most interesting account we have ever seen of the life of Tai-Ping-Wong, the revolutionary leader, and of the progress of the Great Rebellion. In connection with Oliphant's China and Japan, and other works of similar character, this work of Dr. Taylor is timely and valuable; especially in view of the Anglo-French imbroglio in China, and of the visit of the Japanese embassy to the United States. Few writers are masters of a purer English or a more charming style, than Dr. Taylor. In Oliphant's book we have the English view, and in Dr. Taylor's book we have the American view, of China and the Chinese. And Dr. Taylor's book is especially interesting to all who have any thing to do with Christian missions in China. The frontispiece is a likeness of Tan-Kwong, (Reason's Glory) late Emperor of China. For sale at the Methodist Publishing House, and all the depositories.

LECTURES ON TRANSUBSTANTIATION AND OTHER ERRORS OF THE PAPACY, by Rev. E. M. Marvin. (Published by the St. Louis Methodist Book Depository.—It is well known that at St. Louis, as well as at New Orleans, and other Western cities, the Romanist population is large, being, as they were, the original settlers of the country, and being still strengthened, from year to year, by foreign emigration. In these cities, especially, they strive to maintain their ancient supremacy, though sorely pressed by the rising tide of Anglo-Saxon civilization, by the power of the press, by the influence of public schools, by Sunday-schools, by the circulation of the Bible and of an enlightened literature, and by all the influences of this Christian Republic. Of late years, their never-failing tact has caused them to forsake their old beaten path of the advocacy of pure Romanism, and to seek to identify it with the ideas and institutions most sacred to the hearts of the people of this country—ideas and institutions to which Romanism, in its whole history, in all tradition, in its entire spirit and purpose, is diametrically and unalterably opposed. Thus, freedom, progress, literature, art, science, civilization, order, law, and all such words, have been inscribed upon their banners of late years. Orators and lecturers, on these topics, abound in the land. Until recently, no attention has been paid to them by Protestants, trusting, as they did, to the common sense of the people. But Brigham Youngism Anglo-Saxon followers, and so have these Jesuit apostles of literature, liberty, and civilization. These lectures of Mr. Marvin were occasioned by their misrepresentations. He has done his work well. The spirit is catholic, and the style and argument are good.

LAYING THE CORNER-STONE.—The corner-stone of the new Methodist Church to be built in Gretna will be laid next Sunday afternoon, at 5 o'clock. The public are invited to attend. Rev. Dr. Walker will deliver the address.

EDITORIAL PAPERS.—We have but little room for anything from ourselves this week. Important contributions very properly take the place of editorials.

NEW YORK LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE.

The "heated term" has set in with us at such a rate that New York just now feels much like I once felt your city of New Orleans in August. It is too hot for comfort, and certainly too hot for connected thoughts. Will you be content for this week with an exhaustive summary of literary news and gossip?

Since my last writing, the Boston Christian Examiner (bi-monthly) and the North American Review have made their appearance. The North American is a very good number. It has articles on the new edition of the Septuagint; Landscape Gardening; Hawk's History of North Carolina; James Gates Percival; Slavery in Rome; Jefferson's Private Character; Margaret Faller Ossoli; Strauss and the Mythic Theory; Charities of Boston; Influence of Political Economy on Legislation; Recent French Literature; Ugo Foscolo.

In the paper on Jefferson are given two very interesting, and hitherto unpublished letters, from one of his daughters. I quote the following passage, which refers to the often disputed question of Mr. Jefferson's religious belief:—

"His character, in spite of the mistakes which prevail among many persons with regard to it, was essentially Christian, and could have been formed under no other influences than those of the Gospel. He was, if ever man was, merciful, pure in heart, a peace maker, one who forgave his enemies, not seven times, but seventy times seven, doing his alms in secret, and praying, not at the corners of the streets, but in the retirement of his closet. His religious opinions have been variously represented, and almost always misrepresented. He entertained the greatest possible admiration and veneration for the character and doctrines of Jesus, and few persons, not theologians, of those who possess most leisure, devote more time than he did to the reading of the New Testament. He frequently had recourse to it in his moments of retirement, and never more than when, under the pressure of sorrow, he sought the rest which is offered to the heavy-laden. Upon one occasion, having experienced an affliction of the severest kind, the loss of a very dear daughter, he was found by his only surviving child, my mother, when she first ventured to interrupt the retirement of his grief, with the sacred volume in his hand; and in this he continued to read, at intervals, sometimes aloud to her, the whole time during which the agony of his feelings absorbed all thoughts but those which even then he could give to the words of the Saviour.

"Nor was his study of the Scriptures entirely confined to the New Testament. There were parts of the Old, for which he felt the most fervent admiration. I have heard him repeat from memory the most beautiful parts of David's lamentation over Saul and Jonathan, the mourning over Absalom, as well as several of the Psalms, such as the fifteenth and twenty-third; and the metrical version of the fifteenth, 'Lord, who's the happy man,' &c., I have seen in more than one place written out in his own hand. He was also in the habit of copying out such occasional hymns as pleased and satisfied him, and I have one or two of these, written on small scraps of paper, which I carefully preserve. It may be worth while to mention, that his voice and manner were particularly impressive when he read aloud, as he sometimes did, passages from the New Testament, or repeated the Psalms. There was a feeling and earnestness in his tones which corresponded with the solemnity of the subject. Of sacred music he was particularly fond, and especially the old Psalm tunes, which he regretted to find were giving way, in our churches, before more modern compositions. His voice continued singularly sweet and unbroken to the last years of his life; and I have frequently heard him singing to himself passages of psalms and hymns, such as he had sung in his youth. He was as regular an attendant at church as circumstances permitted, and frequently overcame obstacles of weather and roads which have deterred younger men. He preferred the Liturgy of the Church of England to any other form of worship, and always kept by him the Book of Common Prayer."

The short paper on the new edition of the Septuagint will be of interest to students of the Scriptures in the original; as will also the paper on "Strauss and the Mythic Theory."

The article in the Christian Examiner which reviews Mr. George P. Marsh's lectures on the English language, is the best analysis I have seen of that valuable work. There is also an interesting article on "the analogues of Satan;" and a paper on John Calvin, his life and times; with others of more or less general interest.

While I am upon periodicals I may as well give you the list of contents of Harper's Magazine for August. The first article is called "To Red River and Beyond." The Red River of the North is the one alluded to, and the paper is descriptive of a trip to the very farthest North-west, with hunting adventures by the way. It is by Manton M. Marble, of New York, one of the Editors of the World, our new and promising daily paper. Mr. Marble's Red River experiences and mishaps are of a most interesting and amusing nature, and are enlivened with 22 illustrations, from sketches by himself. "John Bull in Japan" is one of those timely and interesting articles on the subject of the day, for which Harper's Magazine has long been noted. It is by Dr. A. H. Guernsey, a gentleman who, if the veil of mystery could be drawn aside which separates the readers of a magazine from its writers, would be found to have pleased and instructed the readers of "Harper's" during its ten years of life, probably oftener and more acceptably than any other half dozen magazinists in the country. "The Battle of Bennington" is a fine ballad, by Thomas Dunn English. Rose Terry has a good story, "Before Breakfast." R. F. Coleman, of Kentucky, contributes a sketch of the celebrated John Hamilton Davies, the contemporary of Clay, and his rival while he lived. Henry Timrod contributes "Two Portraits," a poem; J. W. DeForest, the author of that most readable book of travels, "European Acquaintance," has a story called "Henry Gilbert." Anthony Trollope, whose name is becoming "familiar in our ears as Household Words," has a pretty American story, "the Courtship of Susan Bell;" and from Mr. Thackeray there is the first of his four lectures on the Georges, with two illustrations.

Derby & Jackson have nearly ready, "Women of the South, Distinguished in Literature," by Mary Forrest, with portraits on steel of Madame Levert, Mrs. Ritchie, Marion Harland, Miss Augusta J. Evans, Miss M. J. McIntosh, Rosa Vertner Johnson, L. Virginia French. Also, "The Loves and Heroines of the Poets," by Richard Henry Stoddard, illustrated with real and ideal portraits on steel, from designs by Berry and others, of Petrarch's Laura, Tasso's Leonora, Surry's Geraldine, Jonson's Celia, Shakspeare's "Love," Walter's Sacharissa, Pope's Martha Blount, Byron's Maid of Athens, Burns' Highland Mary, Coleridge's Genevieve, Longfellow's Minnehaha, Tennyson's Maud.

Captain Richard F. Burton, renowned among scientific geographers as a most able and successful explorer of barbarous regions, and prized by all readers for his rare qualities as a narrator of personal adventures, has at last produced his long expected picture of explorations in the Lake Regions of Africa. The work is abundantly illustrated with sketches of scenery, and curious portraits of African humanity. It will be published immediately by Messrs. Harper & Brothers, who have also in press M. Paul du Chaillu's account of his Explorations of Central Africa from the Western Coast (Capt. Burton started from the East). M. du Chaillu is noted as the first white man who ever hunted the savage gorilla—the ingo upe whose close resemblance to man has created such a stir among men of science in America and Europe for a few years back. M. du Chaillu brought with him to New York, from Africa, the first and only collection of stuffed gorillas, and complete skeletons, which had ever been brought to the view of our men of science.—He discovered several entirely new species of apes; and his adventures and hunts of the terrible gorilla, as well as his accounts of the strange manners and customs of the negro tribes of the far interior, among whom he spent four years, entirely alone (so far as white company was concerned), will make his book in interest equal to Livingstone's and Gordon Cumming's. We shall here, for the first time, have a complete history of the habits and nature of the mysterious gorilla. In a geographical and commercial point of view, M. du Chaillu's book will be of the greatest importance. He discovered an immense region, accessible by navigable rivers, and which abounds in ebony and India-rubber, as well as in ivory, bees-wax, and minor articles. The India-rubber region he has revealed to the world, it is confidently supposed, will supply half the present demand for that now indispensable article.

Messrs. Harpers have also nearly ready, "Studies in Animal Life," with illustrations, by G. H. Lewis; also, "Chapters on Wives," by Mrs. Ellis; "Our Year," a child's book in prose and verse, by Miss Dinah Mulock, author of "John Halifax, gentleman"; and "Castle Richmond," an Irish novel of the period of the famine, by Anthony Trollope.

The following story of the late G. P. R. James, the novelist, is generally credited, and shows him to have been a man of a noble mind. It is related by one of his best friends in England:

"When Mr. James was a young man, his cousin was about to marry the daughter of an eminent lawyer of the time, and the title-deeds of this gentleman's entailed property were, at the request of the father of the young lady, submitted to his examination. The keen lawyer discovered that the parents of the gentleman, although living in the best society of London, had never been married. Mr. James was made acquainted with this awkward fact, and at the same time informed that he was the heir-at-law. The match was about to be broken off, and much distress occasioned on every side, when Mr. James, having quietly taken possession of the property, went at once to the unhappy young man, his relative, and conveyed to him the whole of the property, which amounted to a very handsome independence."

The two volumes of remains of Lord Macaulay just published in England lose much of their interest for us, from the fact that the greater part of the matter there published has been long collected in this country. Among his poems, now and here first united, is this song, with the date of 1827:

O stay, Madonna! stay;
'Tis not the dawn of day
That marks the skies with yonder opal streak;
The stars in silence shine;
Then press thy lips to mine,
And rest upon my neck thy lovid cheek.

O sleep, Madonna! sleep;
Leave me to watch and weep
O'er the sad memory of departed joys,
O'er hope's extinguishing beam,
O'er fancy's vanished dream,
O'er all that nature gives and man destroys.

O wake, Madonna! wake;
Even now the purple lake
Is dappled o'er with amber flakes of light;
A glow is on the hill;
And every trickling rill
In golden threads leaps dawn from yonder height.

O fly, Madonna! fly,
Lest day and envy spy
What only love and night may safely know;
Fly, and tread softly, dear!
Lest those who hate us hear
The sound of thy light footsteps as they go.

It does not sound much like Macaulay, and one cannot help wondering at the fears good Mrs. Hannah Moore had of her young friend's becoming a poet.

It seems that the circulation of all the papers of Paris would average one copy for every three people in France; and that there are no less than forty illustrated weekly papers. Of these, twenty-one are sold at two cents each, and nineteen for one cent a copy. Their aggregate weekly sale is stated at near one million copies; and the Journal du Dimanche, one of the most prosperous, is said to clear its proprietor about $26,000 per annum. It may be added, that while a few of these papers, such as the Illustration, are respectably executed, the greater part come under the head of "prurient trash."

The Rev. Badeo Powell, whose death was recently announced, began his literary career with his work "On Revelation and Science," in 1833. His latest book was "The Order of Nature," published in 1859. Between these dates he gave to the world a number of books, tracts, and articles on the religion of science and the science of religion—the most noticeable of which were, "The Connexion of Divine and Natural truth," (1838)—"Tradition Unveiled" (1839), with its "Supplement" in the following year—and "Christianity without Judaism" (1857). Mr. Powell was much engaged in controversy, and took an active part in the proceedings of the Society of Arts, and of the Royal Institution. In private life he was very highly esteemed—his learning being recognized as wide and solid, and his courtesy towards opponents, often his inferiors in learning, unvarying. His death leaves the Savilian chair of Geometry at Oxford vacant.

The London Atlas says: "The annual production of Bibles in England is estimated by Mr. C. Knight at between two and three millions of copies. The books for which there is the next largest permanent demand are said to be 'Shakspeare,' and perhaps the 'Pilgrim's Progress;' but it is not considered that more than 20,000 copies of 'Shakspeare' are sold in a year. It appears that there was, until of late years, much carelessness in printing the Bible. So recently as 1831, Principal Lee stated: 'I do not know of any book of which it is so difficult to find a very correct edition as the English Bible.' The Bibles now issued from the Universities and by the Queen's printers are very accurate; the Oxford printers offer a guinea for the discovery of any mistake. But some of the Bibles (on account of having notes) to be printed by private printers have verbal inaccuracies, and there are errors in some Bibles which have been published in Scotland, where Bible printing is free to all, but under supervision. Printers state that there is great difficulty in attaining correctness with regard to the italics; one improvement proposed has been that of printing within brackets the words necessary to make up the sense, instead of printing them in italics according to the barbarous custom of the present printers of the Scripture,' which Mr. Knight also condemns as embarrassing to unlearned readers."

Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, Boston, have in press "Memorials of Thomas Hood; collected, arranged, and edited by his Daughter, with a Preface and Notes by his Son, illustrated with copies from his own Sketches." Also another work by C. R. Leslie, viz: "The life of Sir Joshua Reynolds; with notices of Hogarth, Wilson, Gainsborough, and other artists, his contemporaries."

The first volume of the new edition of Bacon's Works, announced to be published July 1st, will not be issued till September. The publishers, Messrs. Brown & Taggart, Boston, have received a letter from the English editor, Mr. Spedding, who has so interested himself as to inform them that if they will delay the issue till September, he will furnish them with certain notes and corrections which will greatly add to the value of their edition. Having received this kind offer from Mr. Spedding, the publishers think that it is due to their large list of subscribers to delay the issue, and thus give the American edition further superiority over the English.

Among the new announcements by Sheldon & Co. New York, are the following: Life of George Washington, by Edward Everett, in one volume. In the appendix will be found a most interesting paper, by Dr. James Jackson, the venerable head of his profession in Boston, on the nature of the disease of which Washington died. Also, the official inventory of Gen. Washington's personal estate, and a copy of Mrs. Washington's will. This is the first time these documents have ever been published. A new edition of Carlyle's Life of Friedrich Schiller, uniform with the four volume edition of Carlyle's Miscellanies, now publishing by Brown & Taggart, Boston; new volumes of the Oakland Stories and Florence Stories; Dean Milman's History of Latin Christianity, including that of the Popes, in 8 volumes, crown octavo, issued monthly; new edition of Hagenbach's History of Christian Doctrine, and Wedgewood's Dictionary of English Etymology, annotated, enlarged and revised by George P. Marsh.

A new edition of one of the books that never grow old, Bishop Butler's "Analogy of Religion," has just been brought out under the charge of Dr. Fitzgerald, Bishop of Cork. It is in many respects superior to any former impression as an edition for the library, or student's use, containing a carefully prepared life of the author, a collation of the first edition (which shows how attentive Butler was to the point on which he is generally considered to be most deficient—clearness and precision of style), explanatory notes, and a copious index of 50 pages.

A collection of papers has just been discovered, in the handwriting of Lord Chatham. They have descended from father to son in three generations, having originally been the property of one Marsh, who was in his Lordship's employ as valet, and recommended to the Premier by Lord Rockingham. Mrs. Ann Marsh, the wife of the valet's great-grandson, has placed the interesting documents in the hands of a celebrated literary and political writer, who is preparing them for publication under the title of "Laconics by Chatham."

The minimum of cheapness in books seems sustained by Mr. Murray, who just announces three editions of "Childe Harold" complete, price sixpence with portrait, do., price one shilling, with portrait and vignette titles, and do., price half a crown. It is possible the expiration of the copyright of the fourth Canto may have something to do with these low rates.

One of the most distinguished of Irish public men, Isaac Butt, formerly Professor of Political Economy in the University of Dublin, announces a sterling historical work, "The History of Italy, from the Abdication of Napoleon I., with Introductory References to that of Earlier Times." Volumes I and II will shortly be issued by Messrs. Chapman & Hall. The well-known political opinions of which Mr. Butt has always been one of the strongest champions, will probably make his work distasteful to the party now beating up for recruits in the cause of the Papal Sovereignty.

BISHOP ANDREW ON THE WASHINGTON CITY CHURCH.

The appeal of this Church to the members and friends of Southern Methodism has been now for some time before the public, which is to me a source of mortification and regret, because it appears to me that the propriety of the appeal is sufficiently obvious to have called forth from every one of our friends an immediate and liberal response. It is certainly matter of deep regret that after all the appeals which have been sent forth, through journals of the Church, there should still be a necessity for reiterating those appeals, even to procure the needed funds to pay for the beautiful lot, which, we understand, has been purchased, and to commence at once the so greatly needed church edifice. The building ought now to have been complete, and would have been so very easily if united and proper efforts had been made throughout the whole Southern Church. I suppose that no intelligent and reflecting man will deny that our branch of the great family of Methodism should be suitably represented at the capital of the nation, and it would be reasonably supposed that in order to this object we must have an appropriate house, suitably located, to which congregations will be attracted by convenience of position, comfortable arrangements, and a good bell in the pulpit.—Now, with these three attractions, we believe that there can be no reasonable doubt of success in building up a large, respectable and permanent congregation, which is essential to our establishment and our continued prosperity in Washington City. It is true that, there has been, first and last, a good deal of begging to aid the establishment of Southern Methodism in Washington. Hence, some of our people who have not calmly looked into the matter have been ready to say, we are tired of hearing these perpetual appeals in behalf of Washington City; we have given again and again—is the thing never to end? What has become of all the money which has been already contributed?

Now, in order to understand this thing properly, it will be proper to recollect the circumstances under which the little band of Southern Methodists first unfurled our banner in the Federal City. They were few in numbers, and in very moderate pecuniary circumstances—so much so as to render them unable to do much more than support their preacher and meet the contingent expenses of the church; and this, perhaps, strained them to the utmost of their ability. Yet they have not had missionary appropriations to support their preachers, though, possibly, under the circumstances, it would have been proper to have granted them this much help; but have nobly struggled, and have supported comfortably the pastors sent to them. They procured a house of worship which answered their purpose for the time, but which it was discovered was unfortunately located. The earlier collections made were for that house, which the Church now owns, and which will probably be made available in building the new edifice; so that whatever has been heretofore given in that direction may be regarded as not lost but as safely invested. The appeal now addressed to our people seeks to build, for the congregation which we now have there, and which we hope to build up and enlarge, a church edifice, suitably located, and which, in all its appointments and surroundings, shall be creditable alike to our liberality and our taste. I do not mean an extravagant, taudry affair, whose style and arrangements shall minister mainly to the pride of the irreligious and aristocratic; but a church edifice in good taste, neat and simple in its architecture, where the rich and the poor may meet together and hear the word of God in peace and comfort. The necessity for such a building was obvious to all our friends, but they were powerless for lack of funds. In this state of affairs God put it into the heart of Mr. Smithson to go forward in the work. He devised liberal things, and sought, by the sale of "The Southern Pulpit," to realize something handsome towards the attainment of his cherished object. Now, although we fear our friend will find it an uncertain reliance to build a church by the sale of books, yet the movement gave evidence of deep interest in the prosperity of the Church of his choice; and even should the sale of the book yield him no funds for the church, yet he will have accomplished much good by putting into circulation a very superior volume of sermons, that can scarcely fail to be instrumental of much good. As to his picture, which is published in view of accomplishing the same object, I cannot speak; the expense of the publication must be very great, and unless his success in selling is very great, it may result in personal loss, instead of yielding a handsome dividend toward the church. I have had no correspondence with Mr. Smithson on this subject, and do not know how that matter stands. On one account I have rather regretted this attempt to build the house with books and pictures. I honor the man and his motives, but I fear that many excuse themselves from giving on account of these matters; they say that from these two sources there will be ample funds forthcoming to accomplish the work. But whatever may be the fate of the books and picture, there will be ample necessity for a prompt and general and generous response from our friends in all the Conferences. Let it not be a partial work, for every friend of our Church should feel himself personally and deeply interested. I am gratified to see the liberal proposition of Mr. Hammet, of Mississippi, and the responses which have been made to it. May they soon increase a thousand fold.—This is one of the times when I wish I was rich; but from my early youth I have devoted myself to the service of the Church, and to use the language of an old friend whom I once met with, "my Good Master knew me too well to trust me with much money." Well, I dare say it is all right. Come, beloved brethren in all the Southern Conferences, let us act at once. Many hands make light work. Our people are able—amply able to do this and a great deal more. Let your contributions go up to glorify God, and cheer the heart of our devoted brother Smithson. May God help us all to devise liberal things.

A GRAND OCCASION.

DEDICATION OF A MISSION CHAPEL FOR THE BLACKS, NEAR GREENSBORO, ALA.

Did you ever read Anthony Trollope's "West Indies and the Spanish Main?" If not, get it, and read it,—He tells you all about emancipation and "free" colored society. And you may rely on his facts, for he is an abolitionist, just as he is an Anglican Churchman, because an Englishman of rank cannot help being both, theoretically at least. And such a picture as he gives us!—Free-negrodom as it is! Below, our readers will find a sample of the only really "free society" in the world—that of the slave-holding States. The South is really the only "free territory," so far as the blacks are concerned, and all else is "slave territory," whether in our own North, or in England, or in the West Indies, or in Liberia, or in Africa generally. A great fact now stands out before the world, in connection with this subject; it is this, that the negroes of the slave-holding States present the highest phase of African civilization the world has ever seen.

The Editor of this paper happens to be thoroughly acquainted with the region of Alabama, and the people, spoken of below. In connection with this same Rev. John DuBois, he held a protracted meeting of a month's continuance in that same town of Greensboro, fourteen years ago. John Walton, and his amiable and accomplished wife, were even then zealous for the christian welfare of their servants. This region of Alabama is in the very heart of that terrible, cotton-making, far-down "South," which Mrs. Stowe, and other sentimental humanity-mongers, have represented as a very negro purgatory. And such instances are becoming common all over the South. All we need is the death of abolitionism, health and prosperity among our negroes, consequent wealth and peace, to present a state of religious improvement and comfortable living, among the blacks, which will astonish the world. The time is coming when in the richest planting regions, and in the midst of the densest black population, will be found the greatest comfort of life, and the most abundant facilities for religious improvement, for the blacks, of any part of the South. But we are keeping our readers too long from the account of the dedication. Our correspondent writes:—

On the Sunday before the Commencement of the Southern University, a very interesting service was held at four o'clock, p.m., in the neighborhood of Greensboro. It is worthy of mention in connection with all that took place, at Commencement. A mission chapel, erected on one of the plantations of John Walton, Esq., for the use of his negroes, was dedicated to the worship of God. It is built near the road, convenient of access to the blacks from several of Mr. Walton's plantations; is a frame-house of large dimensions, neatly plastered and painted, with pulpit and all other appurtenances proper to a place of Christian worship. The Rev. John DuBois, a local minister living in Greensboro—a man universally esteemed for his high moral worth—has served these plantations with the ministrations of the Gospel, and has been instrumental in building up a flourishing society of colored people who are well instructed in the principles of Christianity and have their children regularly taught the catechism and the hymns of the Church. Mr. Walton could not have shown his great appreciation of Mr. DuBois's labors in a more appropriate manner than by the erection of this church; and one was at a loss to conjecture which of the parties—the proprietor, the missionary, or the colored people—felt the highest satisfaction on the occasion of its dedication. I am sure that the writer of this brief notice, who had the pleasure to witness the solemnities, felt profoundly impressed by all he saw and heard.

The service was opened by Mr. DuBois, with reading appropriate passages from the Old and New Testament, singing and prayer. He then preached a dedication sermon on the text, "The Lord shall count, when he visiteth his people, that this man was born there." The drift of the sermon was to show the connection between the ministrations, ordinances and worship of the Gospel Church, and the spiritual birth and nurture in holiness of the human soul. It was a clear, earnest, and effective presentation of this important subject; and held the fixed attention of the crowd of well-dressed and intelligent-looking blacks who thronged the house and its vicinity. Dr. Wightman, President of the University, rose at the conclusion of the sermon, and delivered the prayer of dedication, the congregation all rising and standing. The negroes then sang a hymn, and the Rev. T. J. Koger delivered a stirring exhortation with great effect, reminding his colored friends, many of whom he had preached to in former years, of the enhanced responsibilities now put upon them, pointing out the sort of Christian life which became them, making an appeal to the unconverted, and closing the exercises of the occasion with one of the most fervent prayers we ever heard.

Mr. Walton and his family were present, with several of his overseers and their families, and some friends from Greensboro. The building of substantial and neat mission chapels, is an important indication of progress and permanency in missionary operations among the plantation blacks. The one now referred to is the third within ten miles of Greensboro. Mr. Walton ranks among the largest planters of Alabama. He is beloved by his people, and deserves to be. His solicitude for their well-being well becomes him as a Methodist gentleman. His example in this respect should not only be admired, but extensively imitated. The glory of Southern Christianity is, that it saves the souls of the negro population.

SOUTHERN UNIVERSITY COMMENCEMENT.

MR. EDITOR—I have recently enjoyed the pleasure of attending the first annual commencement of the Southern University, and thinking that some account of the occasion and the prospects of the University would be acceptable to many of your readers, I send you a brief sketch. The series of services was opened on Sabbath, July 1, with an able sermon by the accomplished President, Dr. Wightman, in which most wholesome and salutary instructions were furnished in eloquent style to all present, but especially to the young men of the institution. These, we have reason to believe, will be heeded by the young gentlemen, not only on the ground that the most kindly relations exist between the students and the President and Faculty, but in view of the fact that, during the gracious revival with which the Church in Greensboro had been recently favored, nearly all of the students made a profession of religion, and united with the Church. What an omen of success is such a work!

On Monday night a public debate was held in the University Chapel, in which the members of the Junior Class participated. It was well attended, and the young men acquitted themselves well; the style of speaking being better than that which usually prevails on such occasions.

On Tuesday the address before the two literary societies was delivered by Rev. E. Baldwin, in his best style. His theme was Literature, and his manner of treating it gave great satisfaction to the whole audience, and was most highly appreciated by those best qualified to judge of such productions. At night the young misses of the Female Seminary, taught by Mr. Brame, gave a musical concert, which was numerously attended, and gave satisfaction to the friends of the Seminary and pupils.

Wednesday was Commencement day. Two young men—B. M. Huey, of Talladega, and J. V. Glass, of Pickens—received the honors of the University. Their performances gave promise of future distinction; their style of speaking was natural and easy, their elocution good, and their thoughts manly. I hope to hear from them again in different positions. President Wightman delivered a most eloquent and appropriate Baccalaureate, which delighted all who heard it. May we hear many more such! At night the ladies of Greensboro, without distinction, united to give the young gentlemen of the University a complimentary party. It was an elegant affair, which the whole community united to enjoy.

Thus closed most auspiciously the first scholastic year of the Southern University. The community generally, as well as its special friends, are entirely satisfied with its success thus far, and a brighter future awaits it. In proof of this, I wish to call attention to the following particulars:

HEALTH.

Greensboro has fully maintained its character for healthfulness so far. The President stated to the writer that he had not visited a single case of sickness among the students during the year, whereas at Wofford, situated in sight of the Blue Ridge, and deemed healthy by all, they buried three students in the first eighteen months. Those from abroad, who had any misgivings on that point, have been agreeably relieved.

ORDER.

The Faculty united in bearing public testimony, that though they had been connected with different colleges and students for years past, they had never been with a cleverer set of young men. Not a single student has been called before the Faculty during the year. Two, I think, had run the list of their demerit marks so near the maximum, by their idleness, that they left to avoid being formally dismissed, and thus were self-excluded; another was guilty of a misdemeanor, and before it came to the knowledge of the Faculty, he obtained an honorable dismission by misrepresentation, and left. The general good order has been remarkable, and the kindest feelings exist between the students and the community.

CHANGE OF SYSTEM.

On the unanimous recommendation of the Faculty, the Board of Trustees, at their recent meeting, adopted the open or university system of instruction, thus making the institution in reality, what it was in name, a UNIVERSITY. By this change they have established nine schools, including that of law. The student graduates in each separately, though no one will be allowed to take less than three schools at a time, unless by a special arrangement with the Faculty. Four different degrees will be conferred; but you will soon be furnished with the scheme in full, when, I hope, you will examine, publish and call attention to it.

This change of system made it necessary to strengthen the Faculty. Accordingly, two gentlemen were added to it—Prof. J. A. Reubelt was elected Professor of Hebrew and Modern Languages; and Mr. Gatch, Adjunct Professor of Mathematics. Thus the University starts upon its second year with seven Professors. One or two more will probably be elected at the next annual meeting of the Board.

BENEVOLENT FUND.

This noble charity has already reached the sum of $30,000, and is still increasing. The object is, as you are aware, to use the interest in paying the board of the sons of itinerant ministers, and of young men preparing for the ministry. The tuition of both these classes is free. A moderate addition to the endowment will place this noble enterprise upon a sufficiently broad foundation, and give it power for immense good, for all time to come. Who will help?

DEATH OF A PROTESTANT YOUNG LADY IN A CONVENT.

Below, our readers will find a sad history. It is sent as an Obituary; but we take the liberty of publishing it on our editorial page, for the edification of all whom it may concern. This case is only one of thousands. Such milk-and-water Protestants abound in this country. With a sentimentalism that is contemptible, a lack of principle that is shameful, an ignorance of true education that is pitiable, they send their daughters to these schools, controlled by women who are in unnatural relations to society, and by men who are more so. While despotic France and priest-ridden Italy and Hungary, are rising up against Popery, we have American citizens who can sympathize with and contribute to the hoary butcher of Perugia; and affected and sentimental Protestants who can send their daughters to these schools, which are arrayed against every educational, social, political, and religious sentiment and institution dear to the people of this country:

AMELIA M., daughter of the late Alexander and Dorothea Thompson, was born near Greensburg, La., September 8th, 1842, and died at Sacred Heart Convent, June 13th, 1860. Naturally amiable, and ever willing to yield to the desires of her friends, she consented to go to the Convent to please one whose wishes she felt it her duty to regard. But sad indeed will be the memory at that place to her brothers and sisters, several of whom are members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. She was ill several weeks before her relatives were informed of it. As soon as the intelligence reached them, they hastened to her, only to see that beloved form, so recently blooming with health and beauty, sink into the cold embrace of death. Although she had been surrounded with religious influences at home, and had been early taught that "Christ was the way, the truth, and the life;" still no effort was spared, to force was left untried to weaken her faith in the religion of the Bible, and to influence her to embrace in its stead the principles of the Roman Catholic Church. But, thank God, their schemes were unavailing. The seeds of divine truth which had been planted in her heart in earlier years had taken root, and was now bringing forth fruit to the honor and glory of God. Pointing to a large cross, and an image of the Virgin Mary, which the nuns had placed before her, she requested her sister to remove them, saying she trusted in Christ as her Redeemer, and believed that God would save her for Christ's sake. Although life had been to her a day of sunshine, and every prospect for the future seemed flattering, still she did not murmur, but seemed to have surrendered herself into the hands of God, and expressed a perfect willingness to die. To her brothers, sisters, and friends we would say, "Let not your hearts be troubled for Amelia." She gave Scriptural evidence that she was going to a brighter and better world.

FANNIE.

NO COMMENCEMENT AT CENTENARY.

We regret to be called on to inform our readers that there will be no Commencement, at the usual time, at least, at Centenary College. A couple of cases of small pox appeared among the servants of one family, a panic ensued, and the majority of the students went home. It has not spread, and will not, we presume, and the panic was unnecessary; but it could not be avoided, and cannot now be remedied. No body contracts small-pox without coming in immediate contact with it, which can easily be avoided. No body ever dreams of running away from New Orleans because the small-pox happens to be in the city, or even within a few squares of them. It is a pity that a little more common sense on such subjects could not be distributed, gratis, for public benefit.

The Joint Board of Trustees and Visitors are to meet at the usual time, on Monday, the 23d of July. It is important that the members of the Board attend, more so than if the Commencement had not failed. There is important business on hand.

ANOTHER PREACHER GONE.

Recently we announced the death of Rev. B. C. Stagall, of the Louisiana Conference. Now, we are called on to announce the death of Rev. Samuel Hawes of the same Conference. By a letter from Rev. Jas. L. Wright, we learn that he died on the night of the first of July, of typhoid fever. He gave satisfactory assurance of his readiness to meet death. Our dear brethren are being removed from us, one by one. "The Lord buries his workmen, but carries on his work." To the families of these departed brethren we tender our sympathy, and commend them to the care of the Church. Let them not be forgotten.

OUR CAPITAL APPENDAGE.—Our friend, R. J Sampier, of Alabama, who intimates sundry hard things against us, and thinks we had better go North, because of our article on the above subject, will be pleased to learn that the Nashville and Memphis Advocates have copied and endorsed it, and that all our papers have expressed similar sentiments. Our friend is simply ignorant of what he is talking about.

COMMENCEMENT EXERCISES OF THE SOUTHERN UNIVERSITY.

Students' Class-meeting.—Dr. Wightman's Sermon.—Sacramental Service.—Prayer-meeting in the University.—Clariosophic Society.—Address to the Literary Societies by the Rev. Mr. E. Baldwin.—Degrees Conferred.—Baccalaureate Address.—The Open System.—Election of Professors.—Student's Party.—Conclusion.

Mr. Editor: On Sabbath morning, 1st. inst., at nine o'clock, the Commencement services of the Southern University were inaugurated, by that feature peculiar to Methodism, a "class-meeting." If the great end of life be the glory of God and the salvation of the soul, how would the first Commencement of this noble institution have been more appropriately or impressively introduced. It was attended by ministers and laymen from different sections of the country, and long it will be remembered by those who were the privileged participants; for they seemed to have a realization of the Divine presence, we must have felt it good to be there. At half-past ten o'clock Dr. Wightman, the President of the University, delivered a sermon in the University Chapel, addressed especially to the students. This discourse, (the first of its kind in the history of the University,) was in every respect well worthy to stand as a model for the many sermons which will be delivered year after year, of similar occasions. The text was the 9th verse of the cix. Psalm. "Where withal shall a young man cleanse his way? By taking heed thereto, according to thy word." To attempt to give you an analysis of this truly eloquent and instructive discourse, would make this communication too extended; suffice it to say, that it was regarded by all as a masterly effort which must be productive of great good. This sermon alone demonstrates that Dr. Wightman is admirably fitted for the position he occupies. The elevated, fervent piety, with which it was replete, the richness of style, boldness of imagery, and aptness of illustration, all prove that he is a safe and attractive teacher and guide for the young student, especially the young minister. There was a sacramental service in the Methodist Church, in the afternoon. Parents who for months had been separated from their sons, have enjoyed the privilege of assembling with them, some for the first time around the table of the Lord, in commemoration of the sufferings of Christ. It was one of the most interesting occasions we ever witnessed. To see so many of the students numbered with the communicants, must have filled every Christian heart with devout thankfulness.—The Divine presence was peculiarly manifest, and many hearts were made to rejoice in the God of all grace. On Monday morning, at eight o'clock, the students held a prayer-meeting, and, by invitation, the Faculty and Trustees were present. Are not these things new in Commencement exercises, and do they not indicate the decidedly religious character of the institution? Nearly all the students have become, during this term, members of the Church, and hold regularly a weekly prayer-meeting and a Sabbath evening class in the University. The interest manifested by them, in these meetings, creates the pleasing hope, and inspires the earnest prayer, that the Southern University may be a pure fountain of sanctified learning, from which shall flow every year streams to refresh and make glad the City of God.

On Monday night the members of the Clariosophic Society held a public debate; six disputants discussed the question, "Whether a dissolution of the Union, under existing circumstances, would be justifiable?" The speeches were well written, well committed, and well delivered, avoiding the too common error of being too long. The debaters, no doubt, were repaid for their diligent preparation by the interest they excited. May this exercise, which has thus been inaugurated, be regularly continued; but we would prefer to have the debate conducted by the two societies, the one advocating the affirmative, the other the negative of each question. It seems proper that the debating societies, which hold so important a place in our colleges and universities, should be publicly represented at Commencement.

The Rev. E. Baldwin, of Mobile, addressed the Literary Societies on Tuesday, the 5th ult., at half-past ten, a.m. The subject was "Literature considered as a Profession." He is gifted with great distinctness of enunciation, finish of manner, no irresistible impulse of expression, which tells us he was meant to be an orator. It is impossible in a communication like this to do justice to the address of this accomplished gentleman and eloquent divine. His splendid effort cannot fail to excite in the minds of the young gentlemen of both societies, as well as of others who heard him, a higher appreciation of the excellence and dignity of literature, and inspire in them the resolution not to permit the business of life, the excitement of party politics, or the urgency of professional duty, to so engross their time and attention as to keep out literary pursuits. Degrees were conferred, and the addresses of the graduates delivered on Wednesday, the 4th inst. Mr. B. M. Huey, of Talladega, and J. V. Glass, of Pickens, Ala., were presented by the Faculty to the Trustees as worthy of the degree of A.B. Mr. Huey delivered the salutatory addresses in Latin, and then an oration on "great men the glory of their Nation." Mr. Glass spoke first, on "the responsibilities of the young men of America." After the degrees were conferred, and diplomas given, Mr. Glass delivered the valedictory addresses. Both acquitted themselves handsomely. May these young men, the first fruits of the Southern University, conquer every obstacle in their way to eminence, and become ornaments of the nation. Encouraged by the report given of the orderly and studious habits of the students from their President, Faculty and citizens of Greensboro', we confidently expect for the Southern University a glorious harvest in the future. After Dr. Wightman conferred the degree of A.B. on the graduates, he delivered to them, in his graceful and felicitous manner, the Baccalaureate address. Here, again, we were deeply impressed with the richness and polish of the Dr's. style, and the force of his imagination. So impressive was everything connected with that parting address, that the student cannot soon forget it, or fail to be profited by its wholesome instruction. These exercises being concluded, the Rev. Dr. Hamilton (acting President of the Board of Trustees) announced that the Trustees had, in accordance with a recommendation of the Faculty, adopted the open system, thus placing the institution on the true University basis, so that the broad views of those who have subscribed to it so liberally may be fully realized. In addition to their present corps of instructors, Professor Reubelt, of Central College, Ala., was elected to the chair of Modern Languages, and Hebrew; and Mr. T. A. Gatch, as assistant Professor in the school of Mathematics. On Wednesday night the ladies of Greensboro gave the senior class a most splendid party. It was held in the University building, and was attended by a large and brilliant throng. The whole building was brightly illuminated, and its large rooms and spacious halls thrown open for the reception of the guests, so that, though there was a large number present, still there was no lack of room, for sitting, standing, or promenading. The tables were loaded with a profusion of the most dainty viands, served up in the very best manner, and arranged in the most exquisite style. The ladies of Greensboro must have exhausted their resources on that occasion. Surely there must be a very cordial sympathy existing between the community and students—no doubt resulting from their intimate association as boarders in private families; and the students must have conducted themselves with great propriety to have secured so decided a mark of the confidence and affection of the ladies of Greensboro.

In conclusion, Mr. Editor, permit me to ask if it is not gratifying to every Christian, and especially to the ministry, of the Alabama Conference to observe the predominant religious influence presiding over all the exercises at this institution; pervading them all as a vital, hallowing influence? Is this not the legitimate fruit of a Faculty united in religious sentiment, professing a cordiality of religious co-operation? Should not a Professor, in addition to scholastic accomplishments, possess strength of faith, devotional fervor, a habit of affectionate intercourse with all his students, and a tender interest in their spiritual welfare? These elements of character are happily blended in the Faculty of the Southern University, and if by Divine help such instructors succeed in carrying into practical effect the lessons they teach by precept and example, in the language of the distinguished President of this institution, "we shall entertain the confident expectation that the future alumni of the Southern University will turn to it as the place where the most tender friendships have been formed, around which, in after life, shall cling the most delightful, hallowed reminiscences. With prophetic insight into the future we shall see the successive praecessions of graduates, as they pass away from the quadrum with the blessings of Alma Mater, reappearing in the great world, men of mark, in whom shining ability would not be substituted for large and devout spirit, nor splendor of talent for the virtues of private character, nor a surface of graceful accomplishments be found to cover corruption at the heart. We shall see, as the result of high intellectual cultivation, in wedlock with genuine Christian principle, the men who won and wore the laurelled honors of this seat of learning, flashing as polished jewels in the magnificent crown of Humanity; illustrious for goodness and greatness alike; destined to be finally set in the gemmed coronet of the Savior's rejoicing. And down along distant centuries of the future, we shall trace the influence of this institution, venerable then in years, but fresh in power, growing with the colossal growth of the country, widening in the sphere of its noble aims, richer and richer in the lustre of its greatness, its name graven on the ages as they pass, its impress stamped upon a multitude of minds destined to outlive all ages measured by the chronicles of time."

LETTER FROM BATON ROUGE.

Mr. Editor.—At various times during the year I purposed writing you, but with the passing away of the interest I wished to represent passed away my desire to write. Last week the exercises of Magnolia Institute and Mrs. Read's Seminary closed, which furnished an occasion of pleasure among the young people, and of reflection among the older ones. Perhaps no town in the Union is blessed with two such schools. Built up and sustained at private cost, known to comparatively few, standing upon their own merit, with scarcely a newspaper advertisement to make them known; yet it is always a matter of concern to the proprietors of these schools to find room for the students who seek admittance in them. There is no instinct presiding oftentimes where other faculties are wanting, to detect real worth, and to attach ourselves to it as credit to ourselves. This, doubtless, in part accounts for the eagerness with which a substantial patronage is awarded to these schools. Our utilitarian sentiments sometimes carry us further than we see at the time, to "kill two birds with one stone." To afford our children an education, and to do ourselves credit thereby, and at the same time, leads us to discriminate; and by so doing we conserve the highest ends of life. This, if any where, in the matter of education is attained here. You cannot be about these schools long without becoming sensible of the home feeling and home manners that obtain; cheerfulness, contentedness, affection and substantial progress greets you at every turn. It is the constant remark of our townspeople, that Prof. Magruder must have picked out the best boys in the State; they are never guilty of those misdemeanors so common among school-boys, and are therefore affectionately regarded when ever they are met in the town. No means or labor is spared by the Professor to achieve results of which he, with all others, are equally proud. Long may these schools continue the blessing they are, and I sincerely hope that more of our Methodist people may find them out, to avail themselves of advantages that may not be picked up everywhere.

WEEKLY SUMMARY OF NEWS.

DOMESTIC.

Another Scientific Expedition.—The schooner Nautilus, Capt. Charles E. Raulett, sailed from Thomaston, (Maine) on the 27th of June for Greenland, with a scientific expedition under the leadership of Prof. B. A. Chadburn, of Williams College. It is contemplated to be absent about three and one half months. The expedition was fitted out under the auspices of the Lyceum of Natural History in Williams College.

There is a largely increased emigration from Europe to this country the present year. It is said 58,432 emigrants have arrived at the port of New York during the half year ending June 30.

The tug boat A. S. Field blew up at Detroit on the night of 5th inst. Four or five persons were killed and several on the boat, the wharf, and adjoining vessels were badly injured. The boat, it is said, was torn to fragments.

One Cent for the Delivery of Letters.—The act of Congress, passed at the last session, says that not more than one cent shall be paid to letter carriers for the delivery of letters. This act has been enforced in New York and other cities ever since the 1st of July.

Wealth of New York City.—The total value of real estate in New York city, according to the recent examination for taxation, is $398,033,613, and the total value of real and personal property together is $577,220,635, which is an increase upon the valuation of 1859 of twenty-five millions and a quarter.

Expedition to the Arctic Regions.—Dr. Hayes and his little band of adventurers left Boston on the 7th inst. in the schooner "United States," on their voyage of exploration to the Arctic regions. The object of the expedition, as we have already stated, is to follow out to a clear and satisfactory solution, if such be possible, the problem of an open Polar sea, which was discovered, but not explored, by the Kane expedition in 1855. Dr. Hayes, who was the companion of Kane, proposes to harbor his vessel on the western shore of Smith's Sound, and then push forward with boats and sledges towards the pole, where he expects to strike the open water, seen from a distant point by some of the officers of Dr. Kane's party. The adventurers calculate upon a three years' voyage, for which they have gone well provided.

Arizona.—Late accounts from Tucson, Arizona, state that the excitement in regard to the gold discoveries on the Mimbres continues. Many have left Tucson for the mines, and more are preparing to start.

Visit of the Prince of Wales.—We learn from the London Times that the Prince of Wales, with his suite, was to leave England on the 11th inst., on his visit to British North America, and the United States. The Times says that on the return of the Prince from the western districts of Canada, it is intended that he shall drop all royal state, and assuming the title of Lord Renfrew, under which he has before traveled upon the continent of Europe, visit some of the most important and interesting localities of the United States. It appears that President Buchanan having, in an autograph letter to Queen Victoria, expressed his personal desire to receive the Prince at Washington, the Queen has written to the President accepting the invitation for her son, and accordingly the Prince will pay the President a visit.

Hicks, the pirate murderer, was executed on Bedloe's Island New York harbor, on the 13th inst. It is reported that Hicks confessed to having been engaged in nearly 100 murders, principally on the Pacific coast, and in California and Mexico.

The Courthouse of Attala county, Miss., was destroyed by fire on the morning of the 1st inst. The county records were saved with difficulty.

A despatch from New York states that the United States mail steamship, Granada, from New Orleans, via Havana, has been put under surveillance, by the United States Marshal, on suspicion of being engaged in the slave trade.

On the 11th inst., the steamboat Michigan, lying at the dock in Grand Rapids, Mich., was totally destroyed by fire. The crew being asleep in their berths escaped with great difficulty.

A fire occurred in Dallas (Texas) on Sunday, 8th inst., by which the whole of the business portion of the town, including both the hotels, and every storehouse was laid in ruins. The number of buildings destroyed is upwards of thirty. Loss variously estimated at from $300,000 to $500,000.

Seven Persons Drowned.—We learn from Minnesota that on the 6th inst., Rev. H. M. Nichols, pastor of the Congregational Church at Minneapolis, his wife and child, Mr. Cleveland, his brother-in-law and two daughters of Mr. Cleveland, went into Calhoun Lake bathing and getting beyond their depth all were drowned. Only two of the entire bathing party escaped. Mrs. Cleveland and a child of Rev. Mr. Nichols.

The Reported Slaver at Mobile.—The Mobile papers have no knowledge of the arrival of a vessel at that port with a cargo of Africans, as reported in our last issue. The story seems to have been a hoax.

Postmaster Fowler.—The fugitive New York Postmaster has again been heard from. He is still in Havana, and passes under his own name. He is very communicative, and says he has not a dollar in the world except $2800 which his friends handed him to enable him to escape. He professes to have received a letter from Ex-President Pierce, from whom he received his appointment of Postmaster of New York, sympathizing with him in his "misfortunes," and authorizing him to draw on him for $500 at once, and for the future to let him know his wants. Other friends have also come forward to his assistance, and he expects that the whole amount of his defalcation—$175,000—will be raised by them and paid over to the Government.

A company for the removal of the Red River raft has been formed in Clarksville, Texas. Thirty thousand dollars have already been subscribed.

Population of Vicksburg.—We learn from the Vicksburg Sun that according to the census recently taken, the population of that city is 4804, being a gain of a little over 1100 upon the census of 1850.

Removal of the Mormons.—A new programme for the Mormons is indicated from Washington. It is now proposed that they shall emigrate to one of the East India Islands, and reliable information is said to have been received that they will do so. The enterprise is to be carried out under the supervision of Capt. Walter M. Gibson, who will be remembered as having been imprisoned for some years by the Dutch authorities of one of the islands in question, and who has recently identified himself with the Mormon cause—it being at his suggestion that Brigham Young proposed to the Government to take the Mormons to Oceanica, if an arrangement could be made by which they could be paid by Government for their improvements in Utah.

The proceeds of the sales of public lands during the past year were less than in any year, with one exception, the year 1841, since the year 1833. The amount received last year was $1,756,667, and of this Arkansas yielded $407,894, Missouri $383,520, Louisiana $284,189, and California $127,666.

We learn from the Providence Journal that the inmates of the asylum in Newport, (R. I.) were furnished with a sumptuous dinner on the fourth of July at the expense of Dr. Mercer of New Orleans. Dr. M. has passed many summers in Newport.

The Boston Board of Aldermen has authorized the mayor to invite the Prince of Wales to that city.

A Call upon Englishmen.—The New York Albion has the following appeal in its last issue:—"When Capt. Talbot was on his way in his gig from the Powhatan to the ship of our admiral, during the disastrous engagement of the Pelho, John Hart, an American seaman, the coxswain of the commander's boat, was killed by a shot from the Chinese forts. John Hart left a child, a daughter eight years old. This child, we are told, is almost unprovided for. No Englishman need be told his duty in this matter. We simply repeat that the child is almost destitute, and that it will be our pleasure to receive and to place at the disposal of Capt. Talbot any funds which may be contributed by our countrymen for the benefit of the child of John Hart, one of the men who felt that blood was thicker than water."

All will remember the Sophia Werner murder, sometimes called the "barrel mystery," which took place at or near Chicago some time ago; Henry Ammeritz, being tried twice for the murder, and coming almost in sight of the gallows, was finally acquitted. He went to St. Louis, ruined in purse and broken in spirit, yet followed by the kindness of a very few last friends. The other day the Prussian Consul of New York sent to Chicago a letter making inquiries for him; it appears that he has become one of the joint heirs to a great estate in Germany.

The firm of Neafie & Levy, Philadelphia, have received a contract for the building of two iron steamships, each of 1,000 tons, for Messrs. Mora Brothers, Navaro & Co., of New York. One is to be called the "Nebraska," and the other the "Sagua," and they are to run between New York and the places after which they are named. Each will be 225 feet long on the deck, 32 feet width of beam, 12 feet 5 inches depth of lower hold, and 8 feet between decks, and upon the upper decks there will be first-class accommodations for one hundred passengers.

The citizens of Lawrence (Mass.) have given Hon. Daniel Saunders, jr., Mayor at that city, a service of plate, costing $632, as an appreciation of the part he acted in behalf of the sufferers by the Pemberton Mill calamity.

The Treasury.—A well informed Washington correspondent, writing of the deplorable condition of the Treasury, says that at the next session of Congress one of the earliest demands of Mr. Cobb will be for a loan to cover a present deficiency which may range between five and six millions, and before the closest of the session another loan for nearly $20,000,000 will be necessary to pay off the floating debt and postponed incumbrances of this Administration.

The Washington Constitution.—Mr. Bowman announces that he has disposed of his proprietary interest in the "Constitution" to William M. Browne, Esq., for some time past its associate editor, who thus becomes sole editor and proprietor of the paper.

During the storm on the 6th inst. a meteor of unusual size appeared in the heavens, in Hartsville parish, and burst with the report of a twenty-four pounder.

We have a report from Texas that the U. S. Secretary of the Treasury has granted the application of certain merchants of San Antonio, for a U. S. bonded warehouse there. The advantages of this arrangement, it is said, will be very great to merchants who deal with Mexico.

The wreck of the United States steamer Walker has been found off Atlantic City, New Jersey, and it is said that efforts will be made to raise her.

Progress of the Census Taking.—Official information has been received at the Census Office, Washington, of the completion of their duties by some of the Assistant Marshals in several of the States, and the samples of work which have been transmitted to the bureau indicate the general execution of the work in a manner highly satisfactory. The number of Marshals and assistants is about five thousand, and the prosecution of this work will distribute about one and a half million of dollars throughout the country. The cost of the last, or seventh census, was one million three hundred thousand dollars.

Presentation of the New French Minister.—The new French Minister, M. Mercier, was on the 7th instant presented to the President by acting Secretary of State Mr. Trescott. The Minister, in offering his credentials, took occasion to express his satisfaction in being accredited to this government, and closed his brief address by announcing the sincere sympathy of his august master, the Emperor, for the government and people of this country. The President, in reply, stated the pleasure it afforded him in receiving the new envoy, and in the course of his remarks made felicitous use of the fact that the French Minister should present his credentials on the anniversary of American Independence, which could not fail to remind him (the President) of the deep obligations the people of this country owed to France in their struggle for emancipation, and which an American could recall without the liveliest sentiments of gratitude. The interview terminated with mutual assurances of the most complimentary character.

The notorious Redpath says there is no truth in the statement that the widow of John Brown has received $30,000 from Hayti, or even so much as a dollar from that country. Furthermore, that the old received by the family in this country is not as large as frequently reported.

It is stated that Mr. Maclay, the agent at Apalachicola, Florida, of the Bank of the State of Georgia, has become a defaulter to a very large amount. It appears that Maclay, who is a merchant, has for two years, or more, been using the funds of the agency for his own private speculations, until, from losses after losses, chiefly on cotton, he found a balance against him on the books of his agency, amounting to about $100,000. The entire assets of the defaulter were turned over to the bank, and it is thought the clear loss will not exceed $75,000. During the period in which the mal-application was going on, the fact was concealed from the bank by means of false entries.

The Astronomical Expedition.—The astronomical party bound for Labrador in the coast survey steamer Bibb, under command of Lieut. Com. Murray, arrived at Sidney, Cape Breton, on the 24th inst. and in half a day from New York. The steamer sealed that gulf and left the following evening. No ice is reported in the Straits of Belle Isle, a circumstance which favors the expedition reaching its destination.

The Hon. L. Q. C. Lamar has accepted the position of Professor of Ethics on the Mississippi University, and has written a letter declining a re election to Congress from the first district of the state.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The news from Europe received since our last issue, though not particularly important is nevertheless interesting. The following is a brief but comprehensive summary.:

From England there is nothing of importance. It was the general belief that the new Russian loan in London would prove a failure. From France we learn that the Emperor has appointed Prince Napoleon Bonaparte as President of the Imperial Privy Council, in place of his deceased father, Jerome Bonparte; also that the relations between France and Prussia were daily becoming more friendly, and that the Prince Regent of Prussia was about to visit the camp of Chalons.—Advices from Lisbon state that the Portuguese Ministry had resigned in consequence of some misunderstanding with the king.—From Vienna we learn that the British Ambassador has intimated to the Austrian government the intention of England to take part in the Conference on the Swiss question. Austria is willing to assist, but denies that Sardinia has any right to be present. From Sicily the news is that Garibaldi's Provisional Government had not satisfied the expectations of the people, and consequently popular demonstrations had taken place. The latest news from Naples is that on the 26th ult., the populace marched through the principal streets of the city, shouting "Garibaldi forever! The annexation forever!! Death to the police!!!" On the 25th, the police stations were pillaged in the day time, and some forty agents were killed or wounded.—The Government was still making preparations to carry on hostilities. A proclamation promising reforms to the people was issued, but did not meet the satisfaction of the people. There is no news of importance from Rome.

India advices from Bombay to the 24th of May, represent that the sickness appeared to be abating. It was hoped that the monsoon, then close at hand, would terminate the most sickly season witnessed for many years.

A correspondent assures the United Service Gazette that unless the British Government immediately issues a commission for investigating Free Masonic, and devising means for the prevention of the decay of the oak tree by the insects that produce the gall nuts, there will not, in the course of a few years, be a single oak left.

A new journal of Palermo, L'Unita Italia, comes out with the following motto at the head of its programme: "One country—Italy. One King—Victor Emanuel. One hero—Garibaldi."

A writer in the National Magazine argues that the landed class in Great Britain have grown philanthropic. Their aim is to build churches, to form schools, to caution their laborers against beer shops, to send out distressed needle-women to Australia, to turn ragged boys into decent and industrious shoeblacks, and to learn St. Giles the value of a cheap bath and a clean shirt.

So generally is the superiority of the French army drill recognized, that the Duke of Cambridge, Commander-in-Chief of the English forces, has just issued a circular ordering every English army regiment to practice the manœuvres of the French light infantry, the recent campaign in Italy having demonstrated the advantage of the method.

The Spanish journals record that a certain Senor Marta has contrived to write out the whole novel of Don Quixote upon a single sheet of paper, such as the Spaniards use for making their cigarettes. This task occupied two years of hard work with the microscope, and has cost the writer the sight of one of his eyes.

We see it stated that at Queen Victoria's levee, on the 20th of June, Mr. Dallas presented Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, of Boston, and Major J. G. Barnard, of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army.

The King of Calabria.—Eyo Honesty II, King of Calabar, Western Africa, has just had completed for him, in Liverpool, a steamer of about two hundred tons, in size and form similar to a British gunboat. It is almost one hundred feet long and thirty-six horse power, draws four feet and a half, and is fitted up internally with great magnificence. It is designed for war and commercial purposes; and is to cruise in rivers and bays, as well as deep water. Eyo Honesty is said to be worthy of his kingly appellation, he's a convert to the Scotch Church, and an efficient co-operator with the American and British missionaries on the West coast of Africa. He is twenty-eight years of age, and is a consistent and steady opposer of the Mormon and less often practice of polygamy. The event is significant, showing, in unmistakable language, the progress of civilization and the arts among the savage tribes.

A Heroine in Sicily.—A private letter from Messina, published in the London Morning Post, contains the following: "On the 7th we beheld, arriving from Catania, the entire garrison of Catania, as well as the movable column, united with the same, in all about five or six thousand men of every kind, commanded by Tomase Clary. These troops had been attacked in Catania by the people, and after several days of constant firing, some four or five hundred of the royal soldiers were killed, while the loss on the part of the insurgents was comparatively insignificant. The soldiers themselves say, that one of the nuns, from the window of her cell, killed more soldiers than 20 venture to state. She shot with an augur an aim as the most practiced Alpine huntsman, and never missed one. The colonel ordered that they should fire in platoons against the windows, but in vain. The heroine remained unscathed, and still kept firing away, killing her man with every shot she fired."

Mexico.—Mr. McLane, United States minister to Mexico, who arrived at Mobile on the 15th, in the steam ship of war Brooklyn from Vera Cruz, passed through this city on the 16th, on his way to Washington. He confirms the report of the defeat of Miramon by Oguzon near Guadalajara. It appears that Miramon had in consequence to abandon that city, which was subsequently occupied by the liberals. Miramon, by last accounts, was at Lagos, between Guadalajara and Guanajuato, endeavoring to make his way back to the city of Mexico. At the capital there was no material change. The foreign representatives, with the exception of Sr. Pacheco, the newly arrived Spanish Minister, still persisted in their refusal to hold diplomatic intercourse with the Government of Miramon.

France and our Naturalized Citizens.—It is said that the French government have taken action upon a question of considerable interest to this country. We are told that one of the tribunals of the department of the Lower Rhine, acting probably under instructions from the Minister of Foreign Affairs, has decided that a native of that department, who emigrated to this country, became a citizen, then went back and was imprisoned, as owing military service to France, should be discharged. The decision, therefore, concedes the right of a Frenchman to expatriate himself. It is said that it is given, not as a special favor or as an exceptional act, but as a renunciation of the claims of the French government upon men who have legally become citizens or subjects of a foreign government. We hope that this report of the action of the French government upon a question of such importance to this country is true, for we fear that it is not altogether.

Mr. J. Lothrop Motley, the American historian of the Dutch Republic, received the degree of D. C. L. from the University of Oxford at the late Commencement. Among the other recipients of the honor were Lord Brougham and Captain Sir F. L. McClintock.

Speaking of the turmoil in Italy, the Paris correspondent of the New York Commercial Advertiser says that at Naples, Rome, and Venice, every step Garibaldi takes is watched with the greatest interest, and the people are waiting, with ill-concealed impatience, the moment of their own deliverance.—The revolutionary committees everywhere are organizing to aid their great apostle of liberty when he arrives, and at this moment there is no one who doubts that the delivery of all Italy is close at hand.

Twenty thousand men of the large army of Volunteers, recently enrolled in England, were reviewed by the Queen in Hyde Park on the 23d ult. They are described as equal, in culture and strength, in bearing, in step, in order, and all that is supposed to be difficult of acquisition, to any army of veterans.

We learn from the English papers that it has been officially intimated to Lord Clyde, Commander-in-chief in India, that he will be presented with the baton of a Field Marshal shortly after his return to England.

Mr. Daniel O'Connell, at Derrynane Abbey, grandson of "the Liberator," after having completed his course of study under Mr. Hansom, the eminent British architect, and improved his observation by inspecting the best specimens of church architecture in classic lands, has determined to commence his profession in Dublin as an architect. No one will dissent from the opinion that it is most creditable to the good sense of the young gentleman that he desires to devote his active and intelligent mind to practically useful objects, although possessing an independent patrimony. Mr. O'Connell fills this year the office of high sheriff of his native county of Kerry.

Improvements in Canada.—The Canadian Minister of Finance, in submitting his estimates for the current year, surveys the present condition of the Province, and finds evidence that the reverses of the last two years are to be succeeded by prosperity. The effects of speculation and of the bad harvest are passing away. The deficiency in the revenue, which was over two and a half millions of dollars in 1858, was reduced to $151,000 in 1859; and there is reason to expect further improvement. The post office is expected to be self-sustaining this year, and hereafter. The entire expenditure of the Government for the year 1860, is estimated at something less than $14,500,000.

Napoleon has ordered a statue of Joan of Arc to be erected on the right bank of the river Oise, opposite the old bridge of Compiegne, the identical spot where the heroine was captured by the English on the 23d of May, 1430.

The Cotton mill of Messrs. Mayall, situated at Mossley, about midway between Manchester and Huddersfield, and one of the most extensive spinning mills in England, was destroyed by fire on the 22d ult. It had 120,000 spindles, mostly with the latest improvements, and a quality of yarn was spun in it which generally commanded a good market. The loss is estimated at $500,000 to $750,000. A great number of people were thrown out of work by the occurrence.

The fallen man in France recently expired, near Rouen, at the age of seventy-one, being M. Charles Grael d'Imbreville of Neufe, Normandy, who founded, and for many years carried on, some extensive glass works at that place. His stature was nearly seven feet six inches English, and his body was stout in proportion. In early life he entered the imperial army as a private soldier, and soon gained the rank of sub lieutenant. He was present in the battles of Wagram and Moscow. At one time he was a prisoner of war, and, having fallen ill, was sent to the hospitals of Koudsberg. This hospital was sacked by the Russians, and M. Grael was thrown out into the street, and he passed a whole night in the snow with scarcely any covering. He, however, recovered, and returned to France. His glass works were of such importance that King Louis Philippe several times visited them.

It is announced in a Paris paper that it is intended to restore to the Rue de la Chaussee d'Antin the name of Rue du Mont Blanc, which it received by a decree in the year 1792, when Savoy was first annexed to France. This is the eighth time within less than 200 years that the name of this street has been changed.

The French government, it is reported, is about to abolish the passport system. That would be a step in the right direction, and would go far to strengthen the Emperor's popularity at home and abroad.

The Danish government has recently had its attention directed to the vast importance to its trade and commerce of constructing a ship canal across the Isthmus of Holstein, so as to connect the waters of the Elbe with those of the Baltic, and we understand that it has granted a concession for that purpose to a wealthy German company. Vessels engaged in the Baltic trade will, by this ship canal of, say fifty miles in length, be saved a tedious and dangerous navigation of over a thousand miles around the Skagerrack and down the Sound—a navigation in which millions, worth of property and hundreds of lives are annually sacrificed.

The London Gazette contains an order in Council, dated the 7th of March last, declaring that in the event of hostilities with China, England and France will act in strict conformity with the maritime law, and extend its application to neutral Powers. In ships of neutral Powers, the flag of any such Power shall cover the enemy's goods, except contraband of war. Neutral goods, except contraband of war, not to be liable to capture under the enemy's flag. English and French subjects, during hostilities, to be allowed to trade at all the Chinese ports; and all goods or merchandise, not contraband of war, and being the property of English or French subjects, captured in Chinese vessels, to be restored upon proof to the owners.

The judicial statistics of England and Wales, for the year 1859, have just been published. It appears that there are in the kingdom not less than 30,530 professional thieves; 37,685 suspected persons constantly under the eye of the police; and 28,352 vagrants, having no visible means of support—or, in all, 101,985 criminals at large.

Central America.—The Panama Star learns that the Congress of Costa Rica has voted $10,000 for a survey of the Atlantic coast, in the hope of discovering a secure harbor. Mr. Thomas F. Meagher (for A. W. Thompson and associates) has concluded a contract with the Government for the construction of a railroad between Bocas del Toro and Punta Mala; the privilege is for ninety years. It is thought that Congress will confirm the concession with certain modifications.

Peru.—Advices from Peru state that the U. S. sloop of-war Wyandotte, had arrived at Callao, instructed to demand a settlement of the affair of the ships Lizzie Thompson and Georgiana; also the settlement of the claims of our citizens. The Peruvian Minister of the Foreign Affairs hesitates. It is therefore probable that our Government will have to resort to force. The difficulty between France and Peru has been adjusted; but not till after the bombardment of Callao was threatened.

POLITICAL.

The United States Senate.—The Senators whose terms expire in 1861, and whose places are to be filled by the next Legislatures of their States, are Messrs. Fitzpatrick, of Alabama; Johnson, of Arkansas; Gwinn, of California; Foster, of Connecticut; Yulee, of Florida; Iverson, of Georgia; Trumbull, of Illinois; Fitch, of Indiana; Harlan, of Iowa; Crittenden, of Kentucky; Slidell, of Louisiana; Green of Missouri; Clark, New Hampshire; Seward, of New York; Clingman, of North Carolina; Pugh, of Ohio; Lane, of Oregon; Rigler, of Pennsylvania; Hammond, of South Carolina; Collamer, of Vermont; and Barbee, of Wisconsin—13 Democrats, 7 Republicans, and 1 American.

The New Orleans Courier states that the Hon. Miles Taylor is now avowedly a candidate for the United States Senatorship, in opposition to Senator Slidell.

From all parts of the Union we have accounts of the preparations of parties for the approaching Presidential contest. They are too voluminous for even a brief summary of them here. Ratification meetings and State Conventions, and the calling of such, are the order of the day. Meantime the partizan papers have fairly commenced the usual sharp shooting of the Presidential campaign, and the indications point to a very animated, probably very embittered, contest. We shall watch the progress of events, and record such developments as are of general interest. At present we may mention that the Douglas National Committee has declared emphatically against all coalition electoral tickets.

The Republicans of Missouri have nominated a full State Ticket, headed by James B. Gardenhire, of Pike county, for Governor.

LITERARY GOSSIP.

The new work by Dr. Holland, the "Timothy Titcomb" of universal notoriety, is entitled "Miss Gilbert's Career." According to report, it will contain some sharp hits at the prevailing novelties of opinion on female education and development. It is now preparing for publication.

Messrs Thomas Constable & Co., of Edinburgh, are declining the publishing business in favor of Messrs. Edmonston & Douglas, a rising young house, who will succeed to Messrs. Constable's publications, including the works of Hugh Miller, and other books of large circulation. Mr. Thomas Constable is a son of the "prince of publishers," Archibald Constable, the friend of Scott, and carries on a large printing business.

It is related by Mr. Everett, in his life of Mr. A. Clarke, that Mr. Wesley at his death left a copy of Shakspeare's Works in his library, the margins of which were filled with manuscript notes by himself; and that one of his executors, Mr. Pawson, burned the volume, for fear the fact would be known, and produce to the injury of society and the fame of Mr. Wesley.—What Vandalism! What a loss to the world of letters! Could that precious work be recovered it would be worth a fortune.

The fourth volume of the great work of Professor Gervinus, "History of the Nineteenth Century," is announced. It includes the periods of the Congress of Troppau, Laybach, and Verona, (1820-22,) and is represented as abounding in interesting disclosures respecting the intrigues of Russia to bring Europe within the unduly and disciplined surveillance of the Absolutist Powers. It also throws much light on the Italian policy of Metternich and Austria.

A valuable collection of English and foreign manuscripts was to be offered for sale in London this month. The catalogue enumerates two important documents having reference to the history of Shakspeare, being the lease of his house at Whitefriars, formerly in his possession, and a trust deed to the uses of his will. The collection is devoted in a great measure to the history of the great Napoleon, of whose manuscripts there are some hundreds, besides those of his generals and the statesmen of the period, as also numerous documents of the emperor.

The distinguished African explorer, M. du Chaillu, has in press at New York, a narrative of his explorations in Western Africa—to be got up in handsome style, with numerous illustrations by the author.

Longman & Co., of London, give notice of the speedy appearance of several attractive books. Among them are—at a standard character—"History of Constitutional and Legislative Progress in England from the accession of George III.," by T. L. May, clerk assistant to the House of Commons; Sir Lawrence Peel's "Sketch of the Life and Character of his cousin) Sir Robert Peel;" "Historical and Chronological Encyclopedia for students and General Readers," by B. H. Woodward, F. S. A.

The Law Faculty of the University at Jena, in the Grand Duchy of Saxe-Weimar, Germany, has conferred on Horace Dresser, of New York, the degree of LL. D.

Mr. H. B. Dawson, author of the "Battles of America," has had intrusted to him by the family the entire manuscript correspondence and papers of the Hon. M. L. Tompkins, Vice President of the United States and Governor of the State of New York, to be employed in a memoir, which Mr. Dawson is now engaged on.

The death of Mr. Glover, Librarian to Queen Victoria, has led to an inquiry respecting the probable appearance of the "Stuart Papers" in the royal collection. The first volume of an intended publication of them, comprising "Bishop Atterbury's Private Correspondence," was edited by the gentleman just deceased in 1847, and since that time no further progress has been made in the work. This is regretted by historians, as the collection, being the private property of the Royal Family, is not accessible to inquirers, like the stores of the State Paper and Record Offices, and the mass of material it comprises for the elucidation of the history of the last century is unequaled in curiosity and extent.

The English Language.—At the recent anniversary of the Royal Literary Fund in London, the Lord Bishop of St. David's said in illustration of the remark that our language had not lost either in compass or force, through the hands which now used it, that "a few years ago in the Royal Academy of Berlin, a most illustrious German philologist recorded it as his deliberate opinion that the language of Shakspeare was destined to become universal; that its copiousness, its compactness, and its good sense, fitted it for that purpose in a higher degree than any other living tongue, that of his own German fatherland not excepted."

Mr. Bigelow, one of the editors of the New York Evening Post, who has lately returned from Europe, is said to be preparing for publication a book of travels.

Wm. M. McDonald, Esq., of Winchester, has been selected by the Virginia Historical Society to prepare for publication a history of the John Brown foray.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

We learn that the Rev. Thomas N. Ralston, author of the Elements of Infidelity; who some years since left the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, for the Episcopal Church, has recently left the Episcopal Church for the Methodist Episcopal. He expects, we are told, to travel in one of the Illinois Conferences.

The Rev. Dr. Sehon, Corresponding Secretary of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South, was in New York at last accounts, attending to the interests connected with the Society.

The Bible in the Schools in India.—One of the most interesting young noblemen in England is the Duke of Marlborough. Scarcely thirty years of age, he is beginning to take an active part in the religious societies which are the glory of Great Britain. He has given notice that he will, at no distant day, call the attention of Parliament to the state of education in India, especially to the exclusion of the Bible from the schools and colleges s

Poetry.

PLEADING.

BY ELLA S. HALL.

Along this barren wilderness
I journey day by day,
Oft filled sometimes with weariness,
I falter in the way;
So needy of thy tenderness,
I dare not cease to pray.

Though faithless and undutiful,
I still look up to thee;
The promises are beautiful
Which in thy Word I see;
Oh, wilt thou still be merciful
To erring ones like me?

My tear-wet sacrifice I bring,
And lay it at thy gate,
My poor and simple offering,
Unworthy and unmeet;
Accept it, Lord, remembering
Thy promise, I entreat.

These earthly winds are pitiless
That round me roughly blow,
These storms are wild and merciless,
And make me shiver so;
Remove not, too, thy kindliness,
But shield me as I go.

And often do the shadows come
Across my eager sight;
They grow so dark and burdensome,
I cannot see the light;
The way is rough and wearisome;
Oh, wilt thou make it bright?

Along this barren wilderness,
Be near me day by day,
To comfort me when, comfortless,
I falter in the way,
To shelter me when, shelterless,
I look to thee and pray!

BY FANNY SHELDON.

Chapter XI.

"For she is all simplicity,
A creature soft and mild,
Though on the eve of womanhood,
In heart a very child."

Ellen Carlton was a sweet, amiable girl with whom Alline had long been intimately acquainted. Ellee loved Alline devotedly, and seemed never happier than when seated by her side, listening to her earnest conversatioe and often pious counsel. Alline loved to teach the young creature how best to bear the lile and petty vexetious of life, from which none are entirely exempt; and, often when not fully satisfied how to act, or when in doubt as to what was right, she would say:

"I will ask Alline, she always knows; I will go and see her."

As she entered Alline's little parlor, fatigued from walking, one evening, with her bonnet thrown carelessly over her arm, her long flowing curls dishevelled by the wind, and her eyes shining with a brighter light than usual, Alline thought she had never seen aught so lovely.

"Come in, Ellen," she said, as she rose and imprinted a warm kiss on the pure white brow.

"Alline, I have come again for yoe to tell me what to do, for really I do not know."

"Well, Ella, dear, what is it? Is it something yon doubt the propriety of doing, for I will never believe that Ellen Carlton would do that which she deemed to be wrong, if convinced that it is so, though she does try to make me believe she is a self-willed, spoilt child?"

"Well, Alline, I am all this and much more, I assure you. I came to tell you, dear Ally, what I have told to no other as yet. I wish to know your opinioe before anything of it is said to others. Edward Lealle loves me, Alline. He has told me so. Now, I heard some time ago, before I was fully grown, that he was engaged to that pale, silent, melancholy Miss West, that lives in that very gloomy-looking old house npon the hill. I know not whether this is true or not; but his family deey it, and I cannot believe myself that he ever had so little taste.—What do you think of it, Alline?"

"Ellen, do you love him? Are your affections engaged?"

"Yes, Alline, I do love him. Bnt yon have not answered my question. Tell me if yon believe he ever loved Emma West."

"What do yoe wish to know this for, Ellen? Seppose he did once love her, what has that to do with his loviog yon now?"

"O, Alline! I do not know but that I should not be satisfied with the second love of any one. He has my first, I cannot be happy if he gives me only the collected fragments of a first love, gathered from a saddseed heart.—O no, I cannot, will eot believe this!"

"Then do not believe it if it makes yon unhappy. Edward Lealle is a noble man, Ella, and deserves your warmest thoughts; he will make you happy. He is able to guide your doubtful mind, and to sustain yoer feeble steps through life. Think not lightly of this, Ellen. He may have loved before; no doubt he has; yet, he loves you, or he would never have told you so. This should be no obstacle to your happiness or his. If you love him, and your parents are pleased, let nothing induce you to trifle with his feelings or your own. Seek to be worthy of him, for any girl might be proud of Edward Lealle's second love."

"Well, Alline, you are right. I did feel a little prond, and my vanity was hurt at the thought of his being, perhaps, the cast-off town of another."

"And what if this were so? You should be only glad that you were better able to appreciate him than Emma West was, and rejoice that in the discarded, cast-off stone you found a jewel."

"You have made me happy again, Alline; this is just what I wished you to say. Bnt I have oot told what I came to tell. Brother Frank returns to-morrow. You know how it has been a long time since we saw him; he has been to Europe to complete his professional education. He arrived in New York a few days ago, and is now on his way home."

As Ellen uttered this sentence, Alline's cheek flushed, and though she averted her tell-tale face, Ellen knew she was delighted at the idea of meeting, so soon, one whom she had loved from very childhood.

Frank Carlton was a noble-spirited boy when he first met Alline; and though she was but a child, Frank loved her for her mild, sweet temper, and modest, unassuming manners, which made her a favorite with all who knew her. She had been, from his boyhood, the guiding star of his destiny; he formed no plans, dreamed of no futere with which Alline was not connected. Before leaving home he had sought her and told his love. She had acknowledged her deep interest in him, and bade him strive to be all that her fond heart felt confident that he was capable of attaining, and promised, if he returned the same in heart and mind, to share his hoeors with him, or to soothe his disappointments and comfort his sorrows, if these instead became his portion. And thoeghts of this early friend had ever cheered her darkeeed lot, and shed brightness oe many an hour that would have been, bet for this, rayless indeed.

She remained seated long after Ellen had left her, her eyes fixed apoe vacancy, her mied filled with bright visions and glowing hopes of the future. Her heart beat with rapturous joy.

"Frank, dear frank," she murmured, "how hevs I longed for thy return! how may I ever repay you for your constancy, your devotion?"

While lost thus in bright dreams of a future whose horizon was illumined by the love of Frank Carlton, Edgar Glanville entered and seated himself by her. So absorbed was she in her own thoughts, that she scarcely noticed him until he spoke; and his deep, rich-toned voice fell in low sounds on her ear.

"Miss Elwin, I am soon to leave this village, where I have spent so many pleasant hours. I regret leaving many here with whom I have been associated as pastor and friend. Need I say that in leaving you, Miss Elwin, I leave all that my heart holds most dear. I have watched with yon aroned the sick bed of yonr dying mother, wept with yon and mingled my prayers with yours, and in happy social converse beguiled the tediousness of many a lonely hour; eed thus, in constant association with you, have learned to love yoe, Alline. I had thought that never again would my heart be bound by ties stronger than those of friendship, for I must tell you something of my past life, though it may influence you to reject the love which is eborbing my very being. But, oh, Miss Elwin! tell me eot that the hope of possessing your love is valu; for my heart has known disappointment once, and shrinks from avse the memory of that bitter hour. From my boyhood I was ettached to ono whose mild, religious life I heve never seee equalled by any but yourself. Fair as spring flowers, she was destined to fade away even sooner then they. Pere and innocent in her life, guileless in her nature, she seemed ever wrepped in pleasant visions; she seemed to be over welting her time to go. She loved me and her memory liegers around my heart as the sweet odor of summer roses.

"'Tell him,' she said, 'in his angulsh,
Whose he hears that I am gone,
That the bitterness of dying
Was to leave him here alone.'"

For, Alline, I heve no parents, eo brother or sister, and no home. I know thet in asking you to share my lot, I cancot promise you a life of pleasure, a life whose sky will ever be bright; but, oh! es far as humen love can shield, as far as human strength cen eid yon, yon shall be shielded and protected. Speak to me, Alline,—tell me if I may hope, if I am beloved!"

"Mr. Glanville, I em deeply grieved thet this should have happened. I have never dreemed thet yoe felt more than momentary interest in me. It pains me exceedingly to be compelled to wound one so much esteem. Flattered by your admiration, and far from being insensible to this the highest compliment you can bestow, I must tell yon I love another. I regard your esteem, Mr. Glanville, as a precious boon, and I cannot hear the thought that these few fleeting hours, this short intercourse should be prodnctive of pain to you; bet, even as yourself, from childhood I have been betrothed to another; he has been absent from his home and friends for many months, bet is now returning home. Think kindly of me; divest me of all imaginery charms, and think of me as a sister, for I would be proud indeed to fill a sister's place in your heart. Would thnt yoe were my brother, thet I might soothe your sorrows, Edgar, for I would not have you forget me!"

Edgar had sat as if sinceed by the words thnt had fallee so nexpectedly and so calmly upon his ears. His face became very pale, and his lectures rigid with deepair; drops of perspiration stood upon his brow. Alline had turned aside, for she could not bear to witness the suffering she had wrought. Tears flowed from her eyes.

"Why," thought she, "am I so troubled, so perplexed—I would retain his friendship, and it is indeed difficult to discard his love?"

He arose, and taking her hand, he faltered forth his farewell.—

"Miss Elwin, at some future period, when I have learned to still the wild throbbing of this tumultuous heart, I may be able to accept your generous offer. Yes, the time may come when I mey think of you as a sister, but not now.

"Oh! ever thus, from childhood's hour,
I've seen my fondest hopes decay."

Farewell! May peace and happiness ever be yours! I can never forget you."

"Forget thee!" he murmured to himself, "no; you might as well

"Bid the torrent flowing
Turn backward to its wild and unknown source,
Bid the stern tempest through the forest blowing
Stay but a moment in its onward course,
Bind with a silken chain the fleeting hours,
That glide in silence through each summer day;
Call back to freshness last year's faded flowers,
Or still the dashing of the ocean spray."

And thus they parted—he to go to other scenes and stronger climes, there to engage in the duties of his mission with more devoteduess; perhaps, in distant lands to find a grave, with no kindred heart to mourn for him, but

"May we not hope that nature's deathless ties Renewed, refined, shall triumph in the skies."

FISHING.

MR. EDITOR: Some people denounce angling as cruel sport, but I never had any scruples in taking the finny tribe, as I believe that our all-wise Creator intended them for our use and enjoyment. A pleasant fishing party now and thee contributes not a little to our earthly pleasure. Almost sacred to me on memory's page, is the remembrasce of the last happy houre I spent with my beloved mother-in-law, at a fishing party on Lake C—. We had removed from a pleasant neighborhood into S— swamp, of which I had never entertained any very ngreeable ideas, having always been altogether anti-swampish in my notions. But as the Bible says, as well as the minister that united es, that I must obey my husband, there was no afternative left but to emigrate to the place of my aversion. Our new home, however, was quite a pleasant one in many respects. The yard was adorned with a variety of beautiful shrubs and trees; and just in front of the house lay a quiet lake, and on its bank stood a magnificent water oak, whose dense foliage formed ne impenetrable shade, ned under which, with our little ones, we often spent the hours of sultry noon, and always found it a cool and pleasant retreat. The lake abounded in fish.—Frequently we gathered our angling apparatus and sallied out to enjoy the sport, and so numerous were the beautiful speckled perch and trout that we often returned in no honr or two with fifty or sixty of the little flounders, which, nicely served, made a dish not be discarded by the most fastidious epicure. Although our new home was in many respects a pleasant one, yet we had no Church privileges whatever, and were generally almost destitute of society, except what our own little household afforded; consequently we had a dreary time, as I thought. After we had been established in our new home some three or four months, my husband announced to me one evening that there was to be a fishing party on Lake C—the next day, composed mostly of some of our old friends and relatives from A—; and, said he, they wish us to meet them there. Would you like to go? Of course my ready response was, "Yes, dear, I shall be delighted."—So next morning we started. It was a lovely morning in May. The birds seemed striving to pour forth their sweetest trilling notes, and all nature seemed gay and gladsome. A pleasant drive of two hours brought us within sight of our friends, and we were very soon clasped in the loving embrace of dear mother G—, and saluted with warm greetings from the other dear friends. Ah! these are verdant oases in the desert of life, and we scarcely know how to appreciate the society of warm and loving hearts, with other privileges, social and religious, until deprived of them. In a short time after our arrival—enough of the finny tribe having been taken to gratify the "fishy" palates of our anglers—we spread our pic nic repast under a beautiful shade of that lovely lake, whose peaceful, placid bosom can scarcely be surpassed by the famous Loch Lomond, of Scottish renown. The Rev. Dr. H—, of W— circuit, with his young and amiable wife, formed part of our happy group, and contributed to the general enjoyment by their cheerful good humor. The repast ended, the greater part of our friends resumed their angling, though to me dear mother G—'s sunny smiles and cheerful conversation was far preferable. But the winged hours sped swiftly by, and we were soon reminded that we must take the parting hand. Ah! little did I think that it would be the last time on earth that I ever should behold the smiling countenance of my beloved and now sainted mother-in-law, whom I loved with a daughter's devotion. But thus it proved; though we can look forward to the happy greeting that awaits us in the Paradise of God.

MAGGIE.

THE TENSAS COUNTRY.

MR. EDITOR: I have just been reading "Rambles in Arkansas," and thinking a few stray thoughts from our wild-wood home would be acceptable, I send them to you. This is a beautiful country; the home of the Advocate.—But a few short years ago, the forest covered it, and it was the home of the Indian. The age of civilization came; fields were cleared; the abodes of educated men now stand where, but a little while ago, the cane stood. The savage yell is no longer heard, but the shrill whistle of the iron horse, as he speeds onward in his course, the annihilator of distance. Now we hear not the war-song and dances of the aborigines; all that is left to remind us of the past are the beautiful mounds, which are dotted aver our valley homes like little mountains.—Now, we have the cheerful harvest home of the farmer; the fearless hunter, with his rifle; the hardy backwoodsman, with his axe. They have accomplished their work, and may we not hope that soon the itinerant preacher, with Bible and hymn-book, will have accomplished his work! That is all that we need to make this the garden spot of Louisiana. An effort is now being made to build churches here, and I think if the ball is once put in motion, it will roll onward, and that all our hearts will rejoice together, and give praise to Him "who doeth all things well."—What has become of your "Bible Pictures?" My little one misses them, and wants to know if the editor hasn't rested long enough, and hopes his little children are all well.

BURIAL CUSTOMS.

Many of the funeral customs and ceremonies of the olden time were enmeaning, coarse and revolting, but others were simple, touching, significant and beautiful.—The most ancient of these numerous rites, sprung from poetic feeling, delicate sensibilities and elegant culture, and these but slightly altered have survived through the centuries. Of the pretty and pathetic customs, none is more ancient and worthy to be perpetuated than the practice of strewing flowers, boughs of certain trees, and sprigs of certain plants over the shrouded corpse, the bier and the grave. The Romans scattered roses over the body and the tomb, and in reading this pious service to the living memory the Greeks made use of amaranth, parsley and myrtle. The primitive Christians decked the coffins in bays, or decorated them with garlands of willow or cypress; they also crowned these who died in the morning of life with wreaths of flowers, and chaplets of some scented evergreen were borne in front of the solemn train by the dearest friends of the departed, and, on reaching the grave, the whole company gathered round it, and each threw into it roses and sprigs of rosemary, or of some other plant sacred to the mournful occasion.

In some places the white rose was always planted on the tombs of young maidens, and of unmarried men who were cut down in the flower of their age. And when a virgin or young maid died, the way that led to the resting place of the sleeper was scattered over with roses and evergreens by the youths of both sexes. It was the custom, at a very early day, for husbands to strew violets, roses, lilies, and purple flowers on the graves of their wives. The cemeteries throughout France are beautified with garlands of the simple ever-blooming immortelle.—The inhabitants of the North of England throw sprigs of box-wood, supplied at the house of the dead, into the grave, just before the coffin is lowered into it. The simple people of the rural districts of Wales exhibit their tender remembrance of the departed by garnishing their tombs with slips of hay or yew; and in other places the sacred spot is decorated with fragrant flowers.

The Welsh are conspicious for the pains they manifest for their silent cities. They tend these holy restingplaces with a diligent hand, keeping them, in the freshness and warmth of their living love, clear of grass and weeds—so that their church-yards have the appearance of gardens, under the favorable influence of large taeums and elegant taste. No stranger hand is ever suffered to uproot an intruding weed, or plant a bush or herb in these hallowed enclosures. The simple stones that mark the spots where the loved repose are whitened three times a year, and at those seasons when the tender token of cherished affection is exhibited, flowers and twigs of living green are strewed over the graves. All seemless flowers and plants are religiously excluded from these beautiful gardens.

Among the sweet breathed children of the soil that are allowed to mingle their beauties in these grounds, sacred to tears and soft remembrances, are "the pink and polyanthus, sweet-williams, gilliflowers and carnations, mignionets, thyme, hyssop, camomile and rosemary." The corpse is covered with odoriferous flowers, both before and after it is placed in the coffin, and rose and sweet-scented plants are sprinkled over the room in which it lies awaiting the burial. The nearest relatives and dearest friends conceive it to be their bounden duty and high privilege to keep constant vigil by the cold sleeper, and so potent is this beautiful sentiment, "that probably there is no instance upon record, as to leave a dead body in the room by itself for a single minute, in the interval between the death and burial. Such a violation of decency would be remembered for generations." As a proof of the deep and enduring affection of this poetic people, the author from whom we have just quoted, tells us that his father-in-law's grave, in Crowbridge Church, has been adorned with flowers "every Sunday morning for twenty years."

The custom of placing coronals of flowers fresh from the bush, upon the brows of virgins who were nailed away in the bloom of youth, carries the mind to the days that are stained with the blood of the Saints who went to their reward from the block or the Roman headsman. At a later period and for many centuries chaplets of roses from which was suspended a pair of gloves cut out of white paper, were carried before the bier of a young maiden by a virgin who had seen the same number of summers as the beautiful bride of death. After the sad exequiee were over, the garland and gloves were hung over the pew formerly occupied by the pure warshipper. What touching remembrances of the shortness and uncertainty of life were these delicate mementoes of departed beauty and loveliness.

Those flowery garlands and white gloves are thus alluded to by Miss Seward in her elegant elegy on the venerable church in the village of Hyam, in Derbyshire:

"Now the law beams with paper garlands hung,
In memory of some village youth or maid;
Draw the soft tear, from thrill'd remembrance sprung,
How oft my childhood marked that tribute paid!

The gloves suspended by the garland's side,
White as its snowy flowers, with ribbons tied,
Dear village! long these wreaths tuneeat spread,
Simple memorial of the early dead."

BIBLICAL INSTITUTE IN BREMEN.—The friends of Methodist Missions in Germany have founded a Biblical Institute in Bremen, for the better preparing of young men for the work in that country. The Northern General Conference has decided to send out a minister to act as Director, and Editor of books and periodicals."

How lasting is the influence of pious parents! Long after they are laid in the grave their memory seems to wean ne to virtue and God.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

JOSEPH GOODMAN was born in South Carolina Jan. 30th, 1793. In May, 1832, he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church under the ministry of Rev. Dr. Wightman, and until his death, April 26, 1860, remained a consistent member. For several years he was a paralytic, unable to leave his room; but his affliction proved a blessing to him. At his request prayer-meetings were frequently held in his house, and often was he unable to rejoice. The writer has known him for several years past, and can testify to his christian temper and deportment. A few days before his death he was asked if he was ready. His very prompt reply was, "I am." Doubtless he is now enjoying the rest of the weary.

B.

SOPHIA ELIZABETH, daughter of Senborn and Mary Alford, was born April 20th, 1842; was married to Mr. J. Williams December 14th, 1858; and died in Pike county, Miss., April 12, 1860. In 1854 she made a profession of religion, and connected herself with the Methodist Church. In all the relations of life she fulfilled her duties in a conscientious and christian manner. It was particularly in the domestic circle that her virtues were more especially manifested. As a wife, daughter and mistress, she beautifully illustrated the inspired description of a christian woman. Her loss is deeply felt and deplored by her afflicted family, and also by the community where she lived. She leaves one child—a very infant.

MARTHA L. HOOVEN.

J. W. CAVE died May 20, 1860, in Clarke county, Miss., of the age of 48 years. He embraced religion and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in the 28th year of his age. His life was quiet and inoffensive; he was indulgent and affectionate to his family. His physician, Rev. Dr. Dunlap, often prayed with him, and I often conversed with him concerning his future prospects; he expressed his willingness to depart. A short time before he died I asked him if he still felt that his trust was in God. His reply was in the affirmative. He leaves a wife and four children.

E. GILMORE.

THOS. V. LYLES died in Fayette county, Ala., May 20th, 1860. He was an honorable gentleman, an affectionate husband, parent, and master, and a member of the Methodist Church.—The Masonic Lodge to which he belonged met and passed the usual resolutions of regret, eulogy, and condolence with his bereaved family. The resolutions speak of him as a highly esteemed citizen and friend, and are signed by W. C. Cauron, L. D. Randolph, and J. R. Mitchell.

MRS. SUSANNA BURTON, of Calhoun county, Ala., died April 6, 1860. She was born in Chesterfield county, Va., in the year 1788; she was for 20 years or more a consistent member of the Methodist Church, evincing the purity of the Christian religion. Her death was serene and peaceful. Her life was long and eventful, but her sun gradually declined and brought a pleasing night. She has left two children, and many friends to mourn her death.

J. N. DUPREE.

LITTLE NANNIE WADE, youngest daughter of Lawrence T. and Mrs. Jane Wade, aged two years, five months and two days, died Friday, 15th inst., in Issaquena county, Miss. Farewell, dear Nannie, but not forever—we shall meet in the land of the hereafter, when, should we prove true to our trust, thou mayest rejoice at our coming!

PROGRESS OF PROTESTANTISM IN MISSISSIPPI AND THE SOUTH-WEST.—No. XXIV.

Mr. Editor—Thomas Griffin was instrumental in "turning many to righteousness," all through this country. His trophies were generally gained by a precipitate assault on the ranks of the enemy. If he took for his text, "Now therefore stand still, that I may reason with you before the Lord," his mode of reasoning was to hurl his projectiles from the armory of truth in such rapid succession that there was but little chance for a parley in the sinner's heart. He had such control of his voice that he could contract it to a conversational tone, or extend it indefinitely. He was partial to such texts as allowed him to be very discursive in his remarks, and when he commenced his discourse you could not anticipate what he was going to say, nor how he would say it. One moment he would mount you on the wing of imagination and have you whirling through the infinitude of space, all enraptured with the magnificence of the universe, and the next he would have you down in contact with the every day occurrences of life. If a man had any taste, either for the sublime or ridiculous; any love of virtue or hatred of vice, any hope of heaven or fear of hell; he could not be an uninterested hearer when Thomas Griffin, under the mighty impulses of the Spirit, preached one of his characteristic sermons. His acquaintance with human nature in all its phases was decidedly superior, his judgment was mature, his administrative talents above mediocrity, so that from the time he was eligible, he was generally kept in charge of a District. "I have read books a good deal," said he, "but I have read men and things a great deal more." The truth of this remark was verified by the quick common-sense view he took of everything that came within the range of his observation. As a Presiding Elder he was a general favorite among his preachers, who both reverenced and loved him. If they conducted themselves prudently and attended well to their work, they were sure of a high commendation at Conference, but woe betide the laggard, the imprudent, the self-conceited, or fashion-loving Methodist preacher who fell under his official censure. He was not to put an extinguisher on all such characters. I remember once two juniors were before the Conference for admission into full connection and election to Deacon's orders. One of them had acted literally on the principle that "gaining knowledge is a good thing, but saving souls is better," and in his ardent zeal, both in public and private, to bring sinners to Christ, and build up the Church in Gospel holiness, he had almost ignored the course of study. The other had dressed fashionably, figured the gentleman, filled his appointments nominally, while he neglected almost every pastoral duty; but, ambitious for advancement, he had given extra attention to the course of study. The Conference, acting on the report of the examining committee, were just going to reject the former, and advance the latter, when brother Griffin sprang to his feet, and with his peculiar bow, shrug of the shoulders, and squint of the eyes, which no one on earth need try to imitate, said, "Mr. President, some Methodist preachers remind me of a cunning scholar, who, ambitious to excel in mere scholarship, neglects every other duty, and shuts himself up with his books, and prepares for the day of examination. The preaching of such men to me is like the evening star of a frosty night, very clear, very bright, and very beautiful, but tremendously cold," and here he gave a shudder as [though a shaking ague had just seized his whole frame. The speaker continued, "Now, Mr. President, here are two cases before us: one, brother has almost literally swept the earth and skimmed the ocean (his circuit was on the Gulf coast) in quest of precious blood-bought souls, but in doing this, he has not found time to complete his course of study. The other brother has attended his regular appointments, preached his little bright, clear, cold sermons, dined on all larkeys, among the aristocracy of Red River, and then shut himself up with his books in order to pass a good examination on the course of study at Conference. I go for the man, sir, that does the work and has the souls."

Let I shall have to stop these reminiscences or extracts. Limits. Thomas Griffin and John Lane were lay delegates from the Mississippi to the General Conference, which met in Baltimore, May 1st, 1820. Both being originally from the old South Carolina Conference, they made the entire trip on horseback in order to visit relations and former acquaintances on the way. The slavery question came up as a matter of course in the General Conference, for the Yankees, after having sold what slaves they once owned, and pocketed the money, have ever since been "convinced of the great evil of slavery," and have labored, though at a safe distance, for its extirpation. The motion before the Conference on this occasion was to "prohibit slave-holders from filling official stations in the Church in future." The Northerners came down in their speeches as usual on "the great evil." Some of the Southerners replied in a rather an excusatory and supplicating tone, which met with no response in the views and feelings of brother Griffin. On the 23d of the month, when the question which had been so long and so zealously debated had to be decided upon one way or the other, brother Griffin rose with excited feelings, and, in substance, made the following speech: "Mr. President, I am willing to concede that I have lived longer than I have lived to profit, and many things have passed me unimproved. But among the few I have noticed is that of Northern men coming to the South. Sir, when they first come among us, it seems as if they could see us all damned and double-damned, rammed, crammed, and jammed into a forty-six pounder, and blown into the fiery vaults of a deep damnation, for being connected with slavery! Nay, their pious zeal would not stop there; it seems they would get on their knees and invoke the thunder-bolts of an avenging God to sink our sin-murdered souls to the lowest hell! But in twelve months time they become a little smoother on the subject, and if they contemplate a permanent stay—if they have either worth, shrewdness, or intrigue enough, they are sure to form alliances with our slave-holding families. We have young ladies in the South—charming ones too—owning no slaves, and entirely unconnected with slavery, but Northern gentlemen always seem, some how or other, to see peculiar charms in those young ladies whose parents possess the largest number of niggers." Who ever heard of a Mississippi Yankee fancying a girl that owned no slaves? Sir, if a stranger was in that gallery, he would conclude that we Southerners were a pack of cannibals, who kill and eat our slaves. We have heard much about blood-stained hands. I am almost startled, and look around for them. Where are they? I would ask a question, how came slaves into this country? Northern men, Northern money, and northern ships brought them to America. The Yankees kept them at home until they cut down their forests, and so exhausted their farms that they would scarcely grow a crop of sedge, and then, with a shrewdness and foresight peculiar to the North, they sent them to us on speculation, just as they sent us rum, and staves, and wooden nutmegs. Our fathers gave them value received, and now we are to be condemned, without mixture of mercy, for holding the same property these Northerners once possessed. It is possible, should the period arrive in the South, when our lands are worn out, we shall become very patriotic, moral and religious, like our Northern brethren, and wash our hands of slavery. We are told here that it is one of the most heaven-daring, God-provoking, hell-deserving crimes that man can commit. But I wonder when Jesus Christ came from heaven to earth to set men right, that he did not touch the subject. I wonder that the Apostles, who denounced the smallest transgression, should have entirely passed over this enormous offence. And if it be offensive and sinful to own slaves, I wish some one would just put his finger on the place in Holy Writ. If we have no difficulty in pointing to the passages where slavery is recorded and sanctioned, and rules prescribed for the owner and the owned. We are told the time has come that something must be done. The venerable man, whose remains lay under the pulpit (Bishop Asbury), and Dr. Coke, thought so many years ago, and made such a move as they thought prudence dictated, and what was the consequence? Laws were made more rigorous, and every avenue of religious instruction closed to the negro, and while he remained in the same or a worse condition in body, his mind was void of that instruction that might have saved his soul from sin. That, sir, was the result of intermeddling. Some of our brethren seem to be proud that they labor in free communities. Sir, why this ministerial pride? What has the church or ministry done to christianize the negro? Almost nothing. Policy and the Legislatures have, in all cases, moved in advance. The church should stand aloof from meddling with the social and civil relations of the negro. Her business is to christianize him. In conclusion, Mr. President, I see that there is strength enough on the anti-slavery side of this assembly to pass any resolutions they please. But here, in my place, as one of the representatives of the Mississippi Conference, I tell you I will never aid in executing them. And if the resolution now under consideration should pass, you may send ship loads of men from the North to execute it, but permit me to say in advance, whenever they come to the South and meddle with Southern institutions, they will find their situation very delicate, if not perilous in the extreme."

At the conclusion of this speech the subject was tabled, and though taken up again, was not finally acted on.

Brother Griffin located in 1823, which he said he did "with as clear a conscience as he ever drank a cup of coffee," for his bodily strength was no longer able to endure the hardships of itinerancy. Three years rest, with the care he was able to take of himself at home, so far restored his health that in 1826 he re-entered the Conference, and was continued in charge of Districts until his final location in 1833. He was a delegate to the General Conferences of 1828 and 1832. I have always been sorry that brother Griffin located, but as he often said in extenuation of his course, he had "grown old before his time," his family was large, and the government and education of his children seemed to require his presence at home; he had a great fondness for retirement, and being thrifty in his temporal affairs his resources were ample, so that he did not need the revenues of the Church. But notwithstanding all these plausible excuses for locating, I think he ought not to have done it. He ought to have had work to suit his age and providential circumstances, or he ought, when no longer able to do effective service, to have been placed on the superannuated list. We needed his presence and counsels at our annual Conferences; it would have been a pleasure to have retained his honored name on our Minutes, and handed it down to posterity accompanied with an appropriate obituary sketch of his life and labors. As it is, the concluding sentence about him in the printed Minutes is simply the answer to the question, "who have located this year?" He spent the first years of his married life in the lower valley of Pearl River; then he lived on one of the northern branches of Bayou Pierre, called White Oak; and finally he settled in the north-eastern part of Madison county, where he resided at the time of his death. He was prosperous in his secular affairs until the financial revulsion of 1838 and 1839, when he became somewhat embarrassed by endorsement, which gave him considerable anxiety and trouble. Nature, with him, was literally worn out, and he went gracefully down to his grave. Not long before his death a brother asked him to state, for the good of others, what his prospects were beyond the tomb. "I any of my friends wish to know where I have gone after my death, my life is before them, let them look at that," was his laconic reply. There is an extensive manuscript autobiography of this great and good man, written in his characteristic style, not long before his death. It was placed, not long since, by his children, in the hands of our lamented brother Drake, in order that he might use it in a work he was preparing on the history of Methodism in the South-west. I hope this manuscript will be carefully preserved, as it will be of great importance to the future historian of our Conference.

DIAMONDS OF THE FIRST WATER: LIQUID AND CRYSTAL.

BY LUTUA FONTELLE.

I stood by a window watching the oncoming storm. Nature was in one of her hustling moods, and reminded me of those notable housekeepers who render every room uninhabitable, and raise the dust from unknown retreats for the costly enjoyment of a needless rearrangement. I said so to Aunt Grace as she came and stood beside me.

"You were correct, Rosalie, in using the phrase costly enjoyment; for it puts every one on a trial of patience, and sadly shakes the kindly feeling of the inmates towards the precise, remorseless renovator. I have sometimes seen a little woman, the picture of peace and loving self-forgetfulness in her happier moments, who, when the cleaning day rolled round with cruel punctuality, put back the wavy locks from her corrugating brow, and with flushed face and nervous manner superintended the removal of every article; now, in a shrill tenor, she rebuked the carelessness or want of precision of the servants; and now, in a mournful minor key, seemed to feel herself generally aggrieved; and yet, through all, the happy, defiant, presiding genius of this new chaos evoked from disquietude."

At last Nature was satisfied with this practical reproof of bustling housekeepers, and resumed her customary quiet manner of effecting the desired changes. The wind scarce stirred the whispering leaves, the whirling dust had found its proper level, and the bounteous clouds had greatly satisfied the earth's expectancy.

"What a thrill of joy runs through the leaves as the first drops tremble on their dust-veiled surfaces! The leaves do not appear to notice how they shrink from the contact."

"No, but the little refiners bravely perform their duty, as if conscious of their inborn power to purify themselves again. Do you perceive how differently the various trees receive the welcome shower? The slender willows shrink together as in fear and carefully guard their silver lining from the pelting rain, while a little tremulous flutter stirs them momently. The stately catalpas and brilliant orange trees are made the fairer, but remain unmoved. The oak has an ancient name and a reputation for firmness. It is prepared and self-reliant, but it does not shake off roughly the delicate globules that minister to its majestic strength. They come and go at will. It only smiles more brightly in its calm dignity, spreads out more widely its broad, sheltering arms, and raises its grand head nearer to heaven. The chinquapin thrills with gratitude through every leaf. It droops its graceful clusters in its much joy, while every point of its compound leaves is tipped with diamonds. How carefully it balances these gems of 'the first water,' gazing joyously upon them."

"How beautiful! Each one receiving gladly and as gladly giving to those beneath, until the lowest rank drops its bright treasures on the thirsty earth, which in turn enriches all again. The generous givers by imparting lose not, but increase their brightness. Nature is giving one of her brilliant lectures to political economists, to all economists, and illustrating the promise of a hundred-fold return to liberal christians."

The clouds had given us their fulness and rolled rapidly away intent on other missions. The setting sun looked out from the retreating bank and touched the freshened leaves, not with the silvery light that danced among them through the day, but with a golden radiance that enhanced all beauty. The clouds forgot their leaden hues under a veil of gold and purple; the grey moss dyed its long fringes in gayer tints, and the dark orange leaves seemed dropping amber. With a last smile that crowned the darkening trees and flushed the cloud's white brow, the sun left us to brighten other lands.

"It is Rosalie's night," said Charles, after tea, and he led me to the table and opened our "Household Words." "What can you know, Rosalie, of a blind blacksmith?" he whispered, "Was he very tall and very learned?" he added, maliciously.

"Rosalie," said Grandma, "will you first read the sketch that was written in your album during your Northern tour? My childhood was passed on the banks of the Sacondaga, and while you are reading it my youth comes back to me."

I read it for her. You may read it if you like. Here it is:

As writing for an Album is to give
A page from the heart's leaves, a line withdrawn
From the mind's secret scroll, so that our friend
May see the spring of feeling and the course
Of thought, may know us and remember—
For thee, dear girl, I'll pen an hour's free thoughts
Beneath the open sky in early spring,
Alone with nature.

Morning opened brightly.
The tardy spring had come with winning smile
To cheer and serve the weary heart to life
Performance of life's duties. Childhood laughed
And gambolled in the bland sweet air that most
Have passed, in its self-sacrificing tour,
Reluctant by the South's sweet violets,
And silver orange blossoms laden with
A rich and spicy fragrance, and delayed
To gather up the delicate perfume
Of green-robed nolgonettes; and all to whom
It came blessed it, and hastened forth to inhale
Its nectared purity.

The clouds above
And the moist earth beneath had held me long
Within, until I pined, like prisoned bird,
For liberty, and now I gladly fled
To chat awhile with nature, and to learn
True wisdom from her quiet perfect ways;
But she as yet was robed in russet, garb
Of poverty; and as I moved along
The plains, once covered with rich verdure mixed
With flowers, I smiled at heart with the calm joy
The recognizance of a taste refined
Awakes.

Pure taste arrays itself in dress
Not always rich or delicately fine,
Sometimes magnificent, and simple oft,
But ever suited to the time and place
And circumstance; and nature, Taste's high model,
Errs not, save when she sometimes deigns to give
A lesson to vain mortals. Now and then,
On April day she, girl-like, dons May's mantle,
And shows it the next day "a ruined thing,"
Buds nipped, flowers torn, and withered leaves, and all
The delicate tracery of Spring's fair hand
Effaced by one rude breath, or hopeless soiled,
And sometimes keeping her rich summer veil
Too long, in one hour throws it by—soiled lace.

I leaned against a tree beside the stream,
And gazed upon the deluged plain. For north
The mountains, yielding to the gentle rays
Of Phœbus, less obliquely sent, poured forth
The wealth they, miser-like, had hoarded through Old Winter's reign, their warm shield from his frowns,
And streams of melted crystal rolled down all
Their rough or moss-spread sides unceasingly.
The river's quiet bosom sheltered far
By overhanging banks, disturbed by their Intrusion, proudly rose, forgetful of
Its sunken-like timidity, and cast
Its arms back on the land, aroused at last
From languor and from placid hidden dreams.

The night's cool breath had stayed the mountain streams,
And changeful Saconduga turned again
To hide within her high-walled home, and left
The stainless gems, that interwoven decked
Her dark-hued bosom like a star-gemmed robe,
On every shrub and blade. It was a scene
Like that of fairy land, and I half thought
To see the tiny spirit-forms gleam forth;
Perhaps they did, at least each diamond gave
The soft light back in brilliant rainbow hues.
I stood entranced, and as I gazed there seemed
A vanishing of clustered gems, now here,
Now there, and a rich melody like that
Of pearl-tongued silver bells, fell on my ear.
Now blending with the music of the birds
Above; now dying in its sweetness like
The swan's expiring song. And still I stood
With spirit stirred and inner life new given.

Again I looked, and lo! the teased pearls
Had vanished like the morning mist, and left
No trace. And thus dark Error's frost-work melts
Before the warm light of the pure in heart,
The quiet music of their ministry.

Thus gently, thus successfully through life,
May thy hand, maiden, play upon the harp
Of thousand strings, and tone them all to love—
Love of all goodness, pity of all woe,
And faith in Him who cannot change.

THE BEST WAY OF MANAGING CONTROVERSY.

Advice to those that make haste to controversy—Why we didn't publish more on Baptism and such like—Our Methodist Armory—Three advantages of the mode recommended.

An anonymous writer delivers a quiet and kind spirited lecture to an Arminian exchange on the evil of so much controversial matter in its columns—the last controversy being with the Calvinists. We quote a paragraph:

"Therefore, I say, move slowly to the field of contention. If any one wishes to know what Methodists believe about Calvinism, as they understand it, and as the masses understand it, let him read Mr. Fletcher's Checks and our standard authors on the subject. And, on the other hand, if any one wishes to know what are the doctrines of the Presbyterian Church, let him procure one of their 'Confessions of Faith,' and read it carefully. Let our Book of Discipline and the Confession of Faith journey together, and I fear not for the result of their influence."

The principle of action here recommended is an excellent one, not only for the Calvinistic, but other controversies continually arising throughout this free country, where different Churches and creeds meet face to face, or collide in their operations. If it were adopted, the Church press would be relieved of much matter that is uninteresting and unedifying to most of its patrons, and more variety, and freshness, and catholicity would be imparted to its columns.

But what are the Christian Advocates for, if not to defend the doctrines of the Church when assailed or misrepresented? They were established for defence, for indoctrination, for promoting unity of feeling and concert of action. They have many uses. The power of the religious press in moulding public opinion and spreading religious truth is just beginning to be appreciated. Whenever a new issue arises, the weekly press is ready to take hold of it—to discuss, apply, shape, or interpret it. We have Christian Advocates planted at points that command the whole field. They are ready for service. Every column is a "Long Tom," which ready writers, wherever an enemy lurks, may load to the muzzle, point, and fire off. But controversial work is not the only work nor the main work of the Church press. Every Christian Advocate ought to be a well balanced sheet, and not devoted to one or two subjects, and those treated offensively or defensively.

Now, we have a suggestion to offer, which, if accepted, will relieve our weekly papers of much dry, controversial matter, on old issues, and at the same time carry on the controversy effectively; for controversy, in its place, is useful.

There lie before us eight neatly-bound, cheap volumes, making up two series. The first series is entitled "Pamphlets for the People"—there are four volumes in it. The second series is entitled "Miscellaneous Tracts"—there are four volumes in it. The title page shows that they were published by Stevenson & Owen "for the Methodist Episcopal Church, South," in 1857. Strangely enough, there has not been much demand for them. The shelves of the Publishing House groan under them. Let us examine the first volume of Pamphlets for the People. This Note, by the Book Editor, meets you on opening it:

The renewed and persevering hostility manifested, in various quarters, to the Methodist Episcopal Church, demands from us a defence of those disciplinary and doctrinal principles which constitute the Methodist system. In order to this, we have thought it advisable to issue several series of Methodist Pamphlets for the People. The present series has especial reference to Church government. Some of the pamphlets are original, and all the rest have been taken from approved sources—such alterations and additions having been made as were necessary to fit them for our purpose. The pamphlets contained in this volume are also put up in neat packages, for the convenience of those who may wish them for gratuitous circulation.

The Editor.

Nashville Tenn., Feb. 5th, 1857.

The Contents afford such subjects as these: "Why are you a Methodist?" "Methodism not a schism." "Methodist Episcopacy." "Apostolical Succession." "Methodists have the true Sacraments." "The Rite of Confirmation Tested," etc. The writers' names are a guaranty, prima facie, that the subjects are well treated. If you doubt, read. They are the maturest thoughts of mature minds, put into the smallest compass.

Suppose a sprig of divinity, calling the Methodist Church a society, and calculating largely on the gullibility of the people, comes into your neighborhood, and proposes to set up the Church, and give you the true sacraments. He is a successor of the apostles—he is—so he would have you believe. Creeping into houses, he begins to worry the young people about receiving the "holy apostolic rite of confirmation," and so on.

What is the best course for you to pursue? Yours is a Christian community. The Methodist Church, with its scriptural doctrines and usages, was planted there in the days of your fathers. By its ministry they were called, and comforted, and several, when as yet the country was hardly recovered from the wilderness, and before these apostolic gentry, and those whose successors they truly are, had thought of stirring from their luxurious parishes. The proselyters are making some headway, and they must be met. How? Let some one take up pen hastily, and write an article for the nearest Christian Advocate on the subjects in controversy: that is the remedy, first and last thought of by many. The writer is in haste; perhaps ill informed, not posted on the argument, historically and otherwise. A weak and vulnerable argument is always to the advantage of your adversary. How much better to have these tracts on hand! They are written carefully, argued closely, prepared at leisure and with all necessary learning, and right to the point. If you have them not, send for them at once.—They cost little or nothing—60 cents a volume when bound, and when put up in packages, ten, fifteen, or twenty cents a package. Distribute the pamphlets.—Give them out, like a doctor gives pills—not indiscriminately. They will do their work. The remedy, mark you, is prompt as well as discriminating. "But," says one, "our community has no trouble on that subject.—Predestination, election, and final perseverance are all the rage among us." Very well: vol. 2 of Pamphlets for the People will suit you exactly. Get the volume (60 cts) and lend it round, after having armed yourself with its contents. Or, better still, get the package of tracts or pamphlets numbered from thirteen to twenty-four; get a good supply. Fill your locker with these shot. Then use them. Take a few samples out of this package:—"Reasons for rejecting the Calvinistic Doctrine of Election"—by Dr. Myers. "Objections to the Calvinistic Doctrine of Predestination"—by Dr. Collins. "A Dialogue between a Predestinarian and his Friend," by John Wesley. "The Calvinistic Doctrine of Imputed Righteousness unscriptural and absurd"—by Dr. Summers. "Objections to the Calvinistic Doctrine of Final Perseverance"—by Dr. Lee; etc., etc.

Perhaps you live in a Romish community, or you have been foolish enough to send your children to a Romish school, and you are alarmed now at the probable consequences. The root of bitterness springing up troubles you; and you are inquiring for some pungent counteracting argument. Or your Romanist friend is shaking in the wind, and almost ready to adopt evangelical views. Just at this crisis, you want something well tempered and well put for him. It might be difficult to find elsewhere, in so small a compass, exposures of the corruptions of Popery so thorough and so varied, and refutations of them so elaborate and yet popular, as will be found in the third volume of this series—numbering from twenty-five to forty-eight.

"You haven't struck our case yet. We live on Mill Creek, close to Hebzibah Church, within the bounds of Duck River Association, and all the cry is water, water."

Ah, friend, don't go under: there is relief for you.—Volume four is made up of brief, terse tracts, by able and experienced writers, on "The Nature, Subjects, and Mode of Baptism," "Subjects and Mode of Baptism," etc., etc. Bound up with this volume are several excellent tracts on Temperance. If you like heavier ordnance on the baptismal question, then you may easily obtain Pitts, or Slicer, or Summers, or Reese, or Chapman, or Bristow—cheap, plain, portable books.

The series of Miscellaneous Tracts is, as the title imports, directed to moral and religious subjects. Some of the tracts are elaborate and lengthy. If you will read them, you will know how to use them to advantage—just when and where they are wanted. Thus used, they cannot fail to make their mark. The reading will be a benefit to you. You will know then into whose hands to put the tract on Dancing, or Profane Swearing, or Gambling, or Going to Church, the Plea to Backsliders, etc., etc. When one considers how many souls for which Christ died have been awakened by the reading of these very tracts here put up and to be had for a few cents, he hardly knows how to excuse himself for not engaging more earnestly and steadily in their circulation—their discriminate, universal circulation. Think how these very seed, sown by other hands, have sprung up and brought forth fruit to eternal life. Then hasten to fill your hand and your lap, and sow them by the wayside, at home, among friends, everywhere. Here these tracts lie, cast-heads of them, piled up, unappropriated, waiting for hands to set them to work. They can do good, have done good—all they want is to be sent out. We are often using weaker instruments, or using none at all, while these well-tried and polished ones are neglected. They ask only for a trial, to repeat the awakenings and conversions which, under God's blessings, they have often before accomplished.

Let us return to the point we set out distinctly to make—the best way of managing controversy: Not to shun it, not to shirk it, not to yield before it, but to meet it with weapons selected from our armory, polished and tried weapons, and ready to hand, and get the victory at least cost. The method has these advantages:

1. It removes much controversial matter from the Church press, and makes room for variety, and for subjects tending directly to edification.

2. It treats the subjects in controversy more thoroughly than is usually done in the limits allowed by a weekly paper. The writers are picked men, well up to their parts, workmen that need not be ashamed, whose arguments cannot be gainsaid, and are more likely, therefore, to be an end of controversy. The same cannot be said of some crude, unfledged writers, who, with half a view of a grave subject, make haste to print.

3. The treatment is confined to the locality of the disease. Says a practical man, "Make the plaster to fit the sore." Why should ninety-nine readers have their common paper taken up with that which is of interest to the one hundredth only? There is neither justice nor reason in drugging a whole regiment because one man in it happens to be sick.

We have incurred no small amount of displeasure for declining articles, too numerous to mention, on Baptism, on the Apostolic Succession, and on Predestination, and such like. We believe the people approve our course in this, if the writers do not. We expect to continue to publish good things on these subjects, occasionally; but these are our reasons for not crowding the paper with them.—Nashville C. Advocate.

GARIBALDI AND ITALY.

BIOGRAPHY OF GARIBALDI.

The following article from the eighth volume of Appleton's Cyclopedia will furnish the reader with the most conspicuous events in the life of Garibaldi up to the close of the war between France and Sardinia and Austria. His career since then is well known to every one:

Garibaldi, Giuseppe, an Italian partisan general, born in Nice, July 4, 1806. His father educated him to his own profession, that of a mariner. From his earliest childhood he was remarkable for his affection toward his parents and sincerity to his companions; while a mere boy, at the risk of his own life, he rescued from drowning a poor washerwoman, and in after life he performed similar actions on several occasions. His second voyage was to Rome, when the condition of that capital made a deep impression on his mind, and led him into those revolutionary views which, in Feb. 1834, resulted in his exile from Italy. He first went to Marseilles, and earned his living by making voyages to various ports.—Having been left sick at Constantinople, he became a teacher till he could find an opportunity to re-embark for Marseilles, whence he sailed for Tunis and thence for Rio Janerio. At Rio he met Rosetti, with whom he entered into a commercial partnership, but soon discovered that neither of them was suited for a merchant. About this time Zambeccari arrived in Brazil from Uruguay, then fighting for her independence; becoming acquainted with Garibaldi and Rosetti, he persuaded them to espouse the cause of that republic, and Garibaldi, with twenty companions under his command, embarked in a small craft which he named the Mazzini.—In an engagement with two launches, which he beat off, he received a gunshot wound in the neck, which nearly proved fatal. He landed at Gualaguay on neutral soil, where he was treated with some outward respect and consideration, but he soon discovered that he was to a certain extent a poor prisoner, being prohibited from moving more than a short distance from the city. He endeavored to escape, but being betrayed by his guide and retaken, he was brought back bound hand and foot, and was tortured nearly to death with the view of extorting from him the names of those who had favored his flight. Two months later he contrived to reach Montevideo, where he found his friend Rosetti, and the two returning to Uruguay and joined a land expedition under Bento Gonzales, in which Garibaldi distinguished himself. Until the termination of the war he was employed in the service of the republic, chiefly at sea, though sometimes on land. Prior to the cessation of hostilities Garibaldi married a South American woman of extraordinary energy and devotion, and she from that time became the companion of all his dangers and privations by sea and land. After the war he returned to Montevideo and taught mathematics, till Rosas the dictator of Buenos Ayres declared war against the republic. The commencement of the war was disastrous; the city itself was besieged, many were seized with panic, the minister of war Vidal robbed the treasury and fled, and public affairs seemed to be on the brink of ruin. Garibaldi organized a flotilla, recommended the formation of an Italian legion (the command of which was conferred on Anzani), and though especially charged with the defence by sea, he frequently fought with and commanded the Italian legion. Montevideo was saved. In the spring of 1848 Garibaldi sailed from South America with a portion of the Italian legion, and on arriving in Piedmont placed himself at the disposal of Charles Albert, by whom he was coldly received. A few days later, the king being defeated, Garibaldi with a few resolute republicans prolonged the resistance until forced across the frontier by a superior Austrian detachment. Returning to Nice to his mother, wife, and children, his repose was but short. In the autumn he went to Bologna, where, though the people wanted him, the papal government rejected him. On the flight of the pope, the new executive gave to Garibaldi a command, sending him to watch the Neapolitan frontier near Rieti, in which situation he remained till the spring of 1849, when the first act of Avezzana, the new minister of war, was to call Garibaldi to Rome and adequately arm and provide for his men. The French expedition to restore the pope having appeared before Rome on April 30, (8000 infantry, two squadron of cavalry, and twelve guns,) Garibaldi was, with 1200 men, posted in some villas outside the gates. Notwithstanding the disparity of numbers, he attacked the right wing of the French, when Avezzana, who commanded in chief, seeing from the city wall the peril of the Italians despatched 1500 men to his succor; whereupon Garibaldi charged the French so vigorously with the bayonet as completely to break them, pursued them several miles, and returned with 300 prisoners. The Neapolitans now threatened Rome, and these were twice beaten by Garibaldi, at Palestrina and Velletri. The French, strongly re-enforced, having on June 30 gained a footing inside the wall, the republican triumvirate abdicated. In this moment of general depression, Garibaldi resolved to continue the struggle in the open country, and consequently he issued the following proclamation: "In recompense for the love you may show your country I offer you hunger, thirst, cold, war, and death, who accepts these terms, let him follow me." He left Rome to try to penetrate to Venice with about 4000 men, of whom 800 were mounted, and marching by Tivoli to Terni met the second Italian legion, which was awaiting him. Thence he took to the left to avoid an Austrian corps, but lost many men at Orvieto by a French column. The population was favorable, but being disheartened remained passive; the enemy in immensely superior numbers was fearful and ever cautious, and never accepted a general engagement. Garibaldi displayed a wonderful talent in advantageously posting his men at every halt (never in a city,) and in so adroitly manœuvering as to extricate himself and leave his enemy behind him every time he appeared to be surrounded.—At St. Angelo in Vado some detachments in the city were cut off, which was the only serious loss he sustained. On July 30 he reached San Marino, his force being reduced to 1800 men, and there he found in his front a fresh Austrian army in addition to the 13,000 pressing in the rear. Terms were now offered, to the effect that there should be a general amnesty and all should return home, the arms being surrendered to the republic of San Marino. Such conditions would have been accepted had a few French belonging to the second legion been permitted to return to Switzerland; but as it was insisted that they should be sent to Rome, where the French might maltreat them, the offer of the Austrians was rejected without hesitation, and at night about half the force (the rest chose to surrender) made their way toward Cesena; and though vigorously pursued, the remnant, 290 in number, embarked from Cesenatico in some fishing boats on August 2. Making their way toward Venice (then besieged) with the intention of eluding the blocking squadron, the little band was toward nightfall descried by the Austrian fleet in the Adriatic, and the small craft of the patriots were scattered during the night, some captured, and others run ashore. In the boat with Garibaldi were his wife and a few of the most compromised, Ugo Bassi, Ciceruacchio, etc.; and these gained the shore and dispersed in twos and threes to avoid the vigilance of the pursuit. Two days later Anna Garibaldi, who had refused to leave her husband, being worn out by fatigue, died, leaving Garibaldi oppressed with grief. In this state of utter wretchedness, with nothing but his indomitable courage to sustain him, he made his way from the east to the west coast of Italy, while the punishment of death was decreed for whosoever gave him bread, water, or shelter. From Tuscany he embarked for Spezia and at Cularari in the states of Sardinia he was arrested and conducted to Gena. Banished from the States of Sardinia, he arrived at New York in the summer of 1850, declined the public reception offered him, and earned a living by making candles in a manufactory on Staten Island till an opportunity occurred of resuming the occupation of a mariner. He made some voyages in the Pacific, and in about three years returned to New York in command of a Peruvian bark. Having lost his mother, to whom he had confided the care of his three children, he accepted the invitation to return to Nice, where he lived in retirement. In the beginning of 1859, on the breaking out of the war with Austria, he was invited by the Sardinian government to form a corps, since celebrated as the "Hunters of the Alps" (Cacciatori delle Alpi.) Detached from the rest of the army, he crossed over on its extreme left into northern Lombardy, with a comparatively small force, beat several Austrian detachments, entered the foremost of the allies, Varese, Lugnuo, Como, Bergamo, and Brescia, and rendered the most important services to the Italian cause throughout the war.

THE POWER OF READING.

Benjamin Franklin tells us, in one of his letters, that when he was a boy, a little book fell into his hands, entitled, "Essays to do Good, by Cotton Mather." It was tattered and torn, and several leaves were missing. "But the remainder," he says, "gave me such a turn of thinking as to have an influence on my conduct through life; for I have always set a greater value on the character of a doer of good than any other kind of reputation; and if I have been a useful citizen, the public owes all the advantages of it to the little book." Jeremy Bentham mentions that the current of his thoughts and studies was directed for life by a single phrase that caught his eye at the end of a pamphlet, "The greatest good of the greatest number." There are single sentences in the New Testament that have awakened to spiritual life hundreds of millions of dormant souls. In things of less the world has a wondrous power. George Law, a boy on his father's farm, met an old unknown book, which told the story of a farmer's son who went away to seek his fortune, and came home after many years absence, a rich man, and gave great sums to all his relations. From that moment George was uneasy, till he set out on his travels to imitate the adventurer. He lived over again the life he had read of, and actually did return a millionaire, and paid all his father's debts. Robinson Crusoe has sent to sea more sailors than the press-gang. The story about little George Washington telling the truth about the hatchet and the plum tree has made many a truth-teller. We owe all the Waverly novels to Scott's early reading of the old traditions and legends; and the whole body of pastoral fiction came from Addison's Sketches of Sir Roger De Coverly, in the Spectator. But illustrations are numberless. Tremble ye who write, and ye who publish writlag. A pamphlet has precipitated a revolution. A paragraph may quench or kindle the celestial spark in a human soul—in myriads of souls.

ROGER WILLIAMS.

While the land rings with the peans of the Fourth of July it is right to remember the earlier men who helped to lay the foundation upon which the goodly structure stands. Among these probably the least understood is Roger Williams, the founder of Rhode Island. He asserted in the Puritan colony of Massachusetts Bay the doctrine that the civil power had no rightful cognizance of religious faith, and Massachusetts tumbled him out, neck and heels, for daring to say it. Old Cotton Mather said he had "a wind-mill in his head;" and the old New England Hubbard declared that he had "a fly-blown imagination!" But neither Mather nor Hubbard can be final authority upon Roger Williams. The Plymouth settlers in the cabin of the Mayflower had founded a true commonwealth, and remained for some years an actual democracy, or direct government by the people. But Roger Williams made the first great statement of one of our cardinal Revolutionary principles in saying "Kings and magistrates must be considered invested with no more power than the people betrust them with." He was any thing but a visionary. No statesman has ever more precisely defined the limits of civil and religious liberty than he. Yet he claimed toleration of opinion rather than absolute freedom of thought, and was almost as furious with George Fox as with the Boston Council.

The grave of Williams was recently opened in Providence, and the roots of an apple tree were found to have struck directly through his dust. His grave is upon the brow of the hill that overhangs the city upon the east. A committee of some sixteen well-known Rhode Islanders has been appointed at a late meeting to procure the erection of a monument to this most illustrious man. Could they do better than engrave upon it the words of Williams in his letter to the town of Providence in which, under the figure of a ship's company, he sets forth so admirably the true doctrine of men in States?

HUMBLE ORIGINS.

The eminent Lord Lyndhurst's father was a portrait painter, and that of St. Leonard, a saddler. The origin of the late Lord Tenterden was perhaps the humblest of all, nor was he ashamed of it; for he felt that the industry, study and application by means of which he achieved his eminent position, were entirely due to himself. It is related of him that on one occasion he took his son Charles to a little shed then standing opposite the western front of Canterbury Cathedral, and pointing it out to him said, "Charles, you see this little shop; I have brought you here on purpose to show it you. In that shop your grandfather used to shave for a penny! that is the proudest reflection of my life." When a boy, Lord Tenterden was a singer in the cathedral, and it is a curious circumstance that his destination in life was changed by disappointment. When he and Mr. Justice Richards were going the home circuit together, they went to service in the cathedral; and on Richards commending the voice of a singing man in the choir, Lord Tenterden said, "Ah that is the only man I ever envied. When at school in this town we were candidates for a chorister's place, and he obtained it."

THE FRENCH AND BRITISH ARMIES.

The London Illustrated News of the World describes in the following admirable manner the difference in the constitution of the armies of France and Great Britain: It is evident that in many respects the French army is immensely superior to our own. In the first place, there is promotion in the French army according to merit. In the second place, the French officers receive a scientific education much superior to our own. In the third place, there are no aristocratic dawdlers in the French army. It might at first sight be thought that the French army is extremely democratic; but this is far from being the case. As regards immediate action the French army has no opinions at all. It submits to discipline, and marches where it is told to march; but if there is superiority, it is that of science. It is easy saying that every Frenchman can rise from the ranks and be Field-Marshal. Yet if he is altogether ignorant he cannot rise very high from the ranks. We have no interest in the French army farther than that by studying its organization we may greatly improve our own army. If we were to adopt the French system, it is not the low-born who would become officers; it is the well-born and the well-cultured. If we abolished the system of purchase and other idiotic practices, it is gentlemen who would still be officers; but gentlemen with a scientific education. Much marvel

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, JULY 28, 1860.

Only 50 to the Advocate from the first Number in July to the end of the Year.

PAY TO THE END OF THE YEAR.

We have made out, and sent out, all our accounts, to the end of the present year. Many have responded and paid up, but many have failed to do so. The object we have in writing these lines is, to call upon all who have not paid up to the end of the year, to do so immediately, by remittance to the office, or by payment to our agents. The year is more than half gone, and yet we have much to collect of our accounts, and to clear off books, between this and January next. This work we must accomplish. Come friends, you have received your accounts, through the paper or through the preacher; the amount is not large in each case; pay up to the end of the year, and let us all begin even again.

THE NEW METHODIST PAPER IN NEW YORK.

We have received the first number of "The Methodist," dated New York, July 14, 1860. Two weeks since we called attention to its advertisement, and promised farther notice when permitted to examine it. It has eight pages, of six columns each, and has a very pleasant and appropriate diversity of type, as adapted to the different departments. Its editor-in-chief is Rev. George R. Crooks, D. D., who is said to be an able and accomplished man. We know nothing of him, except through newspaper report. Rev. John McClintock, D. D., who is in Paris, is the assistant editor. Of him we know he is an accomplished scholar, an able divine, and an experienced writer and editor. We learn, also, that Rev. Abel Stevens, L. L. D., and other able and experienced men, are in the corps editorial. It is said that an ample fund, sufficient to guarantee the permanency of the paper, has been secured.

The reasons for its establishment, as given in a leader, are, substantially, the need of a larger and more comprehensive organ—more devoted to literature and news—less burdened with conference and school documents—which can only be obtained in an independent, as distinguished from a conference journal; the need of a more independent expression of opinion than can obtain in the conference journal; the need to oppose all future partisan agitations, and, to advocate the "finality" of the new Chapter on Slavery; to oppose disunion on account of the Chapter; to provide a family paper, with more religious and other intelligence, and less of distracting controversy; and to set a good example to, and exercise a good influence upon, all the other papers of the Northern Methodist Church, in all these respects.

The first number contains evidence of high intellectual ability, literary taste, and editorial experience. It evidently has, what we have long contended for as a desideratum in religious journalism, not only an editor, but a staff of regular writers. The editorial papers of this number, beside from some able contributions from men specially engaged, are evidently the production of more pens than one. In this matter it has one of the indispensable elements of high journalistic success. Its only mistake, here, is, in having any name at its head as editor, its editorship should have been entirely impersonal. Its news department is excellent, divided into secular and religious, somewhat after the manner of the New York Observer.

But what of its programme—its platform on the exciting questions of ecclesiastical politics now agitating the Northern Church? It is simply the old Christian Advocate and Journal under a new name. It is simply the Abel Stevens platform, with less of official restraint, a wider topical area, and perhaps better literary facilities. In what respect it is better, in regard to Baltimore, "the Border," and the slavery question, than the Christian Advocate and Journal, and the other Northern Methodist papers, it is difficult to perceive. They profess to have obtained all they wish and need in the new Chapter, and it accepts the new Chapter as a finality. They are controlled by men who advocated the new Chapter, and it is controlled by men who, though opposed to its adoption, accept it, and counsel submission to it. Its position is the weakest of the two. It is unwillingly on a platform which they adopt heartily. It professes more friendship for the "Border" than the other Northern Methodist papers, while it coincides with those journals in support of the very thing which afflicts the "Border."

Happy is that man, or that journalist, who is equal to the occasions of his life. A great occasion, a great opportunity, was presented to this new journal. Had it advocated the continued union of Baltimore and the Border with the Methodist E. Church, North, and at the same time taken ground for the removal from the Discipline of slavery legislation, thus conforming to the Apostolic example, it would have an open field and an army of supporters, on the Border and throughout the North. But it has let the opportunity slip, and fallen into the old beaten track of those who have disturbed and rent the Church for nearly half a century. There has long been a demand for a Methodist paper in New York on this platform. We had hoped that this paper would have supplied the demand, but we are disappointed.—Such a paper might have been even anti-slavery in its sentiments, and at the same time have taken the Apostolic ground of non-interference with the question in Church legislation. There must, there will be a paper of this kind without the bounds of the Southern Methodist Church. The progressing reaction caused by fanatical ecclesiastical legislation on the subject, which has done more than any thing else to disturb the country and to bring religion into disrepute, will ultimately bring it about. Several years ago, in the Texas Christian Advocate, we earnestly advocated the establishment of such a journal. Whether or not the Baltimore Christian Advocate will supply the demands, is yet to be determined. Its position is a fine one, but New York is better, for such a purpose. So far as peace on this question, to the Church and country, is concerned, nothing, absolutely nothing, is promised by the new journal. It is true it contends that the new Chapter has not the force of law—is only advisory. But this is weak, pitifully weak. The new Chapter is a "decision of the Supreme Court" of the Northern Church, placing slave-holding in the category with every other sin forbidden in the General Rules. The administration of the General Rules cannot be made advisory by the passage of a thousand resolutions to that effect. If the administration on one branch of them is advisory, the whole is advisory, and the administration of Discipline is broken down.—The weakness of this position is manifest by the fact that this same paper recommends Baltimore to reject the new Chapter if necessary! Recommending a higher law—rebellion against the law of the Church!

The result will be, that, disappointed in the hope of any advocacy of non-intervention in the Northern Methodist Church, except, perhaps, from Baltimore, the public will look for such advocacy to other quarters.

Copying Articles.—Some writers are in the habit of contributing articles to other papers, and then requesting the New Orleans Christian Advocate to copy. With such requests we cannot comply. If it is desired that an article appear in the Advocate, it must be written for its columns. As to selections, we can make our own.

PRESENT ATTITUDE OF AMERICAN METHODISM.

Methodists in the United States are divided into three ecclesiastical bodies, the Methodist Episcopal Church, North, the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and the Methodist Protestant Church. The Methodist Protestants left the parent body many years ago on account of their aversion to the government of the Church.—They sought the introduction of direct lay-delegation, and the abolition of the office of Bishop, and failing, seceded. In 1844, long after, the parent body itself divided, North and South, on the slavery question. And now the Northern branch is about to be divided again, by the secession of the Baltimore Conference on account of the recently adopted new Chapter on slavery. All these divisions have been brought about solely by ecclesiastical differences. Doctrinal differences have never existed among Methodists. Having so simple a creed, nothing more than the Apostles' Creed, as binding upon members, it is remarkable that doctrinal diversities have never disturbed the Church. Had the fathers of Methodism been as wise and reticient in regard to church government as they were in regard to Christian doctrine, and never gone in their legislation beyond the clear record of the New Testament, the Church would have been undivided to this day. The dispute between the Methodist Protestants and the parent Church was an unfortunately conducted affair. The secession should never have taken place. And the division of the Methodist Episcopal Church into Northern and Southern branches was caused by a pure departure from the authority of the Bible in legislating upon the slavery question. The present position of these parties is about as follows.

The Methodist Protestants seem willing to drop the controversy on the question of Bishops, and would unite with the Methodist Episcopal Church, North, or South, as circumstances might determine, if lay-delegation were introduced. The Methodist Episcopal Churches seem willing either to adopt lay-delegation or to remain as they are, according as the Providence of God may seem to indicate as most expedient. They are averse, however, to hasty and ill-considered changes. As to the Northern and Southern Churches, they are farther apart than ever. The former has made non-slaveholding a test of Church-membership, and the latter has expunged from the Discipline all legislation on the subject, and preaches to master and servant, as did the Apostles. The Baltimore region of the Northern Church, however, is about to leave it, and either adhere South, or set up an independent connection. Some of them have already thrown out some indications of a desire to unite with the Methodist Protestants upon a basis of mutual concessions. A writer in the last issue of the Baltimore Christian Advocate, who signs himself "A Lover of Genuine Methodism," after noticing in the way of objection several proposed modes of action in view of the future of "Border Methodism," says:

> "Let us not shut our eyes to the fact that we must, at the very outset, meet and settle the question of lay delegation, the question about Presiding Elders and Bishops—aye and the Slavery question too.
>
> "But might not the three first of these be disposed of in such a way as to bring us a little nearer the Methodist Protestant church, that they might draw a little nearer to us, and a slight movement on both sides towards each other would bring us together, and make Methodism in all this region vastly stronger and more influential than it has ever been.
>
> "And might not the Slavery question be put at rest forever among us by inserting in our new chapter, the very words of the apostle Paul upon this subject, without comment or foot-note—words to which no Christian can object, and which every man may interpret according to the light which God has given him.'
>
> "Why may not a new nation Methodist church be organized in the very heart of this great country, modeled as far as convenient, according to the genius of our own form of civil government—a church divested at all unnecessary externals, recognizing the gospel at Christ and that alone as its platform, and ignoring those teachings of men which would make 'the word of God of none effect?' Would not such a church keep our people and preachers united, and unite them more closely than ever, when we know that an attempt to stand still under the circumstances, or to go in any other direction must divide us, and perhaps shiver us into fragments.
>
> "And would not such a church, in its simplicity, its spirituality, and its power, serve as a nucleus around which earnest conservative Methodists from every quarter would gladly gather."

To this the Methodist Protestant, of Baltimore, the organ of the Methodist Protestant Church, responds as follows:

> The spirit of the above merits at our hands respectful and fraternal notice. It is among the first manifestations of a sentiment deeply widening among the Methodists; anticipating a burial of past hostilities, and a reconciliation between parties who ought never to have been estranged." It comes from the right quarter, though we confess we should like it better if, it bore the full name of the brother from whom it proceeds.
>
> Whether it would be advisable to look to a reunion of the two Methodist families mentioned above, under one denominational system, we are not prepared now to determine. Various considerations present themselves, some in favor, some against such an ultimatum. But among good men there can be but one opinion with regard to the propriety of securing between these bodies a permanent fraternal sympathy. We are Methodists—in all the primitive essentials of Methodism. Time has demonstrated our adherance to the landmarks of doctrine and practice. Our itinerancy is as absolute as that of the Methodist Episcopal church. Why should we be at war with each other? Why stand aloof from the cultivation of the most harmonious christian intercourse?
>
> Family afflictions sometimes exercise a most salutary influence in promoting unity in domestic affairs, when discord had been permitted to embitter personal relations. The same law, perhaps, holds good in larger bodies. Our Methodist Episcopal brethren on the border are now in a position more favorable to a calm and dispassionate retrospect of the action of the Baltimore Conference of '28 towards Reformers than they ever were. How should Methodist Protestants meet them. Not in the spirit of taunt or reproachful criminality. Not with a disposition to extort humiliating concessions. Actions speak louder than words. Let these be properly interpreted, and there will be little need of alluding to old difficulties at all.

Whatever may be the final determination of the controversy between the Baltimore Conferences and the Northern Church, or of the quasi negotiations between the Episcopal and Protestant Methodists of Baltimore, the Southern Church is satisfied that her position on the slavery question is scriptural, and that whether slavery be ultimately abolished or become permanent, whether she exist in slave or free territory, she is free from the elements of agitation and dissension. She is unsectional in her platform, and will, we trust, soon be unsectional in her name, and she will gradually, in coming years, draw into her pale, by the mere force of her moral attitude, all those who are opposed, and will become opposed, to extra-scriptural legislation on civil and political questions.

BLOOMING OF THE ITALIAN ALVE.

In three narrow valleys of the Alpine region of Piedmont, shut out from the world by mountain ranges, the small and poor Waldensian Church has contended earnestly for the ancient faith for a thousand years. They even now number only about thirty thousand souls. A most remarkable movement has recently taken place among them—the transfer of their Theological College at La Tour, in the Cottian Alps, to Florence, in Tuscany. The little school of the true faith is removed from the region of the mountain hunter, to the banks of the Arno—to the land of "Art's master-works whou Art was in its prime." This gospel germ, after a cold mountain burial of a thousand years, has been permitted to bloom in the sunny soil of Tuscany. The papal church drove them into exile in the mountains, and now, after the lapse of centuries, they come to take possession of the very States of the Church themselves. Long before Peter Waldo commenced his labors as a religious reformer, the Vaudois professed the same creed which they still hold. During the long lapse of centuries they have changed neither their time-honored customs nor their ancient doctrines. They have ever been a simple pastoral people; pure in morals, devout in feeling, and hospitable to the extent of their ability. Yielding prompt obedience to the government in all things that did not infringe upon their religious convictions, and ever ready to suffer for "conscience' sake," they kept the faith which their forefather's kept, in spite of the crusades that were preached against them; the many and cruel acts of persecution to which they were subjected, and the civil disabilities by which they were for ages oppressed. In behalf of this people, when harassed by fire and sword, Cromwell, through his Latin Secretary, John Milton, wrote to the Duke of Savoy, warning him to desist from his bloody doings, or to beware the consequences. In behalf of the same people Milton wrote his famous sonnet, commencing,

> Avenge O Lord, thy slaughtered saints, whose bones
> Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold.

Cromwell's stern protest was successful. Whilst he held rule in England, the terror of his name repressed all further incursions into the country of the Vaudois. The feeble remnant of the mountaineers, who had taken refuge in the fastnesses of the higher Alps, returned, on the withdrawal of the soldiery, to their beloved valleys, and resumed their customary religious exercises and their usual pastoral occupations. They rebuilt their ruined churches, re-organized their parish schools, and re-established at La Tour their humble Theological College. Since those evil days many generations have passed. The community has slowly increased in numbers, but has always been poor, and on several occasions, even down to a recent period, has found it necessary to solicit in other countries contributions in aid of the young men who were studying for the ministry in the College at La Tour. If we except the brief period during which Piedmont, at the beginning of the present century, was annexed to France—when the Vaudois were placed by Napoleon I. on an equal footing with their Roman Catholic countrymen, and were assigned funds for the support of their clergy—they cannot be said to have ever enjoyed absolute relief from the intolerance of bigotry until the accession of Victor Emanuel to the throne of Sardinia. And now, after a series of persecutions which make up, in the narration, the larger portion of a history that dates back—as some assert—almost to the introduction of Christianity into Southern Europe, this little church, which for centuries has trained up its youth to the pastorate under the shadow of the Alps, and within sound of the torrent and waterfall, taking heart of grace from the changes that have transpired in Central Italy, has overleaped its rocky barriers, and planted its Theological College at Florence.

THE BERLIN PROFESSORS.

TWESTEN, HENGSTENBERG, BARTH, AND RANKE.

A Berlin Correspondent of the Independent gives the following personal sketches of some of the Berlin professors:

Twesten, the theologian, is a man universally known in Germany, and well known in America. He is very conservative, belongs to the old Lutheran party, and loses no opportunity to speak a word in favor of the Lutherans, in contradistinction to the New or United Evangelical Church. Yet he is personally popular, and the number of pupils in attendance at his auditorium is quite large, there being more than a hundred. His manner is very quick and nervous; his reading is so rapid that no one can follow him only with great difficulty, and the shrill but few tones in which he speaks only add to the difficulty. He is a short, thick man, quite old—I judge about seventy—but has the spriteliness of a much younger man. He is now lecturing on the book of Hebrews, and five lectures a week, for twenty weeks, he will give to this epistle; you may now judge whether it will be thoroughly treated or not.

It would not be right to pass by Hengstenberg, much as we all dislike him. For narrow and hateful as his spirit, yet his name is well known, and because he is so ordinary famous, I will give a brief sketch of him. This supporter of tyranny, this staunch advocate of the divine right of kings, this man on whose shoulders, as editor of the Krentz-Zeitung and chief ecclesiastical adviser of the king, rests a large share of the Revolution of 1848, this steadfast reactionist, who is trying to coerce the prince regent into liberal measures, and not frequently succeeds in doing so, is a sleek, middle-aged man, of whom you would say, if you heard him lecture, that his chief attribute was laziness. I have heard him read on the history of the Kingdom of God in the Old Testament. Great research, certainly, but little more; the most drawling manner that I ever heard: the only signs of life in the man being a nervous twitch in his chair at every few sentences, which is peculiar in itself, and doubly peculiar as in a contrast with the very torpor of all else in his face and mind. Nothing in any way which tells you that the smooth-haired man, so well dressed and moderate, is the man who represents, in the Protestant world, the spirit of the Catholic Inquisition, the best living exemplar of Laud; the counsellor of all that is backward-looking in this Prussian government.

Dove, pronounced as if spelt Dovy, first of living meteorologists, and discoverer of the rotation of the winds and many of the laws of the atmosphere currents, is a military looking man, squarely built, with a humorous face and a strikingly-brisk and (I may say a Yankee) smart manner. With all his learning, and with all his industry, and in both those respects he is a model, he is a very vivacious man, and lights up his lectures on physics with constant sallies of humor. Many, indeed, attend his course as they would read a comic newspaper, simply to be amused. Still Dove is nothing of a mere fun-maker, he is of a temperament that lets a genial light play upon every thing that he says; but he is unflinchingly devoted to science, and pursues his investigations with unremitting zeal.

Barth, the distinguished African traveller, I have frequently met in private. He is not a professor in the University, though a prominent candidate as Ritter's successor. He is younger than I expected to find him, and has the most intelligent face that I have seen in Berlin. He seems to be a man of great energy, is a strong friend of English institutions, and is perfect in our language. He informed me that the translation of his book into English is his own work. His society and conversation have been of more value to me than any man whom I have met here.

There is no man in whose personal appearance I have been so much disappointed as in Ranke, the eminent historian. If one were to pin one's faith on a man's mental greatness, as inferred from his physical stature, then would Ranke be judged a most inferior man. Imagine a very small, rather ill-shaped man, with a head disproportionately large in comparison with his body, very homely, with great rolling eyes, and with a mouth much too wide to be beautiful; dress him in an ill-fitting coat, a vest of kerseymere, with a broad collar, and with the lappets thrusting forward with such unseemly prominence as to make you think of them as a part of his personal presence, and you have Ranke, one best known to us as the historian of the popes, but in these latter years as one of the widest read and most profound thinkers on the history of modern Europe. Ranke is a very animated lecturer, looks constantly at the ceiling, as if reading his lecture there, and gesticulates much with his left hand, in an unmeaning, graceless manner, with his fingers wide apart. He is not difficult to follow, excepting when he philosophizes on history, and then his style takes that involved form so affected now-a-days by many German writers, which makes it difficult for even the Germans to follow him. He is now lecturing on the history of Europe during the present century, and his course is attended by nearly a hundred students.

I must say a word of Lepsius, the Egyptologist whose fame, as an investigator of the antiquities of that land, has now gone every where, and who I suppose to be better versed in the history, science, art, and languages of the ancient Egyptians than any other man living. Lepsius is not the rusty man that one thinks all antiquarians. He is strikingly handsome, about fifty, hair prematurely white, but with a gay face, and a very brisk manner. His whole appearance is decidedly prepossessing. His voice is soft and gentle, and he pronounces German with great beauty and distinctness.

MR. BUNTING AND THE SAN ANTONIO LEDGER.

Rev. R. F. Bunting is the Old School Presbyterian minister in San Antonio, Texas. A more devoted, refined, and catholic-spirited christian gentleman, would be hard to find. In a letter to the Banner of Peace, a Cumberland Presbyterian paper, published in Nashville, Tenn, which appeared last November, Mr. Bunting gives a very interesting description of San Antonio, including, an account of the relative numbers and influence of Catholics, Protestants and Infidels. He makes the Catholic population of the place and surrounding country to be about 8,000 souls, and those under infidel influences to be about 3,000. The Protestant population is much smaller. Yet he gives the preponderating moral and social influence of the community to Protestantism. Every man who is personally acquainted with San Antonio, or similarly constituted cities, will recognize the substantial correctness of these reported facts. Mr. Bunting's character is a sufficient voucher for the honesty of his statements. He has been in San Antonio a long time, and if any man knows the place well, he does. But his letter has given great offence to some of the San Antonio journals, among which are the Staats Zeitung and the Ledger and Texian. They deny the truth of his statements, and accuse him of slandering his own city. The two offensive points in his letter seem to be, his statement that the Catholics do not exercise the proportionate social and moral influence they formerly did, and that there is a population of 3000 under infidel influences—mostly German, with some few Americans. The German paper assaults Mr. Bunting in scurrilous style, and the Ledger, we are sorry to see, follows suit, in but little better spirit. In those cities of this country where the Catholic and German-infidel vote is largely in the ascendant, such miserable stultification and truckling have, in recent years, become common, to the shame of the nation. The Protestant ministry and press cannot say a word on the relative merits of Protestant and Catholic, or Infidel, civilization, without being assaulted by these vote-mongers. The Ledger denies a political inspiration and purpose, but the case is too plain. Such journals should learn that it is too late in the day for such a game to be successful. There are tens of thousands of the people of this country who hold the same political principles, and will vote the same Presidential ticket, as the San Antonio Ledger, who will not stand tamely by when despotic Romanism and brutal infidelity are lauded at the expense of the christian civilization of our Anglo-Saxon forefathers. Let our Catholic and Infidel fellow-citizens have all their rights; our Protestant Churches and ministry will have theirs.

A NEW BOOK OF TRAVELS.

It will be recollected by the readers of the New Orleans Advocate that, during the years 1857-8, a series of letters from the old world, from the pen of Mrs. S. B. Thomas, appeared in these columns. They were graphic and eloquent, and were much admired. We are gratified to learn that they are soon to be issued in book form from the press of J. B. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia. The book will contain over four hundred pages, divided into about twenty chapters, and will be illustrated from original designs. It is to be very appropriately dedicated to Mrs. Thomas's distinguished nephew, Hon. Edward T. Merrick, of New Orleans, Chief Justice of the State of Louisiana. The introduction, which we have been permitted to see, is from the pen of Prof. L. C. Loomis, of Wilbraham Academy, we believe. Mrs. Thomas is a native of Wilmington, Mass., and was first a teacher in New York, and afterwards was an assistant of Dr. Fisk in the Academy, until she came South to take charge of a Seminary at Tuscaloosa. She was afterwards at the head of Seminaries at Montgomery and Tuscumbia, Ala., and at Washington, Miss., where she married and ceased her labors as a teacher. She is a lady of culture, taste, and eminent piety. We trust her book will be well received by the public.

METHODISM.

Total number,	1,982,624
Add traveling preachers	13,219
Total communicants in America,	1,995,843
Total communicants in Europe,	736,300
Total,	2,732,143
Minor bodies, whose statistics can not be exactly ascertained, 10,000 members and 200 preachers,	10,200
Grand Total,	2,742,343

Supposing three members of the congregation to one of the Church, (a very moderate estimate for Methodist congregations,) we have an aggregate population depending on the ministration of Methodism of hardly less than eleven millions. With this great army, Methodism ought to lead the evangelical world.

The First Sunday School.—It is claimed by American writers, that the first Sunday School was established at Ephrata, in Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, by one Ludwig Hacker, a German of the Seventh Day Baptist persuasion. Hacker, it is said, established his school about the year 1745, and it continued to be held until 1777, when it was broken up by the revolutionary war. It was not until 1782 that Robert Raikes founded his Sunday School at Gloucester, England. Raikes has all the credit of originating the institution. Whether or not he had heard of Hacker's school in Pennsylvania, we do not know. Probably he had not.

Marriage as it is, and as it Should be, by Rev. John Bayley. (Published by M. W. Dodd.) This work is written in very pleasant style, and is intended for the edification of all those interested in the important and "peculiar institution" of marriage. It is intended to show the proper age, the proper motives, the proper ideas, and the proper circumstances of marriage, and to point out the path in which husbands and wives should walk to make themselves and their companions and their children happy.

Rejected Manuscripts.—We are often asked to return contributions which we have declined to publish.—It has been so often published in newspapers generally, that editors are under no obligation to do this, and that it is impracticable, as well as contrary to established usage, that we are surprised that writers will continue to make the request. We cannot do it, and hope to be relieved from the reiterated request. To comply with it would require a special clerk.

That Press.—Some months since an appeal was made, through this paper, to the friends of our cause in California, to raise money to buy a press for the Pacific Methodist, our organ there. Judge J. E. Grace of Alabama sent us $25, and Mrs. Elizabeth Hagger of Mississippi sent us $20. Shall we receive no more? Now is a good time to contribute to this cause. Bishop Pierce has visited the country, and is describing it in his letters.

AUTHORS AND BOOKS.

NEW YORK, July 16th.

Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co., of Philadelphia, recently published, in fac-simile, a Japanese work on Botany. It is printed on Japanese paper, in the same style precisely as the work is got out in Japan, with the exception that the editor, an officer of the U.S. navy, added explanatory notes and a translation of part of the text. Thirty-nine different flowering plants are illustrated and described. The book is of no particular use, but it is a curiosity of literature, and at any rate serves to give some idea of the general execution of Japanese books. While the Embassy were in New York, I had an opportunity to look over a number of volumes they had with them; and I was surprized at the great number of illustrations some of these contained—one in particular, a portly volume, which I was told was a cyclopedia, was full of cuts. Scarce a page was without its illustration. Many of these were graphic, and concerned such subjects as trades and agricultural processes, maps of countries, plans of the cities of Japan, (these very finely done in a style which the Germans call, very accurately, "a bird's eye view,") and a great variety of other things. Such a book, if saved from the destruction of a nation, would be a most valuable evidence of their very considerable advance in civilization. Every initial letter was made up of characteristic figures; and while the printing of the volume looked as though a great many impressions had been taken, the price makes it probable that many editions had been sold before the copy I saw was printed. It was what we would call a large octavo, had about 500 leaves (1000 pages, but they print on but one side of the leaf), and was sold in Japan, I was told, for about twenty-five cents of our money. After that, we need not talk of American cheap literature.

But to return to botany. A learned reviewer of the work brings to light some curious facts about the language of Japan, which I must extract in short here.—It appears that the Japanese are forced to be a modest people, by the very difficulty of bringing the private "I" a great deal before the public eye in print. The first person singular of the personal pronoun is a word of several syllables; the first person plural (the editorial "we") is expressed by the ponderous equivalent, "nati kuso domo." Consider the difficulties of a Japanese editor!

It appears that they have not less than five different alphabets, all which and the Chinese characters into the bargain, are used, and sometimes in the same work. Of course the book begins at the end, or what is the end with us; and the lines are up and down instead of across the page. These are little preliminary difficulties to the attainment of a proficiency in Japanese, but to the enthusiastic scholar they would seem trifles.

The Japanese seem very ready draughtsmen. I have now lying before me a book of sketches made at the instance of a friend of mine, by one of the members of the Japanese Embassy, and given to my friend. There are all kinds of birds; there is a funny picture of two stout fellows, looking remarkably like over-fed Roman Catholic monks, unrolling a strip of parchment or paper; there are a number of fruit and flower pieces, taken from the decorations of the hotel tables in Washington and New York, and very spiritedly done; there are trees, ships, flowers, men and women, and there is one figure which, whether intended or not, looks remarkably like our venerable Secretary of State, the Hon. Lewis Cass. All display a singular readiness of hand and accuracy of touch. Most of them, I was told, were done as rapidly as one writes; and while they show this quickness of manipulation, they show, too, real skill and very considerable artistic spirit. I should like to see the book they will write (and illustrate) about us Western Barbarians, when they get home.

It is a pity that there was no American found who could speak to the Japanese in their own language. We have so long been agitating the question of intercourse with that nation, that it was to be hoped at least one of our thirty millions would have prepared himself in the tongue of the strangers whom we are so anxious to embrace as friends. But we are yet too busy a nation to learn languages, and, I think, besides have something of that English conceit, which is sufficient to itself, and which, wherever it may find itself, hoils all who do not speak English, as foreigners. This is one of the consequences of belonging to a dominant race.

There was much to be learned of this Embassy, that its members would have been glad to communicate; and particularly interesting would have been a full communication, from the two physicians, of their curative system. The Japanese are so much superior to the Chinese in other regards, that here, too, it is to be hoped we may find something new. As for the Chinese system of medicine, that is not likely to gain adherents even in our day of new lights. They suppose the human body to be made up of five elements, gold, wood, water, fire and earth. Sickness they regard as the undue preponderance of one of these elements over the rest. One peculiarity of Chinese prescriptions is the magnitude of the dose.—Thus 150 pills are given at a time, and a pint of black draught is not thought excessive as a sequel.

The last number of the new Cyclopedia now being published by Messrs. Chambers, of Edinburgh, and which is republished here by Messrs. Lippincott & Co., of Philadelphia, contains an interesting article on the book trade of England. Mr. Robert Chambers, its author, says: "In reckoning the number of new works issued from the press annually, we may take the number of cotries of distinct books, volumes, sheets, maps, &c., lodged by publishers at the British museum, in terms of the copyright act. The following is an abstract of the return for 1859—Books: complete works, 5,607; consisting of volumes, in process of publication, 6,542; in parts, 15,767; single sheets, 236—total, 21,645. Music: complete works, volumes and pieces, 4,066. Maps in sheets, 3071; atlases, whole or in parts, 23—total 3096. Grand total of articles, 28,807. In 1854, the number was 19,578. The difference shows the rise since that period. In 1856, according to the tables of the Board of Trade, the imports of books into the United Kingdom amounted to 5,791 cwts., of which 2,226 cwts. were from France, and 769 cwts. from the United States.—The exports in hundredweights were as follows: Russia, 20; Hanover, 158; Hanse Towns, 637; Holland, 553; France, 670; Turkey, 204; Egypt, 2004; the United States, 11,977; Chili, 117; Malta, 267; South Africa, 826; Mauritius, 71; East Indies, 2,443; Australia, 6,535; British America, 1,373; West Indies, 617; all other states, 1,622—total, 30,094 cwts., the value of which, at £14 per cwt., is about £425,000." It is seen that the exports are five-fold more than the imports; also that we export to Australia alone more than we import from all countries, and to the United States double as much. A system of more free and untaxed import of foreign-printed English works would, in various ways, introduce changes into the book trade, and have a tendency to alter some of its traditional usages."

Next week I hope to give your readers some particulars of the American book trade.

Garibaldi, the hero of Italy, was born, it appears, on the 4th of July, 1807. His life was recently published by Messrs. Barnes & Burr, of New-York, from Sketches by himself, written when he was in this country. It comes to light now that Dumas got a copy of this book in Paris, translated it, published it in France as his own work, and from notes taken of Garibaldi's conversations by Dumas; and to complete the swindle, sold to a Boston publisher, for $500, an advance copy of this book, which was then nearly re-translated in Boston ere it was discovered that M. Dumas had been pirating. Of course the great novelist laughed at the simplicity of his American cousin.

The Appletons have just published Mr. Everett's Mount Vernon papers, collected from the New York Ledger. I have read but few of the papers; but they are said to be of interest, and models as to style. I do not see why the reminiscences of a man who has been so long and so eminent in the world, should not possess great interest; and I suppose these papers are in reality a kind of "Recollections of my Life," a species of book which is always pleasant, and often valuable. Mr. E. has been a traveler, scholar, orator, member of Congress, Governor of Massachusetts, Minister to England, President of Harvard College, Secretary of State, and Senator; and he is now a candidate for the Vice Presidency. Surely his recollections of men and times now passed away, have a peculiar value.

Macaulay's writings, which are being translated into German, are also to be done into French, it appears. So also are the letters of Alexander Humboldt, which have passed through five editions in Germany, and have scarce found two hundred readers in this country, where a great man must really do something better than scold, to get a hearing.

The last number of Frazer's Magazine has a sharp satire, called "An Old Rod for New Poets," in which new gentlemen are addressed after this fashion:

> "What I wish is,
> That poets would leave the brook and bee alone,
> Which make sufficient music of their own;
> Cease singing of the stars and of the sun,
> This passion, that passion, and the roll
> Of the murmuring sea and the low monotone,
> And sing of men; or if that can't be done—
> Try fishes."

Very good advice too.

It seems that Mr. Charles Astor Bristed, who wrote "Five Years in an English University," is to do something of the same kind for American colleges that Tom Brown's School Days did for an English school. He has in MacMillan's Magazine the first part of a very readable story, called, "My friend Bellow, or Reminiscences of American College Life." It is curious that with our multitude of writers, and their ingenuity in devising subjects for stories, we have yet no picture of American College life. It must have its salient angles, if only the right man would take hold; and a proper hook, a manly hook—not a namby pamby or vulgar hook—on the subject, would do a great deal of good. "Tom Brown's School Days" is one of the best books, for boys, ever written.

Mr. H. Mayhew, who was said some weeks ago to be in this country, has nearly ready for press, it appears, a boy's work called "Young Benjamin Franklin." It will be one of the series of which "The Peasant Boy Philosopher," or "Young Humphrey Davy," was so successful an example.

The publishers here are announcing a new work by Charles Reade; but it appears that the new work announced in England by that author is not a story, as its title would indicate, ("The Eighth Commandment,") but an onslaught on the critics, who, some years ago, charged Mr. Reade with plagiarism,—and come very near to making good their charge. From so brilliant and so truculent a gentleman as Mr. Reade has proved himself such a reply will, no doubt, be a model of sharp hitting, vastly amusing to lookers on.

Harper & Brothers will publish, in a few days, a new juvenile, by Miss Muleck, author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," called "One Year, a Child's Book in Prose and Verse."

The rumor that Lord Brougham was engaged in the composition of a complete treatise on the British Constitution turns out to be correct. It will be published during the ensuing winter.

The English are outdoing us in cheap books. There is now a sixpenny edition of Byron's Childe Harold; and among many others, "How to read the Face, or Physiognomy explained according to Lavater"—price fourpence. Messrs. Routledge & Co. are the cheap publishers of England, and have embarked more extensively than any other firm in the publication of important works at very low prices, and in numbers. The following, their list for July, will give an idea of their enterprise, and of the kind of books which the so called "lower orders" of England are supposed to prefer:

British Poets. (Spenser) p. III	25 "
British Dramatists. (Ben. Johnson) p. III	25. "
The Spectator. ps. X and XI.	each 25 "
Bulwer's Ernest Maltravers. Fcp. 8vo. cloth.	37½ "
Bulwer's Novels, in monthly parts. p. IX	12½ "
Balwer's Novels, in weekly numbers	each 25 "
Prescott's Complete Histories. p. XVII	25. "

Messrs. Routledge & Co. are publishing in parts, and to match their edition of Shakspeare, a two-fold monthly issue, in shilling parts, of the old dramatists and the old poets, handsomely printed in royal 8vo., with biographical memoirs, illustrative notes, and steel portraits. They begin with Spenser and Jonson. Each volume is to be completed in from eight to twelve parts.

THE MAFFIT MONUMENT.

Mr Editor: I see in an Advocate of last month, a letter from Mr. Mitchell, stating that the contributions to this fund give unfavorable indications of speedy success. As a friend of this enterprise, it gives me pleasure to state the following: In a conversation with Chaplain C. W. Thomas, who is the personal friend of Capt. J. N. Maffit, U. S. N, and a cherisher of the great deeds of his noble father, he authorizes me to state that he proposes to the Committee to donate to the Maffit monument the author's profits that may result from the sales made by the Mobile Depository, of "Adventures and Observations in Africa," in the course of the twelve months ensuing.

Will not the friends of this enterprise contribute to this two-fold object: first, the circulation of a book containing the most reliable information upon the subject of which it treats, whose suggestions of civil policy might be profitably studied by statesmen, and which should be read by all interested in the progress of evangelical civilization; and second, to perpetuate the memory of a minister of the gospel, and upon whose advocacy of that gospel thousands have hung with profit and rapture?

LAUNER BLACKMAN.

Mr. Editor—The initial name of this distinguished minister is uniformly spelt "Learner" in the printed minutes, but I have always believed this to be a mistake; and when I began to write, some years ago, about the early Methodist preachers in Mississippi, I wrote it Launer; but the editors, supposing from the printed minutes that my orthography was wrong, would have it printed Learner; so I yielded the point. But he was generally called Launer in Mississippi. My Methodist relations, who were very intimate with him, all called him Launer; and my uncle, Rev. James Griffing, who travelled awhile with him on the Natchez circuit when he first came to the country, named his first son, in honor of him, Launer Blackman, which name he has answered to for more than fifty years. So I "guess" his right name was Launer, the authority of the printed minutes to the contrary notwithstanding, and I heartily unite with "A Tennessean" to save his name.

JULY 25, 1860.

WEEKLY SUMMARY OF NEWS.

DOMESTIC.

The subscription for a botanical garden in the New York Central Park has reached $23,000.

The census takers report that the population of Baltimore will be 230,000—an increase of 61,000 over the census of 1850.

Wm. Cullom, a former clerk of the United States House of Representatives, charged with embezzlement in office, was tried by the Criminal Court at Washington on the 12th and acquitted.

The Legislature of New Hampshire has passed an act providing penalties for the adulteration af food, liquors and medicines.

FIRE IN NEW YORK.—A fire occurred on the 17th inst., in New York, by which a number of buildings situated on Washington, Charles, and Perry-streets, were completely destroyed. The buildings were occupied by 150 families, all of which are rendered homeless by this conflagration. The loss by this fire is estimated at $100,000, and wholly covered by insurence.

LARGE BENEFACTION.—A New York millionaire named Rose died a few months since, leaving, by his will, $300,000 to purchase a farm, upon which to place destitute children under the guardianship of the "Rose Benevolent Association," on condition that a like sum should be raised by others. Charles Cook, of Havana, N. Y., has agreed to contribute the additional $300,000, provided the farm should be located at that place.

THE JAPANESE EMBASSY AND THE PULICE.—The Japanese Ambassadors, on the eve of their departure from New York, made a donation of $20,000 to the police of Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia and New York, as a mark of their appreciation of the attention of those officials to them while in their respective cities.

HAILSTORM ON SAVANNAH RIVER—DESTRUCTION OF THE RICE CROP.—A correspondent writes to the Savannah Republican, that a most destructive hailstorm passed through several of the rice plantations on the Savannah river on the 6th inst., sweeping nearly everything before it. He says there can be no correct estimate of the loss, but it is supposed not less than one-half of all the rice the hail passed through is destroyed, and some fields won't make more than a third of a crop."

CONNECTICUT RIVER.—The difficulties of navigating the Connecticut River have increased so much that the Council of Hartford have proposed measures for their speedy removel. The channel is filling up at several points.

PERILS OF AN AERONAUT.—Professor Steiner made a balloon ascension on the 4th inst., from Milwaukie, Wisconsin, but when about half way across Lake Michigan, he encountered a heavy storm, and the balloon losing its buoyancy, descended rapidly, and striking the water about nine miles from the shore, the Professor was dragged with great velocity through the water, until he managed to cut away the basket, when the balloon arose, and he landed in safety, near the mouth of the Kalamazoo river. He crossed the lake, 90 miles, in two hours.

THE SLAVE TRADE.—The New York Times gives the names of thirty-one American slavers cleared from that port between August 10th, 1859, and June 19th, 1860, and adds that "many others cleared for the West Indies and other parts, and then proceeded to the Coast of Africa for cargoes for the plantations."

Col. John Johnson, of Cincinnati, now in the eighty-sixth year of his age, is probably the oldest Freemason in America. He has been a member in good standing for sixty-five years, and sat in the lodge presided over by Washington.

The trip across the peninsula of Florida, from Ceder Keys to Fernandina, which, previous to the building of the railroad used to require from four to five days, is now made in fifteen hours.

THE RESCUED AFRICANS AT KEY WEST.—The ship "Castilian," sent out by the Colonization Society, received 400 slaves on board, at Key West, and sailed on the 30th ult. for Cape Mount, Africa.

SOUTHERNERS AT THE NORTH.—The New York Journal of Commerce believes that the amount of travel from the South this season has never been surpassed. New York hotels, for some time past, have been thronged from the cotton States.

We learn that on the 17th last., the French Minister at Washington gave the Government formal notice of the declaration of war against China, by France and England. Accompanying the notice was a copy of the recent declaration that neutral goods, except contraband of war, would be respected not only on board neutral vessels, but vessels of the enemy.

Buffalo papers form estimates, based upon the number of names in the city directory just published, upon which they claim a population of 107,000.

The census returns of Cincinnati do not hold out as good a prospect as had been expected, and it is thought that the aggregate population will not exceed 180,000.

THE MORMONS.—The Washington correspondent of the New York Times gives the following explanation of the rumor of Brigham Young's proposition to sell the improvements of Utah to the General Government: During the difficulties with the Mormons, which came near leading to a serious collision with the American troops, a plan proposed by Captain Walter M. Gibson for the immediate emigration of the Mormons to Oceanica was adopted by Brigham Young, and forwarded to Dr. Bernheisel, to be laid before the President for his approval, with the request for some proposition on the part of the Government to purchase their improvements in Utah. The President refused to notice the matter further than to remark that Brigham Young could do as he pleased, as the only duty of the Executive was to see the laws properly executed and enforced. Mr. Gibson has since identified himself with the Mormon fraternity, and made their interests his own. He now proposes to them to emigrete to one of the East India Islands, and reliable information has been received here to the effect that the views of Captain Gibson will be carried out. Colonel Cooper, Utah delegate, touching this and other matters of interest to the saints. After laboring for years in vain to induce our Government to open commercial relations with the rich Islands of the East, he turns disgusted with the hostility of the Federal authorities, and seeks another means to open up the wealth of these Islands. If the Mormons cannot dispose of their property, it is said they will abandon it when arrangements for emigration are completed. Captain Gibson announces his purpose to sail for Sumatra early in the fall, on a voyage of exploration and survey.

THE CALL UPON ENGLISHMEN ANSWERED.—The New York Tribune learns from Mr. Benjamin Woodward, of Worcester, Mass., that he will adopt the child of the late John Hart, the American seaman who was killed by a shot from the Chinese forts, while on his way with Commander Tuttnall from the Powhattan to the ship of the English Admiral. So the call of the Albion to Englishmen is answered.

A DISTINGUISHED TRAVELLER.—Captain Richard F. Burton, the celebrated African explorer, whose work on the "Lake Regions of Central Africa," will soon appear in London, is at present travelling in the United States. Capt. Burton is one of the most intrepid and successful explorers of the present century. In the years 1853-4 he succeeded in reaching Mecca and Medina, and witnessing all the sacred ceremonies, in the disguise of an Afghan pilgrim. His next undertaking was a journey to the city of Harrar, lying inland from the Somali coast. Here, where no European would have been permitted to enter, he again succeeded, by travelling as an Arab merchant. His last and most important journey was to the great Lake Ujiji, or Tanganyika, which he and his companion, Capt. Speke, were the first white men to visit. With the exception of Livingstone and Barth, no living man has done more toward completing the map of Africa.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGOAPH CABLE.—Captain Kell, the agent of the Atlantic Telegraph Company, who was sent out to take up the Newfoundland end of the cable, has succeeded in raising a portion of it, after some weeks of labor, and has discovered a serious defect in it, caused by its resting and chafing on a ledge of sharp rocks, over which it was laid, a mile or two from Bay of Bull's Arm, Trinity Bay. It is Capt. Kell's intention to take up as much of the cable as possible, and land it at New Perlican, making that the future terminus, in case the undertaking to bring it into working order should prove successful.

DISASTER ON THE WESTERN RIVERS.—The list of disasters on the western rivers since the incoming of the present year has already assumed terrible proportions. During this time, only six months, upwards of one hundred lives have been lost, one million and a-half of dollars lost, three serious explosions have occurred, forty-four boats have been snagged, seventeen burat, five lost and injured by collision, twenty steamboats lost or crippled in storms, and one hundred and nineteen barges, coal boats, and other flatboats lost by storm. The number of serious accidents sums up to two hundred and twenty-one.

FAILURE OF THE CORN CROP IN TEXAS.—The Grand Juries of several counties in Texas have called meetings in their respective jurisdictions for the purpose of adopting some measures of relief for the poorer classes of citizens, who are threatened with famine on account of the failure of the corn crop.

SUSPICION OF HAVING BEEN ENGAGED IN THE SLAVE TRADE.—On the 11th inst. a fishing smack arrived at Key West, having on board twelve or fifteen men taken off a Spanish schooner, who reported that their own vessel was burned at sea. But by other reports received at Key West, it was the general impression they were a part of the crew of an American bark, supposed to be the Sultana, of New York, that had been engaged in the slave trade, and had just landed her cargo, consisting of 850 Africans, at or near Matanzas, Cuba, and that they had immediately burned their vessel to the water's edge, and then effected their escape.

EXPENSE OF ENTERTAINING THE JAPANESE IN NEW YORK.—The special committee of the New York Common Council, appointed to receive the Japanese embassy, have been counting up the cost of the affair. The aggregate bills, as presented, foot up $125,000, of which over $90,000 was the Metropolitan Hotel bill. By sharp figuring, these bills, it was found, could be cut down to $109,000. At the latter figure it was accordingly decided to submit them to the Common Council, for the final action in such cases, which will be to order their payment by the comptroller. It remains to be seen, however, whether the comptroller will give his warrant for the payment of the bills, the appropriation to cover the expenses being only $30,000.

PREPARATIONS TO INVADE MEXICO.—A Washington despatch stated that Gen. Bickley has published in one of the papers of that city, an address, in which he requests the Knights of the Golden Circle to repair to the Texas encampment by the 15th of September. Gen. Bickley, in his address, declares that the object of this organization is for the purpose of Americanizing and Southernizing Mexico. The Knights of the Golden Circle go to Mexico as emigrants, under Mexican sanction. The order at the present time is said to consist of 40,000 men.

ANOTHER PRINCE COMING.—Colonel Clarland, aid-de-camp to Prince Napoleon, arrived at New York a few days ago, in the steamship Vanderbilt, from Southampton. It is announced that Col. Clarland comes to perfect the necessary arrangements for the reception of Prince Napoleon, who will shortly visit our shores in his new steam yacht Cassard.

SOUTHERNERS IN MINNESOTA.—The Minnesotian, published at St. Paul, chronicles the arrival of large numbers of visitors from the South. The number of strangers at the International Hotel is stated to be nearly two hundred. It gives a most flowing account of the delights of a summer sojourn in that pleasant Northern land.

About 120 new patents, it is said, are issued every week from the Patent Office in Washington.

A NOVEL PAYMENT.—An old man in Sodus, New Jersey, who is owing a physician a bill of $30, and unable to pay it, has deeded to the doctor his body for dissection after his decease. The deed has been accepted, and a receipt given by the physician.

NEW COTTON AT NEW YORK.—The first bale of new crop cotton was received in New York on the 15th inst., from New Orleans. The cotton was raised on the plantation of Judge R. B. Wofford, near Cuero, Texas, and was received in Galveston on the 3d inst.

U. S. STEAM FRIGATE SUSQUEHANNA.—The Navy Department has issued orders to prepare this vessel for a cruise in the Mediterranean. She will leave about the 30th of August.

CALIFORNIA BOUNDARY SURVEY.—A Washington despatch states that Lieut. Mowry, of Arizona, has been appointed Commissioner to run the eastern boundery line of the State of California.

BURNING OF THE STEAMSHIP PENNSYLVANIA.—We learn from a Norfolk (Va.) despatch that the steamship Pennsylvanie, of Philadelphia, belonging to the Philadelphia and Richmond line, was destroyed by fire near Jamestown a few days ago. Three children perished by drowning! The other passengers on board were all saved. How the fire originated is as yet unknown, but it is supposed by spontaneous combustion.

The Hon. Linton Stephens has resigned his seat upon the bench of the Supreme Court of Georgia.

ENORMOUS GOOSEBERRIES.—For some years an association has existed at Paterson, New Jersey, for cultivating the gooseberry. The members, who are all Englishmen, give annual exhibitions, and award premiums for the largest raised of the several varieties. This year the first prize was taken by Mr. Henry Wilkinson, whose specimen berry, of the "Speedwell" variety, weighed twenty-two pennyweights and nine grains. One which had previously "burst its boiler" weighed twenty four pennyweights and five grains, the largest, probably, ever raised on this continent. The list of premiums is regularly forwarded to England, and published among the Transactions of the Gooseberry Society of that kingdom.

The City Council of Cincinnati have formally negatived a proposition to invite the Prince of Wales to visit that city.

CALIFORNIA.—Late advices from the mining districts and other points, state that the bands of savages who have for several months past roamed through the country, cutting off small parties, destroying stations, burning dwellings, and plundering stock, are more trnquil, and several tribes have gone to Oregon Territory and the Humboldt mountains. The Indians at Washoe have all left, and the miners are again busy at their work.

PIKES PEAK.—Late advices from Denver city represent that the greatest excitement existed on account of the discovery of new and rich mines on Cherry Creek, three miles from that place, also that the news from the Arkansas is of the most cheering character. The gold mines were yielding well, and nearly as promising as the California gulch. Business at Denver City continued to rule dull. A great many citizens had left tha city and gone in the directions of the new diggings. The arrival of emigrants still continued, though the rush had in some measure decreased.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The following is a summary of the most important news from Europe received since our last issue:

Great Britain.—In the House of Lords on the 2d inst., the Duke of Marlborough moved a resolution in favor of the introduction of the Christian religion in Government schools in India. Numerous peers urged the Duke not to press his motion at present, on the ground that it was inexpedient at this junction; but he persisted in urging his motion, whereupon Lord Brougham moved the previous question which was put and agreed to. In the House of Commons, on the same evening, Lord John Russell stated that in the event of an outbreak of lazzaroni, her Majesty's Minister at Naples had received instructions to demand assistance from the British Admiral. In the same house, on the evening of the 5th, the following resolutions, introdduced by Lord Palmerston, were adopted after a spiry debate. They have reference to the dispute between the Lords and Commons as to the right of the former to reject bills relative to taxation. "1. That the right of granting aids and supplies to the crown is in the Commons alone, as an essential part of their constitution; and the limitation of all such grants, as to matter, manner, measure, and time, is only in them 2. That, although the lords have exercised the power of rejecting bills of several descriptions relating to taxation by negativing the whole, yet the exercises of that power by them has not been frequent, and is justly regarded by this House with peculiar jealousy, as effecting the right of the Commons to grant the supplies, and to provide the ways and means for the service of the year. 3. That to guard for the future against an undue exercise of that power by the lords, and to secure to the commons their rightful control over taxation and supply, this house has in its own hands the power so to impose and remit taxes and to frame bills of supply, that the right of the commons as to the matter, manner, measure, and time, may be maintained inviolate."

The official tables of the revenue for the quarter and year ending on the 30th ult., show an increase of £326,918 on the quarter, and £5,727,014 on the year, as compared with last year.

France.—The accounts of the crops were more favorable. There is a report of a marked coolness having again sprung up between Austria and France. It is settled the Emperor intends to place 150,000,000f at the disposal of the Minister of Agriculture and Public Works to be expended in improvements. The Minister of Foreign Affairs, it is announced, has notified Turkey and the other powers that France is determined upon putting an end to the massacre of Christians in Syria. All the great powers, it is said, have formally agreed to the Emperor's proposal for the assembling of a congress, for the purpose of settling the pending European questions, and the conference will certainly meet at Paris during the month of October.

Portugal.—The news from Lisbon is that a new ministry had been formed and that a bill had been presented to the chambers for a loan of £750,000 on the plea of armaments and raising the army to 50,000 men.

Austria.—The Prussian Ambassador at Vienna is said to have had several conferences, since the Baden meeting, with Count Rechburg, with a view to bring about a perfect understanding between Prussia and Austria. The fact that Austria no longer insists upon a guarantee of the integrity of her dominions, was expected greatly to facilitate such an understanding. The latest accounts from Vienna state that there was great agitation relative to a new Constitution and that leading men in the Government had agreed to urge the Emperor to grant one.

Switzerland.—It is asserted that Switzerland will submit to the Conference the following question only: "Is it in the interest of Europe and the neutrality of Switzerland to leave the Simplon Pass perfectly accessible to France, without demanding any fresh guarantees?" Should this question obtain a solution unsatisfactory to Switzerland, she would confine herself to taking cognizance of the declarations in which France engaged herself to assume all the military obligations resulting from article 92 of the final act of Vienna. Switzerland, besides, would claim the right in case of war of military occupying the neutralized districts of Chablels and Faucigny. Switzerland would also state her reserves, the insertion of which in the protocols of the Conference she would demand, and would maintain in principle all the rights which are guaranteed to her by treaties.

Rome.—The Pope, on the occasion of the anniversary of his installation, commuted the punishment of seventy out of a total of two hundred and twelve political prisoners. On the previous day two battalions of Irish volunteers entered the barracks of Rome. The desertions from the Swiss regiments continue. Letters from Rome state that agitation was increasing there, and that a crisis was considered imminent.

Naples.—The following is the decree of the King of Naples, which had for its object the stilling of the pending revolution:

Sovereign Act.—Desiring to give our most beloved subjects a mark of our sovereign benevolence, we have determined to grant constitutional and representative institutions to our kingdom, in harmony with national and Italian principles, so as to guarantee future security and prosperity, and to draw always closer the bonds which unite us to the people whom Providence has permitted us to govern. For this object we have arrived at the following determinations:

1. We grant a general amnesty for all political offenders up to this day.

2. We have charged the Commander Don Antonio Spinelli with the formation of a new odinistry, who shall complete in the shortest possible time, the articles of the statute on the basis of representative, Italian and national institutions.

3. An agreement will be established with the King of Sardinia for the common interests of the two crowns of Italy.

4. Our flag shall be from this day forward adorned with the national colors in vertical bands, preserving always the arms of our dynasty compared in the centre.

5. As regards Sicily, we will grant it analogous representative institution such as to satisfy the wants of the Island; and one of the Princes of our Royal House shall be our Viceroy. Portici, June 25, 1860.

FRANCIS II.,
King of the Two Sicilies, Jerusalem, &c.

The universal opinion at Naples was that the concession came too late. According to the latest accounts the state of siege at Naples had been raised, the constitution of 1848 proclaimed, the press laws of 1848-49 re-established, the Chambers convoked for the 1st of September, and the national guard provisionally re-established. Naples was tranquil.

Sicily.—It is asserted that the liberal concessions of the Neapolitan Government, far from checking the enterprises of the Dictator, have, on the contrary, determined him to precipitate the annexation which he had previously been disposed to delay. Garibaldi had published the following decree:—"Considering the Jesuits and the Ligurian have, during the sad period of Bourbon denomination, been the most energic abettors of despotism, in virtue of the powers conferred upon me it is decreed that the Corporations of Regulars existing in Sicily, under the different names of Society and Houses of Jesuits and of the Redemptor, are dissolved. The individuals comprising them are expelled from the island, and their estates annexed to the dominions of the state." The provisional Government had appointed Prince Da San Giuseppe its charge d'affairs at London, and the Duc De Roccaforte to a similar post at Paris. Garibaldi had recognized the debt of the State and proposed to pay the half-year's dividend which fell due on the 30th ultimo. A new loan of forty-five millions of francs was about to be concluded.

THE ECLIPSE OF THE SUN IN EGYPT.—It appears that the Viceroy of Egypt gave orders that a scientific exhibition should be organized to observe the total eclipse of the sun on the 18th inst., on the line of totality in Africa.

A sheet of thsne paper has been exhibited at Colyton, England, which measures in length four miles, and in breadth six feet three inches. Tha weight of it is but one hundred and ninety-six pounds. It was manufactured in twelve hours.

FRENCH CAVALRY TACTICS.—The London Morning Post calls attention to the new French system of Cavalry tactics. Heavy cavalry are to be abolished, and light horse will be employed, meased ont of range, and poured down upon opposing broken troops. The cavalry will be armed with breech loading carbines.

A PROJECTED SWINDLE.—A correspondent of the Levent (Greek) Herald, writing from Beyrout, warns Americans against a deputation, consisting of two young men, natives of Syria, about to visit America, whose intention it is to solicit alms throughout the States for a proposed (imaginary) hospital, which a Maronite Bishop, they are to declare, wants to build on Mount Lebanon. The writer characterizes the whole scheme as a downright swindle—as an attempt to raise money for private use by false pretences.

A GREEK NEWSPAPER IN LONDON.—The prospectus of a weekly illustrated paper, to be printed in modern Greek, and published in London, every Thursday, has recently been issued.

PROGRESS IN SARDINIA.—In the sitting of the Sardinian Chamber of Deputies on the 25th ult., a bill was passed for organizing an exhibition of agriculture, manufactures and fine arts, to be held at Florence, in September, 1861. The Chamber likewise voted a sum of thirty thousand francs for the preliminary survey of a railway line, which is to cross the Swiss Alps and open a direct communication between Upper Italy and Germany. The Minister of Public Works brought in a bill for lowering the rates of postage, and reorganizing the post-office.

The young Prince Christian William, of Denmark, son of the Crown Prince, has just been admitted to the Royal Naval School at Copenhagen, after undergoing the required examination. This is the first time that a prince of the reigning family of Denmark has competed for admission to a public school.

Since our last issue we have received the following intelligence from Canada, West Indies, Mexico, etc., etc.

CANADA.—The Montreal papers announce the death of the Hon. John Molson, at the advanced age of seventy-two years and nine months. Mr. Molson was the son of Thomas Molson, the well known steamboat proprietor. He, with his son John, was the first to introduce steamboats on the river St. Lawrence, between Montreal and Quebec, and for many years these gentlemen had the entire control of steam navigation in Lower Canada, by which they acquired a large fortune.

NOVA SCOTIA.—A despatch from Halifax announces that the Hon. Thomas Haliburton, Chief Justice of Nova Scotia, died on the 16th inst.

JAMAICA.—Advices from Kingston to the 2d inst., have been received. A letter says: "The weather throughout the island, though variable, is favorable for the crops. The rum yield will be more than an average one, and the sugar and pimento will be of the best quality. Coffee and ginger promise fairly. Ground provisions and corn are plentiful and cheap. Laborers are badly wanted by the planters and many thousands of acres of virgin soil await the hands of tillers—even the cultivated parts are not half peopled."

HAYTI.—A letter from Hayti states that the immigrants from New Orleans were doing well in the culture of cotton on the plains of the Artibonite. Twenty-four cotton gins were in operation in that quarter.

MEXICO.—The Mexican papers have exciting accounts of the the investigation of the State of Chiapas, by a party of "real fillibusteros," from Guatemala. They are said to have burned several haciendas, and to have returned home with a large amount of booty.

A Tampico paper announces the arrival at Miramon at the city of Mexico on the 7th inst. The city was said to be in a most deplorable state. By way of Matamoros we learn that a large conducta from Zacatecas, consisting of some $1,250,000, en route to the Rio Grande, had been stopped at Monterey, by Gov. Vidaurri, by whom it was still held at last accounts.—The cause ar particulars of the detention has not come to hand.

It is stated, from Washington, that France and England have resolved to intervene in the affairs of Mexico, and bring about an armistice for twelve months. That accomplished, they will call a convention of delegates, to arrange the questions at issue between the belligerents in that distracted republic. Mr. Wyke, the new British Minister to Mexico, will go out in a short time from England, with full instructions on the subject. It is also stated that the United States have been invited to take part in this policy, but it is not likely that the invitation will be accepted.

HONDURAS.—A letter from Belize mentions the arrival of General Walker at the Island of Roatan, and that on the 27th of June, he and his men left the Island—destination supposed to be Honduras.

A MOROCCO NEWSPAPER.—The first journal ever published in Morocco has lately appeared. It is printed at Tetuan, in the Spanish language, and is distributed gratuitously. It bears the name of the Echo of Tetuan.

STATUE OF THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD.—James Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd, will have his memory yet further perpetuated in Scotland by the erection of a monument, the foundation of which was commenced a few weeks since. Currie, a sculptor of some note, is to model the statue.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

The Hobart College (N. Y.) Faculty, at the late commencement at Geneva, conferred the title of Doctor of Divinity on Rev. Hoid. McMurphy, President of Shelby College, Ky.; and Trinity College, Hartford, Conn., the same title on Rev. Forbyes M. Hubbard, Professor in the University of North Carolina.

The California Methodists are wisely attempting to provide for the educational wants of the Church on the Pacific. They have a University and a Female Collegiate Institute; Rev. E. Bannister is President of the former; Rev. G. S. Phillips of the latter. Their combined students are 178—a good beginning.

We learn from the English papers that Dr. Hannah is suffering from ill-health. He was unable to attend the May meetings in London, or even preside in his own district meetings in Manchester.

The Rev. Dr. Daniel C. Houghton, editor of the American Presbyterian, published in Philadelphia, died suddenly in that city on Sunday afternoon, 8th inst.

CITY NEWS.

The Common Council has elected Mr. Anatole Blache to fill the place of Recorder of Second District, left vacant by the demise of the, Hon. A. L. Fabre. Mr. Blache was Recorder Fabre's first clerk.

Messrs. J. L. Kelly & Co's large hardware and ship chandlery establishment, a double three-story building, running through from Front Levee to Fulton street, between Gravier and Poydras streets, was destroyed by fire on the evening of the 18th inst. The building was valued at about $15,000, and the stock at $40,000 to $50,000. Loss covered by insurance.

The Eclipse of the sun on the morning of the 18th inst., was visible here exactly according to the calculations of the American Almanac. At one minute after six o'clock the commencement of the obscurration was very apparent on the upper limb of the orb, and gradually increased until, at about a quarter before seven, which seemed to be the time at the greatest obscuration. The shadow of the moon then gradually passed from the disc of the sun, and at twenty-five minutes past seven, had left entirely.

A Douglas ratification meeting was held in Canal street on the night of the 19th inst., and was largely attended. The Hon. John Forsythe, of Mobile, Ex-Senator Soule, and the Hon. Miles Taylor were the principal speakers.

It is announced that the Mechanics and Agricultural Association of this State, of which Mr. C. H. Slocomb is Acting-President, has purchased the Creole Race Course, near the city, for their Fair Grounds. The Delta says: "The price given for this valuable tract, consisting of eighty-four arpents, was $65,000. It will make the largest and, if properly improved, the handsomest and most convenient Fair Grounds in the United States. The land is high and of easy access from the city."

On Thursday morning, 19th inst., a fire broke out in the drug store of Mr. Henry Goldman, on Canal street, near the Custom House, by which that store was consumed and four others were almost completely destroyed, while others were seriously damaged. In the course of the day, Goldman was arrested at the instance of H. W. Connor & Son, who charged him with having given them a check on the Crescent City Bank, for $296 41, in payment of a note of his which they held for collection, when he had no money in said bank. On this charge he was admitted to bail, in the sum of $1000. On Friday morning, 20th, Goldman was arrested on a charge of arson, and was committed to await an examination.

We learn from the Picayune that the long delayed construction of the Levee Water-works has been commenced, and will be prosecuted with energy. This is good news.

INTERESTING FROM JAPAN.

PARTICULARS OF THE ATTEMPT TO MURDER THE REGENT.

A series of despatches from Wm. Alcock, the British representative in Japan, to Lord John Russell, have been made public. The following, dated Yedo, April 2, 1860, describes the attempted assassination of the Regent:—"On the morning of the 24th of March, as the Gotairo, or Regent, was on his way to the Tycoon's castle, surrounded by his retinue, a band of seventeen men made a sudden rush on the cortège, intending to slay him and his norrimon. They did not succeed, it appears, but there is something so illustrative of the state of the country, the times and the people, in the whole affair, that a short account of the details will not be without interest.

"None but the most determined men, willing to sacrifice their lives (had the largest number given been doubled) could have ventured on such a desperate enterprise. They do not seem, however, to have omitted anything calculated either to insure success in their object or their own escape afterwards. As regards the plan of attack, the choice of time, place, etc., some strategic skill was shown. The morning selected was wet and bleak, alternately snowing and raining heavily, from which they derived a double advantage. Their adversaries were all hampered by rain-coats and water-proofs, ill-prepared to use their arms, while they themselves were enabled to conceal beneath the same ample vestments their equipment and coats of mail, and approach close without giving rise to any suspicion. The distance to be traversed was so short they were very limited as to choice of place, for the Gotairo's mansion stands on a gentle declivity, five hundred paces from the bridge and gate leading to the Tycoon's palace; and a broad road between the house and the bridge lies along the edge of the great moat.

"A wider space is formed by a broad road which debouches on the bridge coming from the city, at the angle where the two roads meet, and here they made their attack, one of their number pretending to thrust himself between the advanced guards and the norrimon which bore the Regent. Those immediately about his person on each side rushed to the front, when the rest of the conspirators; profiting by the confusion, and throwing off their rain cloaks, discovered themselves armed to the teeth in coats of mail, and made a dash at the norrimon, severing the hands of some of the bearers off at a blow, and making desperate thrusts through the sides of the vehicle in which the Gotairo was seated. Several of the attendants were cut down; two of the assailants also were killed on the spot. While this was being transacted some others broke from the adjoining Bemio's house, seeing the danger of the Gotairo, rushed out and snatching the norrimon up in their arms, bore it away, and thus rescued its occupant from his perilous position, not, however, before he had received several wounds.

"The attacking party, seeing all was lost, and overpowred by numbers, took to flight. One being too badly wounded to make good his escape, after a short effort, his companions tustently struck off his head and one of them ran off with it, so that, living or dead, its owner might tell no tales. This man was only arrested at some distance, and after he had dashed through a gateway across the road. His flight cost the officer in charge of the gate his life, as he was ordered the next day to perform the "hari-kari," and despatch himself, as the penalty of his ineffident guard. The Daimio, also, whose office it is to guard the bridge and gate which lead to the Tycoon's, and whose house is situated just at the angle, has been imprisoned within its own walls; and to-day, as I rode past, I saw his gateway boarded up. He is not even allowed to cook nay food; but under cover of the night, his people are said to be allowed to find means of saving him and his family from dying of starvation.

"From this rapid history of the affair, in its leading circumstances, it will be seen that such an event is well calculated to give rise to serious reflections as to the state of the country.—So far as I have the means of judging, it has created a profound sensation among the ruling powers. All the gates of the city were closed last night; a large increase to the number of police and officers attached to each of the legations was instantly made, with a verbal intimation that they were anxious for our safety. I had only just arrived from Yakuhama the morning of the attack, having left both my colleagues there after our consultations on the spot as to the distribution of land. Since then, new gates, fences, and guard houses have sprung up in various directions, about the legations and in the city. On the third day after the event, the Minister of Foreign affairs sent two of the Governors to give me official information of the ecanticst kind, and that in some degree extorted, to the purport that an attack had been made. Several of the assailants had been seized, and they were in hot pursuit of the remainder, who certainly could not long escape, since in their hands they held the means (by torture was implied, but not expressed) of gaining all needful information. Two of those who fled, it is reported, finding their pursuers gaining upon them, deliberately stopped, and, leaving bare the abdomen, performed the hari-kari—it being a point of honor never to interrupt or interfere, even for the ends of justice, with a man so honorably engaged.

"Here, then, is the highest personage in the empire, after the Mikado and the Tycoon, close to his own residence, on the great highway of the official and moated quarter, surrounded by his own retinue, (always a large one,) preceded by a brother of the Tycoon with his retinue still in sight, and followed by another high Daodo and his escort, all of whom, it appears, were mute spectators, attacked by a small armed band, variously represented as ten and seventeen in number, with a desperation which shows they must have consented to the sacrifice of their lives to obtain the end. They were the Prince of Mito's men, one of the "Gosan-kuy," as the three brothers of the Tycoon are styled; a disaffected pretender to the succession. His territories lie some seventy miles from Yedo, behind the head of the bay, and it is said they are a prey to insurrection among his followers. The old Prince, soon after the death of the late Tycoon, was deposed for plotting against the young Tycoon, and his son, a man of forty, was installed in his place, such being the usual practice when the head of a house falls into disgrace.

"We appear in the later of Japan, then, to be transported back to Europe in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, or still earlier when feudal princes and nobles lived, surrounded by armed retainers, raised their own levies and waged war on each other, or their suzerain, as passion or interest might suggest—chiefs who had settled their own feuds by a gut-apens or the assassination by their followers of no obnoxious rival—the times of our own Richards and Henrys—of Francis I, the Charleses and Henrys of France, or the Guelphs and Ghibellines of Italy.

"The question which first suggests itself on a review of the facts is one of grave importance. Is this a commencement of a civil war for the succession, or merely a feud between the Prince of Mito and Ikamokami, the hereditary regent of a minor, or was it merely an attack of "loonings," an the Government would have us believe—disbanded soldiers and ruffians?

"Whatever may be the true answer, a country where seventeen men can be found, at the bidding of any master, to devote themselves with a heroic contempt for death, almost without a chance of escape, and to that which is more terrible still, torture such as the Japanese employ with true Oriental refinement, can offer little security either to individuals or governments.—And to this conclusion the Ministers and Councils of State would appear to have arrived, if one might trust their own acts and speech.

"As regards the foreign representatives here and the Consuls at Kanagawa, either the Japanese officials designedly exaggerate their sense of alarm, (too ready as they are to turn everything to account, in order to curtail our liberty, and make us virtually prisoners in their keeping,) or they have seen cause for great anxiety. They have certainly displayed no ordinary diligence in providing ostensible means of protection; I say ostensible, for if it were, indeed, a part of the designs of any Daimio, it has been said to be that of the deposed Prince of Mito and others, to have us massacred, in order to embroil the actual Government with the Western Powers, "I cannot say I have any faith in our two-sworded officials; I doubt if they would be the slightest safeguard against such determined assassins as those who recently undertook to kill the Gotairo in the midst of his escort; and where these came from, more, doubtless, are to be found of the same stamp. When the ministers then, send two governors of Foreign Affairs, as they have done to-day, with instructions to urge upon me and my colleagues the extreme danger of stirring outside our gates, there being so many of these same "loonings" abroad, and requesting that we would consent to imprison ourselves within our respective legations, or take the risk and peril of anything that might happen to ourselves, it is difficult to say what are the proportions of truth and of statecraft which enter into such representations.—I could only answer that under no circumstances could I consent to this virtual imprisonment, or release them from their responsibility to afford efficient protection; and finally, that such danger as they hinted at would reach me just as certainly within the gates of the legation as without.

"All speculation on such possible contingencies must, on the other hand, be idle, for the simple reason that nothing the foreign representatives can do, short of abandoning their post, could materially influence the issue, or afford that security which the Regent himself vainly hoped he enjoyed in the capital, surrounded by his own people. It is reported that he sent a dispatch off instantly, to be sent on at the rate of ten miles an hour, to his dominions, distance of some 210 miles, with orders to muster all his armed retainers, and join him without delay.

"I thought it right, on receiving the official intelligence, to address a few lines of condolence to the Ministers of Foreign Affairs, and of congratulation also at the escape of the Gotai-ro out of the hands of the assassins. I added, that possessing some surgical experience, my services should be at the disposal of the Regent; but I have little idea that they will be accepted, nor have I much reason to desire it, under all the circumstances. Yet, looking at the low state of their medical and surgical knowledge, it seemed but an act of common humanity, as well as of courtesy, to make the offer, and I trust your Lordship will approve of my having taken this course."

RUMORED MOVEMENT OF THE LEGITIMISTS.

The well-informed London correspondent of the National Intelligencer, in his letter of the 28th ult., says:

"Late news from France would lead us to expect—if we were not continually kept nervous by rumors equally startling—that a serious European crisis was at hand. The current rumor is, that a bold move is about to be made for the restoration of what is called legitimate sovereignty, and the influence of the Roman Church on the continent. Paris is to be the center of this movement. A large army is to be formed in the Papal States, recruited from all quarters of the world, and sustained by the fortunes of exiled Italian Princes, and of those in Germany who fear a similar fate, and by all other supporters of the legitimate thrones and papacy. This movement is also decidedly in opposition to Napoleon III and the present French Government. A great Legitimist demonstration was made in Rome on the 16th inst., when, at a repast which took place in the garden of the Cafe Nanoyn, where nearly all the French officers in Rome were present, the Franco-Papal officers drank the health of Henry V, and that of Pio Nono, and also "Death and Confusion to Napoleon III and Victor Emanuel." General Lamoriciere, it is said, strongly reprimanded the officers who had so undignifiedly manifested their political sympathies and antipathies. A similar demonstration was made on the same day by the French officers in the Pope's service stationed at Peterio. Inscriptions of "Henri V," and "Mort a Napoleon III," were also posted up in several conspicuous parts of Rome, but which were assiduously destroyed by the French police wherever discovered. A clerical conspiracy has also extended its ramifications, not only throughout Italy, but also into France, and has, we are told, its agents in Belgium, Catholic Germany, Spain and Ireland.

The Morning Post's correspondent at Paris also says that a Papal conspiracy on a grand scale is being organized, which has in view, besides the objects already stated, the restoration of the Bourbon dynasty in France, by means of an army organized "by the Papal General Lamoriciere." This army is to be formed in and issued from the dominions of His Holiness Pius IX.—We do not apprehend a crusade of such wide proportions, or spread over so long a period as that did in which Richard and Saladin were prominent performers, but there is at the present day sufficient of inflammable material to widely disturb the tranquility of Europe."

FAILURE OF THE RUSSIAN LOAN IN LONDON.

"Spectator," the well informed and reliable London Correspondent of the New York Commercial Advertiser, in his letter of June 30, writes: "The chief event of the week has been the failure of the Russian loan. Today was the latest period fixed for the applications to be sent in, and there have been scarcely any responses. This second miscarriage will prove seriously annoying to the Russian governments. It is only ten months since they attempted the issue of a Three per cent. stock for $60,000,000 at 68½, when the damaging result was experienced of only $35,000,000 being taken, which has ever since been held at a considerable discount. The present loan was to have been nominally for $10,000,000, but as it was in a Four and a half per cent. stock at 90¾, the cash produce would have been nearly as great as that which was sought to be obtained last year by the $60,000,000 loan at 68½.

No one was surprised at the failure last year because the price named was preposterously high and the negotiation was intrusted, not to Baring or Rothschilds, but to Thomson, Bonar & Co., whose ripple in the management of such affairs is of course considerably below that of the two great firms. In the present instance, however, the price was moderate and always having were selected as the agents. The want of success, therefore, affords strong evidence of the discredit into which Russia has brought herself by the grasping, and at the same time rather tricky, course pursued regarding the former loan, and also by the various indirect but yet powerful indications she has, in the opinion of the English public, given of her readiness up to a certain point to encourage the intrigues of the Emperor Napoleon.

MR. EVERETT'S POSITION.

LETTER FROM HON. LEVERETT SALTONST

Poetry.

A MUSICAL INSTRUMENT.

BY ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.

I.

What was he doing, the great god Pan,
To sit in the reeds by the river?
Making a poem of sighs and of song,
To the flowing of waters between,
Or chasing the swallow along the sea-sand
With his dancing and fluttering hoof of a goat,
Or breaking the golden lilies afloat
With the dragon-fly on the river?

II.

He tore out a reed, the great god Pan,
From the deep, cool bed of the river.
The limpid water turbidly ran,
And the broken lilies a-dying lay,
And the dragon-fly had fled away,
Ere he brought it out of the river.

III.

High on the shore sate the great god Pan,
While turbidly flowed the river,
And hacked and hewed as a great god can,
With his hard bleak steel at the patient reed,
Till there was not a sign of a leaf indeed
To prove it fresh from the river.

IV.

He cut it short, did the great god Pan,
(How tall it stood in the river!)
Then drew the pith, like the heart of a man,
Steadily from the outside ring,
Then notched the poor dry empty thing
In holes as he sate by the river.

V.

"This is the way," laughed the great god Pan,
(Laughed while he sate by the river!)
"The only way since gods began
To make sweet music they could succeed."
Then, dropping his mouth to a hole in the reed,
He blew in power by the river.

VI.

Sweet, sweet, sweet, O Pan!
Piercing sweet by the river!
Blinding sweet, O great god Pan!
The sun on the hill forgot to die,
And the lilies revived, and the dragon-fly
Came back to dream on the river.

VII.

To hall a beast is the great god Pan,
To laugh, as he sits by the river,
Making a poet out of a man.
The true gods sigh for the cost and pain—
For the reed that grows nevermore again
As a reed with the reeds in the river.

BY FANNY BRELDON.

Chapter XIV.

"The hour approaches to restore
Our cherish'd wanderer to his home once more,
Where sacred ties his manly worth endear,
To faith still true, affection still sincere!"

Frank Carlton arrived safely at home the following day. He returned with a repetation which he had richly earned. For while many had shrunk from the infectious fever of the sick and dying in one of our Southern cities, he tarried, though a stranger and yearning to get to the assistance of their wants, supplied their needs, and did all that human skill could devise to relieve their loathsome breath, for it seemed as if the mercy of heaven was for a while withdrawn from the devoted city, and that God had appeared in all his wrath and stern ness.

"Vengeance is mine, I will repay!"

During this season of terrible retribution, homes were deserted, friends forsaken; and even relatives sometimes left with only the presence of the Son of God to cheer and walk with them through the dark valley of the shadow of death.

The summer time was gone; and with it had fled, from some, even the memory of its sorrows.

Frank, after the first greeting of friends and relatives at home was over, hastened to Mr. Elwin's to see Alline. The meeting was a rapturous one.

It was a calm, still evening. The flowers appeared to breathe and the air balmier to Alline. The quiet, moderate beauty of nature seemed to take its hues and coloring from feelings that pervaded her soul.

Frank said he, after their first greeting was over, "your past life has been troubled and gloomy; but for the future you shall be happy. No clouds shall dim the brightness of your sky, if my love can keep it clear. Often in that far off, distant land where I have spent the best few years of my life I have sat alone, and, giving my imagination free scope, pictured in waking dreams thy purity and thy loveliness! Many times has thy worshipped image, thy soft, and, but witching smile came up from the depths of memory; and thy dark eyes, and unsullied but shadowed face made my heart one sphere of light.—And now, Alline, for the future I meet ever stand between you and misfortune, sorrow, and affliction. I will forever watch over you and guard you with my love."

He lingered with her long after twilight. Their thoughts, feelings and plans for the future might have occupied them longer, but Alline felt that his parents had as yet the first claim on him and urged him to return to them. But this love, generous and noble as it was, could not save her from the heaviest trial which she had as yet been called to bear.

Mary, dear little Mary, to whom she had promised to be a guide and a blessing; she, whom she loved as nothing else on earth; she, for whom she had prayed so long, so unceasingly, was to be called away from earth. Yes, while yet so young; but a child, the symptoms of that hereditary disease which had borne away her mother were startlingly developing themselves in her. It was a sad sight to see the helpless little form surrounded by her pillows day after day, patiently bearing her sufferings. Her gentleness would have shamed many an older person; no murmur ever fell from her lips; but, "how good every one is to me," was the sentence which often fell from her lips, and came from her grateful heart. And, oh, how Alline loved to see those large black eyes brightened with pleasure, almost hope, when the mild, pleasant face of the physician appeared in her chamber with his offering of books and flowers, which diverted her mind much. He often sat by her longer than was necessary for a professional visit, engaging her in conversation and enlivening her spirits by his earnest sympathy and familiar face.—And the young, afflicted child's affections were called forth by his constant and generous attention. He loved to soothe to rest the anxious heart of Alline by tales of hope. One day he proposed that Mr. Elwin should send her from home, on a visit. He said he thought change of air would renew her failing strength; and Alline prepared her for a journey. She regretted that she could not go with her, but she provided all things necessary for her comfort, and kind friends accompanied the sick girl whose love almost equalled Alline's. But it was a hard trial then to part even for a short period from her precious charge. The eyes of Mary, too, filled with tears as she was placed in the carriage which was to take her to the boat, and as it wheeled from the little gate, the child raised herself from her pillows and extended her arms towards her sister in a wild, almost despairing manner, and then sank back calm as before. She knew that it was thought best that she should go, and determined to make the most of her visit and improve all she could. Alline's heart was so sad that she burst into tears as she entered the lonely room of her sister; it recalled the death of her mother with all the sad hours which she had experienced after that mournful event. But she raised the curtains from the window, brought flowers and ornamented the stand of the child as though she were present to be cheered by their fresh beauty. Not till she had arranged everything about the room, which had been thrown into disorder by packing, did Alline compose herself to take that rest she so much required. Next morning she met her father with a cheerful face, and tried to chase the shadows from his brow by her own lively conversation.

"Mary will return much better I hope, Papa, for there is nothing she so much enjoys as change; and diversion of mind and pure fresh air may improve her very much."

"I hope so, my child," answered Mr. Elwin, "but let us try to prepare our hearts, Alline, to bear her loss if it should please God to remove her from us. I feel a strange yearning toward her—that anxious turning of my thoughts to her that so often precedes danger to those we love."

Many had been gone only two weeks when one evening Mr. Elwin brought a letter. It was from the friends with whom Mary was staying, and urged Alline to come to them. The letter stated that Mary had not improved as they hoped she would, but seemed rather to decline; and that she did nothing but weep and implore them to send for her sister.

Alline was greatly troubled by this news, but felt that she had no time to lose in grief, but began a hasty preparation for her visit; putting up such things as she thought she would need, others for the sick girl; she knelt and commended herself and sister to the care of Him whose ever watchful eye is over all. The next morning was one of clouds and rain, and not calculated to cheer the heart of our heroine. But the boat left early, and she hurried to the landing without having time to reflect on the dulness of the day or the object of her visit, and not till she was seated in her quiet state room did all the anxiety and grief of her heart find relief in tears. Not long did she thus continue to indulge her sorrow, for after bathing her eyes and calming herself she went into the saloon hoping to find some acquaintance on board; "for," thought she, "if there are none here with whom I am acquainted, strangers may divert my mind for a while, and lighten my troubled spirits." It was early noon before the boat left the wharf, and the passengers were getting impatient and out of humor, when the bell rung out the starting signal. Those who had gone aboard to see friends off and those whose business or curiosity had called on the steamer hastily left, some forgetting to bid the good bys which they had come to say. Others snatched a hasty kiss and bade adieu to those who perhaps they never met again, and then the beautiful steamer began to "walk the water like a thing of life." The day continued dull and dark with occasional showers of rain, till late in the evening, when the clouds begin to lift themselves and were soon dispersed by a gentle breeze, whose balmy breath was very agreeable to the inmates of the saloon, who, finding the rain had ceased, soon crowded the guards to witness the glowing western sky. And what a beautiful scene it was; all thought as they stood looking upon the grandeur of the heavens that nothing could add to its brilliant beauty, but while they gazed

"Far up the blue sky a fair rainbow unrolled
Its soft-tinted pinions of purple and gold,
'Twas born in a moment, yet quick as its birth
It had stretched to the uttermost parts of the earth,
And fair as an angel it floated as free
With a wing on the earth and a wing on the sea."

And not only did the rainbow add brilliancy to the whole scene, but Alline's young heed bowed in devotion and love, and her spirit was encircled by hope, and her heart attuned to gladness and praise. For it seemed that God who had made heaven and earth so bright would not leave her soul always to struggle in darkness and gloom, but even as the sky was rendered gloriously beautiful and bright after storms and clouds, so also would her night and in morning's bright beams.

It was late the next evening when Alline arrived at the home of her friends, and clasped the form of her sister to her breast in heartfelt joy and love. After remaining for some days Alline prepared to return home; she had not come to take the child but to cheer her by her presence, for it was thought best by all that she should remain where she was for a while longer. And Mary seemed more contented and willing to remain than Alline expected to find her. But when Alline pressed her to her heart in parting the child clung to her as though it were her last embrace, till her arms relaxed from weakness. Placing her upon the couch, Alline pressed her lips again to her brow, and passed from the room. In the stillness of that night she felt so weary, such a longing after rest from anxiety, that she almost wished that another day might never dawn upon her. But slowly rolled on the dark night to a still darker day for her, for Alline arrived at home only to be followed by the sick child, who became so urgent after her sister left, and failed so fast, that she was sent on immediately with a relative who promised to do all for her comfort while on the hunt.

Dr. Lee soothed the fears of Alline and Mr. Elwin as long as possible, but it became more and more apparent every day that the loving, gentle Mary was passing away. And when he told them that nothing could be done to restore her to health, that he could only alleviate her sufferings, how earnestly Alline prayed that it might not be so.

A short time before her death she asked to be placed in a large chair and drawn out on the gallery, that she might enjoy the cool breeze and see the bright sunset.—Her request was complied with, and thus supported by pillows, she seemed to enjoy the beauty of God's own creation so much. She sat long, looking away, far away, from the objects around her, it seemed to Alline, who had seated herself on the low door sill; for her large, dreamy eyes had a strange, wrapt expression as they fixed themselves upon the distant sky. Once before, only, had Alline seen this lovely look upon her face, and now she felt the same shadowy fear as then. Laying her hand upon the child she sought to rouse her from the trance which she seemed to be in. "Mary, darling," she exclaimed, "look at the beautiful flowers and green trees. Why look into the far off clouds or veiled future? You make me nervous with almost superstitious dread."

Slowly the sick girl's eyes turned from the scene upon which she appeared to have been looking, and fixed them upon her sister's face. "Ally, have you forgotten the dream I had, before mamma died, of the bright clouds and holy angels, and how they carried her through the blue sky while music and singing attended the seraph band? Oh, I shall never forget! But it seemed while I looked just now, that I did not dream but saw another scene like unto the first, only it appeared to be me that the angels carried. I felt myself borne along through the dim, far off brightness of those golden clouds. Oh, Ally, I was happy, glad to go, but I turned to gaze backward, down the misty depths through which I had passed, and I saw you, sister, with your face pale and sorrow-stricken, your hands clasped in hopeless agony, and at the same time the angels paused in their flight and looked also upon you; my attention was attracted to them for a moment and when I looked again there was one by your side whose brow was radiant with love and truth, and into whose eyes you seemed to be looking with hope and trust; your brow was calm, your lips wreathed in sad but beautiful smiles, and a bright cloud of rainbow hues bent lovingly above your head. Oh, I was so glad, so happy, dear Ally! Even the angels smiled as they tuned their harps to sweeter melody, and their songs to anthems of higher praise. And on, on, higher and still higher we were borne, till the City of the New Jerusalem was just before us, with its spires and domes, its streets of pearly gold, and walls of precious stones. "The City had no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine on it, for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb was the light thereof." And then, Alline, you called me; your voice sounded faint and far off at first, but my spirit gradually drew nearer and nearer to you, till I realized that I was still upon earth, the same suffering little girl that I have been so long. But, sister, if you had not called me back, if I had been permitted to enter those pearly gates, I should not have returned. A little longer, and I should have been with dear mamma and the Good Shepherd, and there would have been no valley or dark shadow of which I have heard, and from which my soul shrinks with so much dread. I almost wish you had let me go; but it is selfish then to desire to leave you, my good sister, for you will be lonely indeed; but then God will send the good strong arm to lean upon, and the bright cloud to comfort you, which I saw."

She ceased speaking; and Alline, who had listened wonderingly to the vision of the child, drew her to her bosom as if afraid that she would indeed leave her.

"Oh, Heavenly Father I spare her a little longer!" was the wild prayer of her heart, as she bore the little form within the house, for the glow had faded from the western sky and the chill dew of evening were falling fast, and night struck chill upon the heart of Alline.

Within doors, though her vigil was a lonely one, yet the cheerful light of the fire and lamp shed a glow of comfort around the room, and hope revived to lend her delusive brightness to the troubled girl. But as morning dawned this faint gleam passed away, for the child's rest was broken by restless starts and suffocating spells, which alarmed her father and sister.

And dread and gloom settled upon the household. The child tried to speak several times, but seemed for a time to have lost the power of speech, though perfectly conscious of all around her. Many kind friends came in as soon approached, and sympathizing hands and hearts did all that could be done to comfort the grief-stricken ones and alleviate the dying girl's sufferings. Toward the middle of the afternoon Mary sank into a quiet sleep, from which she awoke able to speak, and her first words were, "Ally, Dr. Lee will not forget to come, will he? I want to see him so much before I die. Father, what time is it?" was her next question; and being told that it was five o'clock, she turned her eyes to the window from which she could see the western sky, and murmured, "a little while longer and I shall be with God and the angels."

And thus, at sunset, and her eyes fixed upon the clouds in which she had seen the vision, she passed from earth. Wrapped in the snowy drapery of the dead, her transparent hands crossed upon the silent bosom, and fresh flowers scattered upon the glossy locks of her dark hair, she seemed the embodiment of angel loveliness and christian meekness.

Her little coffin was followed to the grave by many who had known and loved her for her simple faith and pious life. But not in the silent tomb did we leave her. The beautiful corpse was indeed placed there; but the precious jewel had already entered those pearly gates beyond the grave, beyond the sky.

As Alline watched the last moments of that tenderly beloved young sister, it seemed that all the waves of this life were to pass over her; it seemed that this storm, this trial, would overwhelm her. And as she exclaimed, in her deep sorrow, "I have nothing now to live for!" these lines occurred to her:

"Live for those who love you,
For those you know are true,
For the Heaven that smiles above you,
And waits your spirit, too;
For all human ties that bind you,
For the task by God assigned you,
For the bright hopes left behind you,
And the good that you can do."

She felt that God had stretched out his helping hand to aid her in bearing this heavy affliction, that she had strength which He had given her, that she had energy He had implanted in her, to arouse herself and struggle with her sorrow for the sake of those who loved her as their very life. She surrendered herself to His care, was reconciled to His will, at last, and felt that He would rule the waves of all her after life; that He would subdue the storm, and she would yet know that she had not suffered in vain.

THE FIRST LADY PEEL.

Sir Robert Peel, the first baronet and the second manufacturer of the name, inherited all his father's enterprise, ability and industry. His position, at starting in life, was little above that of an ordinary man, for his father, though laying the foundation of future prosperity, was still struggling with difficulties arising from insufficient capital. When Robert was only twenty years of age, he determined to begin the business of cotton-printing, which he has by this time learned with his father, on his own account. His uncle, Jas. Howarth, and William Yates of Blackburn, joined him in his enterprise; the whole capital which they could raise among them amounting to only £500, the principal part of which was supplied by William Yates. His father kept a small inn in Blackburn, where he was known as "Yates o' th'-Bull," and having saved money by his business, he was willing to advance his son a start in the lucrative trade of cotton printing, then in its infancy. Robert Peel, though comparatively a mere youth, supplied the practical knowledge of the business; but it was said of him, and it proved true, that he "carried an old head on young shoulders."

A ruined corn mill, with its adjoining fields, was purchased for a comparatively small sum, near the then insignificant town of Bury, where the works long after continued to be known as "The Ground;" and a few wooden sheds having been run up, the firm commenced their cotton printing business in a very humble way in 1770, adding to it that of cotton spinning a few years later. The frugal style in which the partners lived may be inferred from the following incident in their early career. William Yates, being a married man with family, commenced house-keeping on a small scale, and, to oblige Peel, who was single, he agreed to take him as a lodger. The sum which the latter first paid for board and lodging was only eight shillings a week; but Yates, considering this too little, insisted on the weekly payment being increased a shilling, to which Peel at first demurred, and a difference between the partners took place, which was eventually compromised by the lodger paying an advance of 6d. a week. William Yates's eldest child was a girl named Ellen, and she very soon became an especial favorite with the young lodger.

On returning from his hard day's work at "The Ground," he would take the little girl upon his knee, and say to her, "Nelly, thou bonny little dear, wilt be my wife?" to which the child would readily answer, "Yes," as any child would do.

"Then I'll wait for thee, Nelly; I'll wed thee and none else." And Robert Peel did wait. As the girl grew in beauty toward womanhood, his determination to wait for her was strengthened; and after a lapse of ten years—years of close application to business and rapidly increasing prosperity—Robert Peel married Ellen Yates when she had completed her seventeenth year; and the pretty child, whom her mother's lodger and father's partner had nursed upon his knee became Mrs. Peel, and eventually Lady Peel, the mother of the future Prime Minister of England.

Lady Peel was a noble and beautiful woman, fitted to grace any station in life. She possessed rare powers of mind, and was, on every emergency, the high-souled and faithful counsellor of her husband. For many years after their marriage she acted as his amanuensis, conducting the principal part of his business correspondence, for Mr. Peel himself was an indifferent and almost unintelligible writer. She died in 1803, only three years after the baronetcy had been conferred upon her husband. It is said that London fashionable life—so unlike what she had been accustomed to at home—proved injurious to her health; and old Mr. Yates was afterward accustomed to say, "If Robert hadn't made our Nelly a 'Lady,' she might have been living yet.—Smiles's Self-Help.

A CONTRAST IN ROYAL VISITS.

A gentleman communicates to the Toronto Colonist certain interesting reminiscences of the Duke of Kent's visit to Canada, sixty-nine years ago. Now that his grand-son is about to visit his royal mother's provinces in North America, the recollections of the writer are well-timed.—The Duke of Kent's visit to America is thus described: "His Royal Highness and suite left Quebec for Montreal in a number of the ordinary calèches of the country, drawn by French ponies, and urged over the rough roads by Canadian habitant drivers, with pipe in mouth, as is their custom. From Montreal they proceeded to Lachine, in the same primitive fashion, where the Royal party embarked in large batteaux, manned by hardy voyageurs, to stem the mighty St. Lawrence. After many "a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether," and many amusing mishaps and adventures, thoroughly enjoyed by the Royal party, they at length reached still water at Onwagatchun—now Ogdensburgh—where they were met by a barge from Kingston belonging to my brother, Peter Clark, Esq., Clerk of the Legislative Council, and manned by a force of military and sailors from the latter city, where they were quickly and safely conveyed. There they soon embarked on board the King's ship, Mohawk, commanded by Commodore Bouchett, grandfather of the present Commissioner of Customs. In this vessel they proceeded up Lake Ontario to Navy Hall, on the Niagara River, the residence of His Excellency Sir John Graves Simcoe.

The Royal party was there received and entertained with all the state and dignity that was possible, by His Excellency and the various civil and military authorities. With much difficulty horses and saddles were procured for the whole party when they proceeded along the banks of the river to the Falls, where at that period there was but one small log hut for the reception of visitors. Their horses being tied to the trees, they proceeded by an Indian path to the Table Rock. Some of the more adventurous succeeded in descending beneath it, by means of a rude rickety ladder. Curiously being satisfied, the Royal party made their way to Queenstown, where an ample and substantial lunch was prepared by the Hon. Robert Hamilton, who had the honor of entertaining the illustrious visitors. They then returned to Niagara where they dined in the evening with His Excellency the Governor. Many of the great chiefs and warriors of the Six Nations, headed by the renowned Capt. Joseph Brandt, in full war paint, gave the war dance before His Excellency's residence for the amusement of the Royal party. The next morning a large party of the swiftest and most skillful of the young warriors got up a match at Buse-ball, of a very exciting character. Then there were foot races and several other characteristic games, in which His Royal Highness took a very warm interest, and expressed the high gratification he felt in witnessing them.—After having examined the Fort and other objects of interest connected with the French occupation, the Royal party embarked for Kingston, en route for Quebec. The frontier towns on the American side had not then been transferred to the United States.

Contrast with this the pagentry that will attend the coming of the royal sprig—the scenes which will meet his boyish eyes, and wonder such changes can be wrought in half a century.

CHARLES LAMB.

Who that is familiar with the charming essays of Elia, or remembers Lamb's deep devotion to his unfortunate sister, or his saluting his copy of Old Homer with a kiss, or saying grace before reading Milton, or begging Harry Cornwall not to invite a certain lugubrious gentleman to dinner, because his face would cast a gloom over a funeral, or his saying that positively the best thing a man can do is nothing, and next to that, perhaps, good works, or has seen him making light of his trials and troubles—can fail to sympathize with and love the man—the most quaint, eccentric, and lovable of his species—the most exquisite of wits and humorists.

Any new glimpse of Charles Lamb is always pleasant. A true-hearted admirer of his, Dr. J. W. Alexander, thus describes a pilgrimage to the Indin House in August, 1851; I inquired of the doorkeeper about Charles Lamb. He said, "I have been here since I was sixteen years old, but I never heard of any Mr. Lamb." The doorkeeper of the Museum remembered him well. "O yes, sir; he was a very little man, with such small legs, and wore knee-breeches." He directed me to a private stair which would take me down to the Accountant's office. I went into a place below like a bank, and was shown to a principal person, Mr. W. It was the room in which Lamb wrote many years. Mr. W. showed me his window and where his desk was. I looked out at the high blank wall not five feet beyond, and understood Lamb's "India House." Mr. W. showed a quarto volume of "Interest tables," with remarks like these in Lamb's fine round hand on the fly-leaf: "A book of much interest—Ed. Review." "A work in which the interest never flags—Quar. Review." "We may say of this volume that the interest increases from the beginning to end—Monthly Review." Mr. W. knew Lamb well. "He was a small man—smaller than you—and always wore short and black gaiters." Poor Elia! what would he have said if he had known the memory of his continuations alone survived to distinguish him from his fellows? But in the progress of the ages the very India House itself is now shortly to be sold, and will probably be replaced by a railroad station. In the general clearance of the company, it is said £5,000 has been realized by the sale, at so much per ton, to the paper mills of the duplicate echives alone, so circumlocutory were all the processes of business in the princely corporation. In the mass doubtlessly was included what Lamb emphatically called his "true works."

The imagination is the roof-window of the soul. The senses are the basement windows.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MRS. MARTHA L. ABBOTT, daughter of Henry P. and Rachel Garrison, was born April 28, 1828, and died in Columbus, Ga., June 28, 1860. Beautiful and accomplished in her early womanhood, she was a dutiful daughter, a loving wife, and a wise and affectionate mother. She won the friendship and love that a good and lovely woman always wins. Dedicated to God in holy baptism in her infancy by pious parents, brought up in the Church, she was an earnest Christian—always to attend once, when practicable, upon all the means of grace. She was devoted to the Sabbath-school. "My dear," said her mother, "I am afraid you are going to leave us." "My dear mother, and precious husband, do not grieve for me. I have been living for this hour. I have no fear. My precious Savior is ready to receive me to himself." Her dying chamber is memorable for scenes and words too sacred for description or repetition. Her venerable friend and father in God, Rr. Lovick Pierce, preached the funeral sermon to a large and mourning audience.

MRS. SARAH GAYLE CHILDERS, wife of George H. Childers, died at Shreveport on the 3d inst., aged 21 years, 6 months and 16 days. Our sleeping sister possessed lovely traits of character, which endeared her very dear to her friends and relatives. Her's was a happy, cheerful and self-sacrificing heart; which always sympathized with the sorrows and joys of her associates. When a school girl, her lively temperament and pleasing gentle deportment always made her a general favorite with teachers and fellow-pupils, and afterwards as a young wife and mother, the same sweet disposition, tempered by the religion of her Savior, made her happy in discharging the duties which both of these relations imposed upon her. All of our reminiscences of childhood are intimately connected with thee, dear sister; and O! what a multitude of tender emotions now come crowding before our mental vision of thy goodness, truth, patience and love. Our earnest prayer is, that the link which has been broken here to deep sorrow and anguish, may be united again in joy beyond the grave.

THOMAS CARNAK, our venerable friend and brother, was born in Ireland, June 1, 1784, and came to New York with two brothers and several sisters, in 1797. He visited an uncle in South Carolina, where he married his first wife, Isabella Neely. From there he went to Kentucky, and thence to Tennessee, where he lost his first, and married a second wife, Jemima M'Lemoor. In 1816 he removed to Mississippi, where he passed the remnant of an eventful pilgrimage; he was a worthy member of the M. E. Church for some 40 to 45 years. He died April 10, 1860, full of grace, full of honor, and full of years, aged about 76 years. Should this sketch meet the eye of any of his surviving friends, they will please address his son, James D. Carnak, Crystal Springs, Copiah co., Miss.

PROGRESS OF PROTESTANTISM IN MISSISSIPPI AND THE SOUTH-WEST.—No. XXV.

MR. EDITOR—I heard Bishop Soule express a wish in 1825, that the time might come when the question "who have located this year?" might be stricken for ever from the list of our annual Conference questions. In regard to all trustworthy and faithful ministers I can sincerely reiterate the wish for a dozen weighty reasons, one of which is, that the names and example of some of our best men have been almost completely lost to posterity by their location. I never saw Tobias Gibson, Samuel Parker, or Lewis Hobbs, the "weeping prophet," and yet how often I have been admonished, instructed, and comforted by reading the short sketches of their holy and useful lives, and peaceful deaths, as found in the printed minutes! But who knows anything now about Ashley Hewitt, the apostle of Louisiana, except that he was for many years on the list of traveling preachers, and then located and got out of sight, and almost out of mind. As I have it in my power, from an intimate acquaintance with him of several years standing, as well as from other authentic sources, to give a few items from his valuable life and saint like death, I will make the attempt.

Rev. Ashley Hewitt was admitted as a traveling preacher into the South Carolina Conference, with nineteen others, in 1811, where he continued to labor with acceptability and usefulness for five years, in which time he graduated in due course to Deacon's and Elder's orders. He was then transferred to Mississippi, and traveled Tombeekbee circuit in 1815. In 1817 he was Presiding Elder on the Louisiana District, and at the same time preacher in charge of Washita circuit, and was continued on the same work in 1818. Having married Miss Lucretia Barlow, of Praire Mer Rouge, and no provision being made in Louisiana in those days for the families of traveling preachers, at the end of this year he located, but returned at the next Conference, and was again placed on the Louisiana district, and also in charge of Attakapas circuit; In 1821 and 1822 he was continued on the District, and was also preacher in charge of Washita circuit. In 1823 and 1824 he was on the supernumerary list, and was appointed Conference Missionary. The next year, 1825, he was on the District again, but at the end of the year his health was so completely run down that he was declared superannuated. He, however, removed his family from Praire Mer Rouge to Lake Providence, at the earnest solicitation of Harbord Hood, a wealthy planter on the Lake, and was the pioneer preacher in that region, where he soon succeeded in organizing a society. In 1827 and 1828 he was retained on the supernumerary list that he might be placed in charge of work at Lake Providence, which was now entered on the minutes as a regular circuit. As his health had become so broken down in the flat lands of Louisiana, he concluded to try the hills east of the Mississippi river, and removed his family to the vicinity of Vicksburg, and was in charge of Warren circuit, which then included Vicksburg, in 1829 and 1830. After trying the hills for two years, he despaired of the recovery of his health, and being poor in earthly substance, and depressed in spirits, he concluded to take his family back among their relations in the Praire Mer Rouge, where they had some land and a little patrimony to assist in their support. With a sad countenance he said to me on the eve of his departure from the vicinity of Vicksburg, "the time will come, brother Jones, when the Church will provide for her married preachers, but it comes for ever too late for me. I must return to the Mer Rouge, where I can raise corn and stock to feed my family with." Thus ends his history as a traveling preacher, after having endured hardness as a good soldier, until his outer man was hopelessly prostrated.

How sad the thought that such a man, after such devotion to the Church, should be compelled to follow the plough, and herd cattle, in order to secure a scanty support for his wife and little ones! It is some consolation, however, to know that brother Hewitt was somewhat thrifty in business after his location. He got some property from his father-in-law's estate, and when I was last at his house he seemed to have a competency. The Mississippi Conference did wrong to let such a man go. I do not regret the location of some men who got into the Conference, for they never have been, and I presume never will be anything but a tax and trouble to the itineracy, and it is a relief to get clear of such shadows on such easy terms. But such men as Ashley Hewitt ought to be retained on the superannuated list until they get a transfer from earth to heaven, notwithstanding their modest fears of being a tax, and in the way, and all that. God Almighty bless these old superannuated preachers, every one of them, who have "borne the burden and heat of the day," and have worn themselves out in the work. I would divide my best sympathy with such men were it necessary to their comfort.

Having given a hasty sketch of Ashley Hewitt as an itinerant, I will now speak more particularly of his person, talents, and influence, as a preacher. In person he was tall and spare, light complexion, and mild blue eyes, large mouth and protruding lips; countenance indicative of satisfaction and benevolence, and a general air of innocence in all he said and did. In the pulpit he stood erect, and his gestures were slow and moderate, he seldom looked in the faces of his auditors more than an instant at a time, but seemed to be looking around on the walls just above their heads. In his prime he had a clear and loud voice, and his enunciation was rather slow and remarkably distinct, and he never screamed. His sermons were well planned, and were more didactic than hortatory. If you heard him preach a sermon the second time, it was almost precisely in the same words and sentences as first heard, and yet he neither wrote or memorized them. He took no one by storm, but when he preached in the Spirit, as he often did, the tide of feeling gradually rose higher and higher in the hearer, until he was quite overwhelmed. In 1826 Dr. Alexander Talley and myself got up a little camp-meeting in the Pine Hills about fifteen miles west of Monroe, in Washita parish, La. Brother Hewitt being present by special invitation, he was requested to preach on Sunday morning, when he might be heard by his old acquaintances, among whom he had previously labored fourteen years. His heart and voice were both in first-rate tune that day, and he preached a most heavenly sermon. I felt towards the conclusion that I could bear no more of the Divine presence and love without prostration to the ground. "How did you enjoy the sermon?" said I to Dr. Talley. He replied, "It like to have killed me! It seemed to me that the earthen vessel was so full it was ready to break, and let my enraptured soul fly away toward heaven." Such were the calm, distinct, but glowing sermons of Ashley Hewitt. The Louisianians ought to embalm his memory, for there was a time of need which he was to them a friend indeed.

The harvest of souls had been very scant west of the Mississippi up to the end of 1815. The local difficulties in the way of traveling a large part of the year were almost insurmountable to everybody except professed hunters and Methodist preachers. The support of the ministry was meager indeed, and the soil in which the precious seeds of gospel truth were deposited was still very unpromising. In the meantime the eastern portion of the Conference, especially the rich lands of Alabama, was being settled up very fast, and the demand for preachers there was much beyond the supply. In this state of affairs it was suggested in the Bishop's Council that it might be best to withdraw the preachers from west of the Mississippi, and appropriate their labors to a more promising field, and the subject was gravely discussed. Ashley Hewitt remonstrated against the withdrawal of the preachers, and successfully pleaded the cause of western Louisiana. "Was it sound policy," said he, "to lose what little had been gained by so much privation and toil? What would become of those few sheep in the wilderness, if the shepherds were all taken away?" The conclusion was to appropriate two preachers to that vast field, and the appointments for 1818 read thus, "Louisiana District, Ashley Hewitt, P. E., Attakapas, Thomas Nixon; Washita, Ashley Hewitt."

There is a beautifully illustrative anecdote about the triumphant death of his eldest daughter, Nancy, which occurred a short time before his own death, that has been coined for all practical purposes by a mis-statement of facts, especially as related in the autobiography of Rev. Joseph Travis. Brother Travis, doubtless, wrote what was told him, but his informant was utterly at fault. He calls her Elizabeth, represents her as being the only unconverted child he had of mature age, says she died and was shrouded, and after lying about an hour, opened her eyes and said, "Glory to God, my sins are all forgiven," etc., all of which is untrue. I was intimately acquainted with brother Hewitt's family, and got the history of this most interesting case from their near relations, who were eye-witness to the whole scene, and though I may not use their precise language I can certainly state the facts correctly.

Nancy Hewitt was a most lovely young lady; in person and natural disposition she seemed to be an exact copy of her sainted father, and there was an air of gracefulness and innocence in all her movements. To see her was to admire and love her. I think it was in September, 1833, I visited the Prairie Mer Rouge on business, and while there held a two days' meeting, at which time Nancy, with several others, joined the church. She did not, however, obtain the full assurance of faith until she was dying, which occurred, I think, within the next two years. She was taken with measles, which induced other diseases, and she went into a rapid decline. Brother Hewitt's health was also so far gone that he was becoming quite bedridden. When he saw that his lovely daughter was marked for death, he became deeply interested about her spiritual condition. He arose in the stillness of the night and prayed earnestly that she might obtain an assurance of her acceptance and salvation before her departure, but no response came, and a cloud rested on the good man's soul. He arose and prayed a second time, but the answer was not yet; and "being in an agony he prayed" the third time. Then the clouds dispersed, unbelief was superseded by strong, commanding faith, and a sweet assurance settled down upon his heart that Nancy would have a bright manifestation of her union with Christ before she left them. She continued to decline, and soon the last conflict came. Sister Hewitt entered the room of her now bedridden husband, and announced that Nancy was dying. "Has she professed to find peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ yet?" inquired brother Hewitt. The question being answered negatively, he continued, "then she will not die yet; I could as soon doubt my own religious experience, as to doubt that she will have a bright evidence of the forgiveness of all her sins before she leaves us. Go back and remain with her." The messenger soon returned with the sad intelligence that Nancy was dead. "Did she profess to have an assurance of salvation?" inquired the holy man of God, with emphasis. The question was answered as before. "Then she is not dead," he confidently affirmed. "God will not disappoint my faith, and let my hope be lost." "O, Mr. Hewitt," said the weeping mother, "if you could see Nancy as I saw her just now, you too would believe her dead!" The functions of life were evidently suspended for a few moments, while the spirit was undergoing "the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost." But her aunt Knox soon discovered a slight motion of her lips, and putting her ear close down began to hear in a faint whisper such expressions as these, "ti, Jesus, Jesus! sweet Jesus! thou art come! I am happy! so happy. Glory to God!" She roused up under the heavenly excitement, had the family called together, requested the servants to be invited in, and "witnessed a good confession" before all, assuring them of her salvation, and exhorting them all to meet her in heaven. Her strength and voice kept up well until her work was done, and then she began to sink rapidly. "Aunt Knox," said she, "I am so sleepy I can scarcely keep my eyes open; but I am afraid to go to sleep lest I should lose my evidence and happy feelings." "You need not fear that, my dear," said her aunt, "Jesus will take care of you. Go to sleep if you feel like it." She then quietly closed her eyes and fell "asleep in Christ." "Brother Hewitt's faith in that case," said Bishop Soule, when the circumstances were related to him at our ensuing Conference, "ought to be recorded for the benefit of the Church."

Brother Hewitt did not long survive his daughter, and his calm and tranquil death was in keeping with his life of holiness and usefulness. On some accounts, like his Lord and Master, "he was a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief," but I have seldom found a character in the ministry so consistent and lovely as was his. It encourages and makes the heart better to dwell upon the lives of such men.

A. G. JONES.

THE SCHOOL OF THE PROPHETS.

"The portentous events now looming up in the Old World have challenged the special attention of the London Times, the universally acknowledged "head" of European journalism. The following article, entitled "The School of the Prophets," is a very striking one, and will no doubt prove highly interesting to many of our readers:

"There has arisen, during the stirring years which still run their course, a very wide-spread attention to the study of unfulfilled prophecy. Books on the subject are in great demand, and the supply apparently meets the demand. It is not unnatural to expect this. The last ten years, dating their beginning at the great European convulsion of 1848, have, without doubt, witnessed so many national complications, social changes, and individual sufferings—event has so rapidly thundered on event and scene flashed on scene—so altered have the face of Europe and the relations of Cabinets become, and so unsettled is the European sky at this hour, that intelligent and sober-minded men, with no spice of fanaticism in their nature, have begun to conclude that the sublime predictions uttered on the Mount 1800 years ago are being daily translated into modern history. Students of prophecy allege they see the apocalyptic "vials" pouring out, and hear the "seven trumpets" uttering their voices, and pealing in revolutions through Christendom.

"From the earliest times there have been students of prophecy. Bishop Newton, Bishop Horsley, Mede, and others, are names familiar to every reader. In recent times the authors of Hora Apocalyptica, The Great Tribulation, and many others, have at least awakened an interest on this subject in the popular mind. The last, and not the least, noteworthy student is Lord Carlisle, the present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. He has translated, or rather turned, a whole chapter of Daniel into metre, but evidently with the intention of introducing under this disguise learned and elaborate notes and opinions. Substantially, Lord Carlisle concurs with the writers whose names or works we have referred to. In his preface, he expresses his belief that we are now on the verge of stupendous events, and, in all probability, approaching the close of this dispensation." This conviction this nobleman draws from his own well-ascertained coincidences between the prophecies in the Apocalypse with the book of Daniel, and the phenomena recorded in history and in the daily journals.

"Many people denounce all prophetic investigation as a priori unnecessary and injurious. This is hardly fair. On the assumption that these persons are Protestants, it strikes us that they must abjure the Protestant rule of faith, which is not, as we understand it, the Bible without the Books of Daniel and Revelation, but with these books as integral parts of it. These books are entitled to study in virtue of the character they have in common with all Scripture, and which is declared to be "profitable," and of the special blessing pronounced in them on those that read and understand them. We do not think that rational interpreters of prophecy do in fact or of necessity set up to be prophets. They foretell what is written, rather than attempt to foretell what is about to come to pass. They state their conclusions as inferences from the inspired record, accepting it alone as their only premises, and leave to their readers to acquiesce or otherwise in their deductions. They pretend to no interior inspiration. They may be mistaken, but certainly they are not lunatics. There are three schools of interpreters. A few—and these very few and feeble—believe that the Book of Daniel was exhausted and absorbed in the Book of Revelation, and that the Book of Revelation was all fulfilled in the days of Nero. This theory is discarded by every rational writer from the days of Bishop Newton and the learned Joseph Mede to the laborious Elliot. A second class—far more numerous, learned and intelligent—incline to believe that the Apocalypse has not yet begun to be fulfilled, and that in a very short time all its prophecies will develop themselves in portentous proportions on the stage of European Christendom. This system, which is going out or receiving many modifications, assumes that the whole period of 1800 years, replete with moral and social and religious phenomena of no ordinary nature, is wholly overlooked and ignored in a prophecy written in the first century, and proclaiming itself to be the record and history of things that are and "things that are to be hereafter."

"The most able and laborious school consists of those who believe that the Apocalypse is a continuous prospective history of Christendom from the days of St. John to the close of this present æon, or dispensation; of course necessarily not so clear as history. These divines hold that the seven seals, already broken and done with, are a history in symbol of the fourth great kingdom, or Roman Empire, in its Pagan and persecuting character, down to the conversion of Constantine—the depression, if not entire annihilation of Paganism, and the elevation of Christianity to national place and power. The "house," which is the basis of each seal-symbol as sacred to Mars, is regarded as the representative of Proles Marcottia, just as in Daniel the Persian Empire is represented by a ram, and the Macedonian by the goat, and the color of each horse denotes the material condition of the empire in historical succession: the "white" describes the prosperity of the empire from A. D. 96 to A. D. 180; the "red," bloodshed from A. D. 192 to 284; the "black" denoting famine, and the "pale horse" representing plague and pestilence and death. It would be impossible, within a short space, to show the remarkable coincidence between this interpretation and the historic facts recorded by Gibbon. The one almost seems the literal translation of the other. The infidel but brilliant historian is made the unconscious amanuensis of Providence, writing out the historic facts that respond to the inspired prophecy as echoe to sound. Be the system true or false, the coincidence is striking. The second series of symbols consists of the "Seven Trumpets." Those writers whose interpretation appear beyond comparison the most plausible, say the first trumpet was fulfilled when Alaric the Goth burst upon the Roman Empire amid "hail and blood;" that the second after Alaric was Genseric, meetly represented by "a mountain burning with fire, cast into the sea," and so on to the sounding of the last trumpet. Here, again, the historic facts, too numerous for our space in date and character and succession, are so parallel, that one is almost driven to accept the interpretation."

"The last of the three great divisions of Apocalyptic symbols are the Seven Vials, there being in all twenty-one great symbols from Patmos to Paradise regained.—The Rev. E. B. Elliot and Dr. Cumming believe that these began to be poured out—that is, that their effects began—1792. Passing over the illustrations of the first five, we read in the sixth that when it was poured out "the waters of the great river Euphrates were dried up." Lord Carlisle, in common with the writers we have quoted, refers this symbol to the Turkish Empire, which, from 1821 to the present hour, has been manifestly in a condition of steady decadence or national evaporation—the old Turks crossing the Bosphorous every day to find graves, and all that is characteristic of Mahomedanism waning, and "Turkey dying from want of Turks."

THE TOMB OF MAUSOLUS.

While Greek ruins excite our attention as well as admiration few people are aware of the rich works of art which have been lately deposited in the British Museum, and which have not yet been exhibited to the public. We allude to those Greek marbles, a portion of a building which has been called—and, from what now remains of it, probably most justly—one of the Seven Wonders of the World. This is the famous Mausoleum erected by Queen Artemisia to the memory of her husband, Mausolus, King of Caria, or rather of Halicarnassus. She loved him with much tender affection, and was so greatly afflicted at his death, that, according to custom in those days, after his body had been burnt to ashes, historians tell us that she daily eat a portion of those ashes, and died soon after she had finished them.

However this may be, it is certain that she determined to erect a monument to his memory, sufficient at the same time to prove her own affection for one she so tenderly loved, and to show the world the estimation in which he was held by his subjects. Mausolus is said to have died immensely rich; and with his wealth his queen began to erect a monument, which she called a Mausoleum after the name of her husband, and from which afterwards all magnificent sepulchres and tombs have received the same appellation. This celebrated Mausoleum was erected three hundred and fifty-three years before the birth of our Saviour; and on reading the following account of the interesting marbles now in the British Museum, this date should not be lost sight of. In fact, their antiquity, and the exquisite beauty of their workmanship cannot fail of filling the mind with admiration.

Four different architects are stated to have been employed upon this noble monument of affection. Scopas erected the side which faced the east, Timotheus had the South, Leochares had the west, and Bryaxis the north. Over this stately Mausoleum a pyramid was raised, executed by Pytheus, who adorned the top of it with a chariot drawn by four horses. The expenses of this edifice must have been enormous, and this gave occasion to the philosopher Anaxagoras to exclaim when he saw it; "How much money is changed into stones." Artemisia died before it was finished, as supposed of grief, but not until after she had expended her husband's wealth in the building. But so great was the admiration it occasioned, that her subjects united together to complete it.

The sight of this vast monument of antiquity was for a great number of years unknown, although the interest felt for the discovery had never ceased. Many persons thought, and it now appears not without reason, that it must have been swallowed up by an earthquake. It is certain that the French Government sent men of science to endeavor to discover these interesting ruins. Russia, Prussia, and Austria did the same, all with the hopes of enriching their several countries with these ancient marbles, but altogether without success. It remained for an Englishman to make the discovery, and that Englishman's name was Newton.

Mr. Newton was employed for twelve or thirteen years in the British Museum, where he not only acquired a great love of ancient marbles and an considerable knowledge of their history, but also had his curiosity much excited in order to ascertain the site of the tomb of Mausolus. Fortunately for antiquarians, and also for his country, Mr. Newton was appointed Vice-Consul at Mitylene, and from thence he had the best opportunities of prosecuting his inquiries respecting the tomb of Mausolus. Having at length ascertained the spot, and means being placed at his disposal by British Government, he procured some sappers and miners from Malta, and began his excavacations. It is not intended to particularize the discoveries he made. It will be sufficient to mention a few of them. Amongst others, he has brought to light a noble statue of Mausolus, nearly perfect. It is impossible to view it without feelings of wonder and admiration. The whole character of the head resembles the ideal portraits of Alexander the Great on the coins of Lysimachus and in several extant marble busts. The face is slightly bearded, the features massive but finely formed, and with a most noble expression. Indeed, where shall we find in classical art any head in which such majesty is combined with the traits of individual likeness?

A fine colossal female statue was also found, supposed to be that of Artemisia; but, unfortunately, it wants the head, which has not yet been recovered. The figure and drapery are very finely executed.

Portions of colossal horses have also been discovered; and these no doubt formed a portion of the marble Quadrigæ by which the Mausoleum was surmounted. Nothing can be finer than these marbles, especially the head of one of the horses, which may vie with the celebrated one in the Elgin Marbles.

Finely sculptured lions and a leopard have also been brought to light, and many other remains of the greatest interest, amongst which are some friezes, beautifully executed, and which have been preserved and deposited in the British Museum, the whole of them extending to a length of eighty feet; and Mr. Newton is of opinion that no museum in Europe can show so magnificent a series of high reliefs. These marbles will no doubt form a fine study for artists, and it is to be hoped that drawings of them will be published.

As to the Mausoleum itself, we learn from Pliny that it was surrounded by thirty-six columns and that the whole height was a hundred and forty feet, and the length on each side sixty-three feet in all, and that the whole was adorned with appropriate sculpture.

Mr. Newton has the credit of having conducted the excavations of these magnificent remains and also for having satisfactorily set at rest the question of the locality of the Mausoleum. His success can only be properly appreciated by viewing the vast quantity of interesting relics he sent to this country, and which must form only a small portion of the original building, the materials of which, through a long succession of ages, have been used for various erections and the burning of the marbles to procure lime.

Mr. Newton is now the English Consul at Rome, where it is to be hoped that this scientific knowledge and thirst for new discoveries may enable him to enrich his country with further objects of interest and antiquity.

THE NOTABLE MEN OF SICILY.

Among the men of note who go to Sicily to second the work of Garibaldi, we must mention in the first rank Salicati, Torrearsa, Prince de Butera, Prince de Niscemi, Santo-Quirico, Count Manzoni and the Marquis de Foccaforte, belonging to one of the first families of Palermo.

Salicati is the son of one of the ministers of King Murat, and has been a deputy to the Parliament of Naples and Secretary of Justice during the short regime of the statute of 1848. His incorruptibility and the unrelenting energy of his character did not win for him the friendship of the late King. He was the partisan and promoter of reforms in the magistracy and many other grievances, which, however, continued, notwithstanding all his efforts. He was very popular in Naples, where his name was the synonyme of all liberal ideas, and he was obliged to leave that city at the time of the anti-parliamentary coup d'etat of the 13th of March, 1848; since then he has lived in France in retirement and in a mediocrity of fortune, which he bore with the most laudable resignation.

Torrearsa was secretary of finances and prime minister of the first Sicilian ministry, formed in 1848 by the venerable Settimo, president and chief of the executive power. He was afterwards elected speaker of the House of Commons in the Parliament of Palermo, and left to fill that office of the ministry of which he was the directing member, and which has since preserved his name.

Prince de Butera has been, under the presidency of Settimo, the chief of the Cabinet which succeeded to that of Torrearsa, Stabile and Calvi. He represented the aristocratic side of the nation and of the Parliament, but notwithstanding gave proofs of energy during the great struggle which was going to place Sicily again under the yoke of Ferdinand II. His presence in Palermo and his name are the pledges of the union of all parties under the dictator of Sicily, and of the solution proposed by him.

We can with more reason say of the departure of Prince Niscemi, for Palermo, that he is the son-in-law of the present President of the Neapolitan Cabinet—of the old Statella, Prince de Cassaro, eighty years of age. The old gentleman was chosen a few weeks ago to that high office because he is a Sicilian, in the hope of pacifying the leaders of the insurrection; but he did not deceive himself for a moment on hearing of the occurrence, and he did not from that moment conceal from his friends and relatives that he entered the ministry without hope, and that in his opinion Sicily was lost to the kingdom of Naples.

The Dictator of Sicily, who for the present is on a footing of equality with the Sardinian Cabinet, has sent Mr. Michael Amari as Ambassador at Turin.

Count Michel Amari is one of the most learned and distinguished writers and historians of Sicily. The series of his political struggles commences at the time of the publication of the "History of the Sicilian Vespers," in which the suspicious government of Ferdinand II. thought that it was bitter allusions to its own tyranny and to the frightful future which those pictures of the past predicted. The book was seized and its author summoned to Naples; but understanding the meaning of such an order he embarked for France.

He returned to Sicily on the first news of the grave events of 1848, when he was elected Deputy, and succeeded Torrearsa as Secretary of Finances when the latter was elected Speaker of the House of Commons. Afterwards he filled important missions in Paris and London, the object of which was to obtain the recognition and support of the French and English governments in favor of the new autonomy of Sicily. Nobody, therefore, is better qualified than Count Michel Amari worthily to represent at Turin the provisional government of his native island.

Among the distinguished officers who are to accompany General Colenz to Sicily, or perhaps to Calabria, we must quote the Neapolitan Colonel Assanti, one of those who, with Pepe and Ulloa, crossed the Po in 1848; notwithstanding the objections of the King of Naples, and went to the defense of Venice. After having made himself famous at the battle of Mestre, and during all that memorable seige, Colonel Assanti became and remained the faithful companion in exile of General Pepe, one of the most illustrious heroes of Italian independence.

Finally, we learn with great pleasure that General Ulloa, another renowned defender of Venice, formerly Chief Commander of the Tuscan troops, rallies the common movement, and intends also to take his part in the Neapolitan struggle.—Translated from the Opinione Nationale.

THE ENGLISH VOLUNTEERS.

FRENCH DESCRIPTION OF THE LATE REVIEW IN HYDEPARK.

A Paris paper, the Ami de Religion, contains the annexed account from its London correspondent of the late review of volunteers in Hyde Park:

"I can assure you that the grand demonstration which all London went to see in Hyde Park on Saturday last surpassed by much in its simplicity all the reviews which I have seen. You will smile, no doubt, accustomed as you are to the enormous masses and to the complicated evolutions of the Camp of Chalons or of the Camp du Mars, at hearing me thus speak of some simple manœuvres executed by twenty thousand young men who were never engaged in action, and who have been drilled for scarcely a few months. Nevertheless, I maintain that it was a great sight as regards everything which constitutes the real greatness of the soldier. In my opinion it was a fine contrast to all ordinary reviews, because there was nothing prepared or nothing theatrical in it—because every thing was real and solid. The physical strength of these men, their instruction and general character; the variety of social position existing in their ranks, and which could be recognized at a glance; the rapidity with which, thanks to their devotedness and their address, they were enabled to attain so high a degree of discipline; in fine, the absence of all ostentation—of all tinsel in their uniforms—all contributed to give this scene its true signification. In a word, the force composed of volunteers is a real army. You know the idea we form of the soldier-citizen exemplified in John Gilpin.

"I went to the Park, therefore, convinced that I should see more than one of these corpulent individuals so common to a nation of shop-keepers. Well, no; these 20,000 volunteers, who represent truly, I believe, the 120,000 volunteers of England and Scotland, present, physically as well as morally, the finest specimens that can be imagined of the British race. With respect to size, muscular strength, and instruction, they have a far superior appearance to our regular army, and the reason is very simple. Our army is formed rather of the scum than of the elite of our society. In the volunteers, on the contrary, figure all the vigor, all the really virile force of Great Britain. I do not believe that in any other country could be found such an assemblage of 20,000 men belonging to the rank, industry and wealth of the country; and, above all, they are inspired by the fanaticism of liberty. You may well believe that I do not pretend to describe the sixty or seventy divisions which forms this force, at the same time heterogeneous and homogeneous. They came there from every quarter of this immense city, or were brought from its environs by the thousand and one railways. Thus there were the Scotchmen of London, the Irishmen of London, the Welshmen of London. The lawyers corps represented the Enfants du Diable. Next came the corps of public functionaries and the brigade of the city, composed of young merchants and stockbrokers. All these divisions had never previously manœuvred together. You know the locality and how difficult it is even for regular troops to deboucher from Hyde Park; well all was accomplished with the most perfect regularity. It is the opinion of more competent judges than myself that one-third at least of these volunteers are equal to the best troops.

"The others could not compete in manœuvres with our regulars, but they are efficient as light infantry. Some of these corps are unique in their kind, and among others the Duke of Manchester's mounted riflemen. Figure to yourself two hundred young Englishmen mounted on hunters, each of the value of from two thousand to three thousand francs—all accustomed to take at a gallop the highest hedges and widest ditches in Leicestershire. For my part I never saw such cavalry. Next came what are called here the Volunteers of the Guard—all noblemen and every man six feet high. Your Cent Gardes are decidedly fine men, but they are not to be compared with these giants. As to the City of London Artillery, nobody could distinguish them when manœuvring from a regiment of artillery of the line. They have had time to form themselves, and to develop that energy and instruction which render them superior to the majority of our soldiers. The young Englishmen, whose greatest enjoyment is to hunt for the season at Melton, to stalk deer in Scotland, to walk ten leagues a day in the South of France, or to sail in his yacht to encounter the stiff breezes in the Channel, embraces in himself the stuff for a good soldier. He is no excellent shot; his constitution is of the strongest; he loves order and cleanliness. Place a uniform on his back and in a short time he will have been perfectly drilled. Such are the elements of which the English volunteers are composed, and when one recollects their signification one cannot be astonished that Queen Victoria felt proud in seeing them defile before her royal standard."

ANTI-CONFESSIONAL MOVEMENT AMONG ROMANISTS.—The Liverpool Courier says that a remarkable movement is in operation amongst the Roman Catholics of Manchester, as will be seen by the following address which has been extensively circulated among the members of that body. "Some Roman Catholics, holding entire the Christian faith, so miraculously perpetuated in the Communion of the See of St. Peter, yet deeming the office conferred in the Holy Sacrament of Orders to be simply ministerial, and abhorring the assumption, by the minister of God, of the judicial character in the Confessional, as obstructive of the free grace designed by our Lord for sinners in his institution of the Holy Sacrament of Penance, are desirous of forming, under the special invocation of the blessed Virgin Mary, an Associated Membership for earnest private prayer, in each other's homes, that God will of his grace remove these and other scandals of man's devising from his holy and Immaculate Church."

THE ENGLISH POMPEII.

The London correspondent of the New York World, in his letter of June 30, writes: "Perhaps you are not aware that we have a sort of Pompeii of a buried city here in England, now undergoing the process of being unearthed. In Shropshire, about six miles southeast from Shrewsbury, is a little village called Wroxeter, situated on the Severn, and surrounded by vestiges of antiquity. In the Roman times there was a station there, called Uriconium, or Viriconium; and to this day a rampart and ditch, with remains of walls, three miles in circumference, mark the boundaries of the city. Other Roman statiuns, and some British encampments, are scattered all over the adjacent country; and the antiquary has only to turn up the soil, to be rewarded with an ample crop of relics. The noble chieftain, Caractacus, is supposed by Camden to have been defeated by the Romans, not far off; and the presence of the old imperial legions is to be traced in every direction. But Wroxeter is the place to which special attention is now being directed. The ancient town or station of Uriconium was destroyed by the Saxons in their contests with the Romanized Britons; and the remains are at this moment being disinterred, after a lapse of some thirteen hundred years. The results are highly interesting and valuable. Whole houses, as in the cases of Pompeii and Herculaneum, have been laid bare, and the workshop of an artificer in metals is now being opened. A small heap of Roman coins lay on the sill when the chamber was first broken into, and the fragments of a small earthern vessel were found on the floor, dropped there, apparently, by some one who was carrying it away. This earthern pot is supposed to have contained the coins. A large square pier, built of hewn stone, occupies the centre of the room, and, in one corner, is a raised structure of clay, having in the upper part a furnace, the inner surface of which has been vitrified by the intensity of the heat. A large quantity of charcoal is scattered about the chamber, together with several pieces of figured Samian ware. Eastward from the furnace, a low wall runs across the room, another wall branching from it northward. Other objects of interest are also to be seen in the enclosure, and the museum, which is being formed out of the recent discoveries, has received some valuable additions, in the shape of ancient sickles, pruning-hooks, knives, pottery, and glass, etc. A large extent of buildings is now revealed once more to the light of day; but I am sorry to see it reported that the excavation committee is in want of funds. This is not the only "English Pompeii" we have. London itself is built over a vast number of most interesting remains of the past, which are frequently "turning up" as we dig for sewers or for the foundations of houses. At Silchester, on the borders of Hampshire and Berkshire, numerous specimens of Roman handiwork are to be found above ground; and the fields about St. Alban's cover the ruins of the once splendid, imperial city of Verulam. I confess I am not able to explain why, in the case of the workman's shop at Wroxeter, the place should have been discovered in such perfect repair, with the signs of human habitation and toil lying thickly about, as if the ordinary avocations of the day had been arrested by some sudden convulsion of nature, as in the case of the two cities in southern Italy; but I suppose that some of the antiquarian societies will take the matter in hand, and investigate it thoroughly. Doubtless, the task will be performed by the British Archæological association, which will this year hold its annual meeting at Shrewsbury in the early part of August. Meanwhile, one cannot help wondering at the strange caprice of fortune which has preserved in fact for so many centuries the transitory occupations of hands that had moulded to the dust before the English nation, properly so called, had come into existence!"

TOM PAINE THE SUCCESSFUL CONTRIVER OF AN IRON BRIDGE.

It is a curious circumstance that the most successful contriver of an iron bridge, and that of the very boldest design, was no other than the celebrated Thomas Paine. He was an exciseman, and drew up a petition for an increase of pay. He studied mathematics and mechanics, and became acquainted with Goldsmith and Franklin; the latter persuaded him to go to America, &c. He settled down at Philadelphia to mechanical and philosophical studies, and speculations on electricity, minerals and the uses of iron. In 1787, when a bridge over the Schuylkill was proposed to be constructed without any river piers, as the stream was apt to be choked with ice in the spring freshets, Paine boldly offered to build an iron bridge with a single arch of 400 feet span. The same year we find him at Paris, submitting the plan of his bridge to the Academy of Sciences, whose opinion was decidedly favorable. He sent a copy to Sir Joseph Banks, to be submitted to the Royal Society; and he next proceeded to Rotherham Iron Works, in Yorkshire, to have his bridge cast. It was a segment of an arch of 410 feet span, and constructed of framed iron panncls, radiating towards the centre in the form of voussoirs. An American named Whiteside advanced him money on the security of his property in the States; he was unable to complete the castings of the bridge, which were then shipped off to London, and erected on a bowling green at Padington. There it was visited by a large number of persons, and regarded as a great success. Whiteside having become bankrupt, Paine was arrested by his assignees, but was liberated by the assistance of two other Americans, who became bail for him. When returned from France to America, he in 1803 presented a memoir to Congress on the construction of iron bridges, with several models. It does not appear that he succeeded in erecting his bridge. In the mean time, however, the bridge exhibited at Padington produced results; the manufacturers agreed to take it back as part of their debt, and the materials were used in the noble structure over the river Wear, at Sounderland, where it was erected in 1796. This bridge was long regarded as the greatest triumph of art. Its span exceeded that of any existing stone arch, being 236 feet with a rise of 34 feet, the springing commencing 95 feet above the bed of the river, allowing vessels of 300 tons burden to sail underneath without striking their masts. "If," says Mr. Stevenson, "we are to consider Paine as its author, his daring engineering certainly does full justice to the fervor of his political career; for, successful as the result has undoubtedly proved, want of experience, and consequent ignorance of the risk, could alone have induced so bold an experiment; and we are rather led to wonder at than to admire a structure which, as regards its proportions, and the small quantity of material employed in its construction, will probably remain unrivalled."—London Quarterly Review.

THE IMPERIAL PALACE, JEDDO.

In the book lately published on Japan we find the British Minister, Mr. Alcock, complaining that the recent destruction by fire of the Tycoon Palace was put forward by the government as a plea for delaying the fulfillment of the treaty obligations. It was situated within the castle, which occupies the centre of Jeddo. The castle is of an irregular figure, inclining to circular, and is five Japanese miles in circumference. It embraces two "fore castles," the residence of the Emperor, and two other strong well fortified, but smaller castles, at the sides; also some large gardens behind the Imperial Palace.—These castles are each surrounded by walls and ditches.

The Palace itself had but one story, but of lofty height. It occupied an extensive area, and had numerous long galleries and spacious rooms, which by putting on or removing screens, might be enlarged or brought into a narrower compass, as occasion required, and were so contrived as to receive convenient and sufficient light. The chief apartments had each particular names, such as for instance, the waiting-room, where all persons admitted to an audience, either of the Emperor or his Ministers of State, had to wait till they were introduced; the council chamber, where the Ministers of State and Privy Councillors met upon business; the hall of thousand mats, where the Emperor received the homage and usual presents of the Princes of the Empire and Ambassadors of foreign Powers; several halls of audience, the apartments of the Emperor's household, and others. The structure of all these several apartments was exquisitely fine, according to the architectural notions of the Japanese. The ceilings, beams, and pillars were of camphor, or cedar wood, the grain of which naturally run into flowers and other curious figures, and was therefore in some apartments covered only with a thin transparent layer of varnish; in others japanned, or curiously carved with birds and branched work, neatly gilt. The floor was covered with the finest white mats, bordered with gold fringe or band, and this was all the furniture to be seen in the palaces of the Emperor and Princes of the Empire.—Illustrated London News.

RAILROADS.—There is estimated to be running upon the railways in the United States not less than 3000 passenger cars, and some 80,000 freight cars; under the whole of which some 688,000 wheels are running.

PROTESTANTISM IN FLORENCE.

Theodore Trollope, in his letter to the London Athenæum dated Florence, June 4, says: "Various sects of Protestants are busily at work disseminating their doctrines, and exhorting the lower classes, lately so closely hoodwinked by priestly intolerance, to search the Scriptures, which are now freely distributed through the country, for themselves to see 'if these things be so,' or no. Among these expounders of the gospel in Florence, is Alessandro Gavazzi, of European celebrity. The church in the Palazzo Carnicci, in which he preaches to and prays with the people several times in the week, is always crowded with hearers, chiefly of the lower orders, on whom the powerful and simple language of the preacher, rich in familiar illustrations, and skilfully pointed with the shrewd proverbs which the Tuscan so dearly loves, produces an immense impression. A great number of the artisans, who, with their families, are constant attendants at these meetings, bring their Diodata Testaments in their pockets, for reference during the discourse; and I own to a strange feeling of wonder and unreality, when issuing last week from one of such assemblies, I followed an earnestly conversing group of fellow-bearers on their way down Via Large, and caught scraps of their eager discussion respecting 'free grace,' and justification by faith.' WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 1, 1860.

PAY TO THE END OF THE YEAR.

We have made out, and sent out, all our accounts, to the end of the present year. Many have responded and paid up, but many have failed to do so. The object we have in writing these lines is, to call upon all who have not paid up to the end of the year, to do so immediately, by remittance at the office, or by payment to our agents. The year is more than half gone, and yet we have much to collect of our accounts, and to clear off books, between this and January next. This work we must accomplish. Come friends, you have received your accounts, through the paper or through the preacher; the amount is put down in each case; pay up to the end of the year, and let us all begin even again.

CHILDHOOD AND CHRISTIANITY.

Our Savior, in order to sympathize with us and redeem us, fully identified himself with our nature. He became a man, and he became a child in order that he might be a man. Having been a child himself, he therefore understood childhood by experience. He paid much attention to little children, and manifested great love for them. He thus exemplified one of the elements of a high and healthy type of human nature. He also made beautiful and happy use of little children to illustrate the most important truths of his heavenly kingdom.—Among those who sought the company and conversation of the Savior, there were some who brought their infants, that he might lay his hands upon them and bless them. His newly-chosen disciples, blundering in this case as in many others, rebuked those who brought them. At this Jesus was much displeased, and called them, and said, suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God. And he took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them. And he added, whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, shall in no wise enter therein.

At another time, when his disciples disputed among themselves as to who should be greatest in the kingdom of heaven, he called a little child into the midst of them, and took him in his arms, and said, except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. Whosoever, therefore, shall humble himself as this little child, the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven. And then, by way of still farther showing the true christian spirit, he calls his disciples "little ones": whoso shall offend one of these little ones which believe in me, it were better for him that a mill-stone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea.

In all these uses made by the Savior of little children, we learn that, in the first place, the spirit of a little child is necessary to entrance into the spiritual family of God, and that, in the second place, the spirit of a little child is the spirit of a true christian. In illustration of this latter point, St. Paul says to the Corinthians, "brethren, be not children in understanding; howbeit, in malice be ye children." And St. Peter exhorts his brethren, as new-born babes, to desire the sincere milk of the word, that they might grow thereby.

The study of childhood, then, in the light of the Savior's teaching, is the study of Christianity. Nothing can be more striking than the wisdom of Christ in the choice of this remarkably appropriate and intensely beautiful figure. Had the figure been drawn from any of the facts or laws of science, or even from national or local facts and customs of life, it would have been understood by but a few, and would have been felt by none. But the whole world, in every age, in all ranks of society, is interested in children. Childhood is as universal as man. All men and women have been children themselves, and all are fathers or mothers, brothers or sisters, or kinsmen or friends of children. They are an illustration of christianity that is always about us. The lillies of the field, another illustration, may fade before the sun or wither before the frost. The grass, another illustration, may grow and flourish in the morning, and may be cut down and wither in the evening, or may pass away with its season. The sparrow may illustrate the providence of God for a short term, but then his season closes, and he is absent for much of the year. But in winter and summer, at night and in the morning, in our own homes, around our own hearth-stones, and associated with the dearest affections and joys of life, the voices of our children are preaching to us the most beautiful of sermons upon the true christian life.

A little child is the most beautiful thing in all the world. Probably there is nothing more beautiful in heaven. After we have contemplated all the highest types of beauty, natural and artistic, real and ideal, the sight of a little child makes us forget them all. Dawn and sunrise, night and its beauty, day and its glory, the young grass, the green leaves, the odorous flowers, the mountain and waterfall, the glen and the glacier,—all these please the senses and fill the imagination; but "a babe in a house is a well-spring of pleasure." It satisfies the senses and the imagination, the reason and the heart, all at once.

There is no beauty so touching, so charming, so perfect, so universal in its attraction, as that of little children. In regard to all other beauty, whether of nature, or art, or of the adult human being, there are various tastes—there are various preferences in regard to various styles. But little children are always beautiful, when in proper condition, whether blonde or brunette, whether their eyes are black or blue or hazel. They are charming to the old and the young, the vulgar and the refined. God has turned the great heart of human nature toward little children "as the streams in the South." The most helpless things in the world, they are the most loved and cared for.

All the elements of beauty seem, in the case of little children, to possess a sort of paradisiacal charm. Nothing so much reminds us of Eden, in its unfallen days, as the smiling innocence of little children. The beauty of little children, in addition to the physical beauty of nature, has also the elements of the human and the spiritual, without any of the abatements of adult human beauty. Our self-love is never in fear from the presence of child-beauty. It charms without the pain of rivalry. It is the sweetest of roses with no thorn to sting those who enjoy it. It is sweetly unconscious of its attractive delights. It is not vain, nor proud, nor exacting, nor arrogant. It is not sullied by sin, nor corrupted by crime.

In the presence of such thoughts as these, it is not wonderful that our Savior should have chosen a little child, in preference to everything else in the treasure-house of his creation, to illustrate the true spirit of his children. The appropriateness of the illustration, and the comprehensive clearness of the truth it revealed, could not fail to strike the minds of those who were dull-est of apprehension. Its beauty was equal to its appropriateness. And, no doubt, the combination of beauty and appropriateness was the reason why this particular figure was chosen. It was intended both to convince and to charm—to enlighten the understanding and to win the heart.

Under the dispensation of Redemption, which is the dispensation under which all human beings, except Adam and Eve, have commenced their being—under the reign of Christ, all human growth and excellence must begin in childhood. The dispensation that plants its seeds in childhood, is more excellent than one that does not.—Christ was once a child; Adam never was; and Christ's dispensation—the dispensation of the second Adam—is more excellent than that of the first Adam. Under His dispensation, all manhood and womanhood, physical, mental, and spiritual, must commence in childhood. Childhood is inseparably connected with everything like human growth and progression. Where there is no childhood, there is no development, either physical, mental, or spiritual. Adam never grew in either of these respects. Of Christ it is said, "and the child grew, and waxed strong in spirit, and the grace of God was upon him." As we begin the growth necessary to physical manhood and womanhood in the weakness of infancy; as we begin the mental development necessary to strong and manly character in the ignorance of childhood; so we must begin the growth in grace necessary to become men and women in Christ Jesus, in the humble, teachable, and confiding spirit of childhood.

THE DICTIONARY QUARREL.

Competition is said to be the life of trade. One of its effects certainly is to give the public a better article at a lower price. And so far the ponderous competition of lexicographers even, has its use. Webster had for many years so far possession of the ground, with us, that it was not amiss to have a younger, more active, and quite as able rival enter the field, even if we have beforehand determined to stick to the old. Two heads are better than one, the old proverb says; and, fortunately, in this case neither is a sheep's head.

For some months Webster and Worcester, and Worcester and Webster, have been chasing each other up and down the columns of the papers with an energy that must have delighted the newspaper people. Column after column of advertisement, or paid (or unpaid) communications, has been deployed into line, until now, in the heat (and smoke) of battle, it is very difficult for an inexperienced and peaceable looker-on, not only to tell which party is like to gain the day, but even which party has right on its side. With the exception of the quarrels of old maids, no disputes are so acrimonious as those of literary men, and if literary men, then publishers.

We have been for some time trying to get to the bottom of this, which, if it is not the great question of the day, is at least one of the most prominent. We propose to give our readers the result of our somewhat arduous labors, in order that they may at least be put upon the road fairly toward that which seems now to be the aim of every American, namely to "get the best."

A dictionary, in the common acceptation of the word, is a book containing the words of a language, arranged in alphabetical order, with a definition attached to each. To this has been added, in the more important works of the class in our language, some account of the etymology of the words.

The ancients had no dictionaries, and by consequence, no lexicographical quarrels. The few works which were compiled in the middle ages, before the introduction of printing, are of little importance. In modern times the French, Italian, and English languages have the ablest dictionaries.

It has been remarked by an able writer, that "it is only when the language of a country is on the decline, or at all events has attained such a degree of perfection as to be apparently unsusceptible of further improvement, that dictionaries begin to be compiled." "This," he pertinently adds, "is seldom the case till the age of its purity and vigor has gone by, till the phraseology of its original authors has become in some degree obsolete, and the caprice or ignorance of later writers has diversified or corrupted the signification of words." It is indeed probably with a people as it is with individuals: the more ignorant they are of the true use of language, the more need they have of such guides as dictionaries.

With foreign or classical dictionaries we have nothing to do here; though we may remark that the first lexicons printed in England were "Latin-English," and intended to facilitate the study of Latin. One of the earliest English dictionaries is that of Dr. John Bullokar, the "English Expositour," issued in 1616. In the "Universal Etymological English Dictionary" of Matthew Bailey (London, 1726), the first attempt was made to give a complete collection of the words of the language. This Dr. Johnson used in those eight years of hard labor which, in 1788, culminated in the publication of the great work which was so long the standard and "the best."

The lasting merit and glory of Johnson is that he, more than any other, by his labors gave stability to the external form of the language, and settled the meaning of words. And yet, consider, Shakespeare and Milton, Swift, Pope, Dryden, and Addison, Raleigh, Sydney, Jonson, and a host of other worthies, wrote with no Johnson before them to settle that which they themselves settled so well.

Passing over Richardson's (London, 1835-7), we come last to the parties who are now canvassing for the suffrages of America. The first edition of Noah Webster's dictionary was published in 1828, when its author, who had devoted thirty-six years to the work, was in his seventieth year. Revised editions were published in 1840, 1843, 1848, and 1860.

When Webster published his first edition, the work excited much opposition, on account of many radical changes which, in pursuance of certain theories and fixed notions, he had attempted, in it, to impose upon the public. These changes excited opposition from scholars as well as people. An abridgement was therefore published, in which, with Dr. Webster's consent, the publisher employed Dr. Worcester to make certain changes, which made this new edition conform more to the established usage of the best writers. In fact Dr. Webster had to make new rules, where it was his place only to record the best usage and the clearest principle. He was an able man, and very industrious, but inclined to be autocratic.

In 1830 Dr. Worcester published his "Comprehensive, Explanatory, and Pronouncing Dictionary of the English Language. In 1846 he published his "Universal Critical Dictionary of the English Language," and last year was issued his Quarto, Unabridged and Illustrated. And now to compare some of the points of the two "Unabridged, Pictorial Dictionaries:"

Webster contains in all 1750 pages. Worcester contains in all 1854 pages. Webster is illustrated with 1525 wood cuts; Worcester with 1072, or 453 less. According to a statement made by the publishers of Webster's Dictionary the vocabulary proper of Webster contains 99,780 words, the appendices 40,276, making a total of 140,056; that of Worcester 103,855, the appendices 28,551; total, 132,406, making 7,650 more in Webster than in Worcester. The number of ems in Webster is 14,747,352; in Worcester, 13,273,532, leaving a balance of 1,473,820 ems of printed matter in favor of Webster.

This calculation, however, fairly requires a deduction from the Webster account. In Worcester the illustrations, which are a novel and valuable feature in both, are printed in their proper places in the body. In Webster this could not be done as the body of the new Edition is printed from plates made some years ago. The pictures are therefore prefixed, with separate definitions which are of course in duplicate, and thus make a waste of space.

It must be said, in addition to this, that, to save space, these definitions in Webster have been put in a very unsatisfactory way.

In the department of synonyms we confess to a preference for the concise and pithy plan of exhibiting them and their uses, employed by Dr. Worcester. In matters of Etymology, we have always suspected the notionate and willful temperament of Dr. Webster; but as his work has been for many years in charge of Professor Goodrich, an able scholar, we should suppose that either Webster or Worcester would be a safe guide, while to the scholar both will be welcome and necessary. Definitions have always been Webster's strong point. Here, as Dr. Worcester avoided diligently to take from Webster, it is probable that he sometimes falls short of his predecessor, though in some cases we have found his definitions shorter and more to the point.

In the matter of Orthography, we do not think any publisher or author in the country follows consistently, and all through, either Webster or Worcester. We have ourselves tried, some six years ago, to follow Webster, and found a system which was no system, and an amount of arbitrary change which was very perplexing. The truth is that in all more important words there is a general rule and practice in which both agree, and for the minor differences, it is no matter. The spelling of words in Shakespeare's day was in an awfully mixed up condition. But that did not hinder Shakespeare from winning the world's golden opinions for all time, though it is almost certain that he literally did not know certainly how to spell even his own name.

And now, the patient reader asks, "which is the best." For ourselves, we say both. Whoever needs a dictionary, and can afford both, should get them; whoever has either Webster or Worcester in possession may rest content. He has the best, for all practical purposes. And we desire to appeal to school committees, trustees and teachers, not too hastily to change their authorities or text books. In the present day of rival school books much humbug is practised on unsuspecting parents by frequent changes of their children's books. Where a great and evident improvement has been made, it is of course expedient to change, but in such cases as this, between Webster and Worcester, it is a matter of vital importance, chiefly, to the publishers of those valuable works. It is to their interest that the public should ardently take sides. It is the public's best interest to pay small heed to this publishers' squabble, and to hellve either side with a very large grain of salt.

AUTHORS AND BOOKS.

New York, July 24, 1860.

I promised you last week some particulars of the American book trade, to match those of the English, quoted in my letter, from the account of Mr. Chambers.

It seems that the first bookseller of the United States of whom mention is made, is Hezekiah Usher, who did business in Boston, in 1652. In 1732 a Boston publisher, Richard Fry, congratulated the American public on their appreciation of Poetry, "having sold already 1200 of the poems of one Mr. Stephen Duck," then known as the Wiltshire Poet, and now not known at all. In 1743 Christopher Sower printed in Germantown, Pa., a quarto edition of 1000 copies of Luther's German Bible, containing 1271 pages, an undertaking which would be thought not slight even in our days. Until after the Revolution, most of the few books printed here were reprints of English works.

From this small beginning, which continued so small for the first twenty years of this century even, that Sydney Smith could well ask, "who reads an American book?" we have come to what appears below. We have now more than 400 book publishing establishments in the different cities of the Union; more than 3000 booksellers, and from 6000 to 7000 general dealers and agents who distribute our literature. In 1820 the entire book trade of the Union amounted to only $2,500,000 per annum. Of this amount $750,000 was for school books. In 1856 the entire business amounted to $16,000,000, of which the school book business amounted to $6,000,000! The amount of capital invested in the collateral trades of type-founding, engraving, plate-printing, binding, &c., in 1855, was $28,400,000.

In 1820, of every one hundred books published 30 were by American authors, and 70 by British. In 1830, we used 40 per cent. of American and 60 of British works. In 1850 we used 70 per cent of books by American authors, and 30 only by British. In 1856 it was estimated that 80 per cent of the books printed in the Union were by American authors, and only 20 per cent by British.

In 1855 there were published in the United States 2,162 new works, in 2388 volumes; of these 139 were educational, 65 agricultural, botanical, &c.; 124 biography; 775 novels and poetry; 531 theological; 76 historical, 92 juveniles, 29 voyages and travels, 79 each of law and medicine.

At the beginning of our publishing business an edition of 500 copies was considered large and remunerative. Now 1,500 is counted a very moderate sale; and editions of 10,000 are by no means unknown. Of Harper's new "School and Family Readers," an edition of 25,000 was sold off in six weeks, and I am informed that they are now printing an edition of 100,000. Mitchell's Geographies sell at the rate of 1,000 per day; of Webster's Elementary Spelling Book more than thirty-five millions have been sold; and of Webster's Dictionary even, over two millions have been sold. One music book alone, the Carmina Sacra, has sold 500,000 copies. Of Harper's Pictorial Bible, a copy of which costs $20, no less than 25,000 copies have been sold.

American authors were paid well for their labor, even near the beginning of this century. In 1817 Noah Webster was paid for his Spelling Book $16,000. Before 1837 a Philadelphia house had paid $135,000 to native authors, of which $30,000 was to two writers. Up to 1854, Mr. Bancroft had received as copyright on his History $50,000. Stephens received in a few years from the Harpers over $30,000 for his interesting books of travels, which sell yet, I am told. Professor Anthon has received from the same publishers over $30,000 for his various classical labors. The Rev. Mr. Barnes has received, as copyright on his "Notes on the New Testament," probably much more than $50,000. For one book, the "United States Dispensatory," Lippincot and Co., of Philadelphia, have paid the authors $80,000; and Judge Story and his family have received as copyright on that distinguished jurist's works, no less a sum than $200,000.

These are a few of the successes of literature. Of the failures it is not necessary to speak.

Mr. Lawrence Oliphant, the gentleman to whose lively journal of Lord Elgin's mission to China and Japan we owe the best modern account of the Japanese, is preparing for the press a book of travels in Central America and Cuba, with the title of "Patriots and Filibusters." Messrs. Harper & Brothers will publish it here, by arrangement with the author, simultaneously with its publication in England. Mr. Oliphant is one of those young men whom the English government finds its profit in taking care of. He is a ready writer, an accomplished gentleman, of wide information, one who may some day, by his ability, attain an important and independent position as Embassador. Meantime, he is being trained as attache to various legations. He was for a while in Washington; then in Columbia, if I mistake not; afterwards at Constantinople, and more recently in China and Japan. By such training England raises up men who are capable to represent her interests and take care of them abroad. It is to be wished that our own government, for once losing sight of party, would act with similar wisdom. Then we might not have the mortification of being almost constantly mis-represented abroad by consuls and ministers who are neither gentlemen nor men of talent.

M. Lamartine, who is now the most princely beggar in Europe, is once more sending round his hat. I am glad to know that even France is getting tired of him. He now announces a new and costly edition of all his works, published and unpublished. He proposes to write for this a new Romance, and the lives of Tasso and Byron, as well as a memoir of his mother. Lamartine is the owner of a princely estate in one of the provinces of France. He has, by his own foolish extravaganee, covered himself with debts. He has several times refused to sell his estate, because he could not get what he thought a sufficient price! And so he groans and complains at his hard luck in having to live in the moderate way of a well-to-do citizen, rather than in the princely way which suits him.

The rumor that "Rutledge" was written by Miss Minturn, of New York, is contradicted by her family, and we now hear that this successful novel is by a Southern lady, a resident of Montgomery, Ala. There is another statement that the lady who is now Mrs. F. E. Church, wife of the celebrated landscape painter, is its author.

The Atlantic for August opens with an article called the Carnival of the Romantic, in which Mr. William L. Symonds considers novels, and ends by placing them entirely out of the pale of art. He is convinced that novels are a symptom of the decay of literature. He says:

"There is probably no other class of books, with literary pretensions, that contain so little thinking in proportion to their quantity of matter, as novels. They can scarcely be called organic productions, for they may be written and published in sections, like one of the lowest classes of animals, which have no organization, but live equally well in parts, and run off in opposite directions when cut in halves. Thoughts and books, like living creatures, have their grades, and it is only those which stand lowest in respect of intellectuality that admit of fractional existence. A finished work of the mind is so delicately adjusted and closely related, part to part, that a fracture would be fatal. Conceive of Phidias sending off from his studio at Athens his statue of Jupiter Olympus in monthly numbers,—despatching now the feet, now the legs, now the trunk, in successive pieces, now the shoulders, and at last crowning the whole with a head!

"Novels are perhaps too easily written to be of lasting value. An unpremeditated word in which the thoughts of years are exploded, may be one of the most admirable of intellectual phenomena, but an unpremeditated volume can only be a demonstration of human weakness. A novel is in its nature and as a matter of necessity an artistic failure; it pretends to nothing higher; but under the slack laws which govern its composition, multitudes of fine and suggestive characters, incidents, and sayings may be smuggled into it, contrary to all the usages and rules of civilized literature. Hence the secret of its popularity, that it is the organ of average as distinguished from highest thought. Science and art are the goals of destiny, but rarely is there a thinker or writer who has an eye single to them. It is an heroic, self sacrificing, and small platoon, which in every age brunts Fate, and, fighting on the shadowy frontier, makes conquests from the realm of darkness. Their ideas are passed back from hand to hand, and become known in fragments and potent as tendencies with the mass of the race, who live in the circle of the attained and travel in the routine of ages. The novelist is one of the number who half comprehend them, and borrows them from all quarters to introduce into the rich melange of his work. To solve a social problem, to reproduce an historical age or character, or to develop the truth and poetry latent in any event, is difficult, and not many will either lead or follow a severe attempt: but the novelist will merrily chronicle his story and link with it in a thousand ways some salient reminiscences of life and thought. When, sometime, Christian art shall become classical and Christian ideas be developed by superior men as fairly as Hellenic conceptions were, the novel may either assume to itself some peculiar excellency, or may cease to hold the comparative rank in literature which it enjoys at present. Then the numberless prose-romances which occupy the present generation of readers will, perhaps, be collected in some immense corpus, like the Byzantine historians, will be reckoned among the curiosities of literature, and will at least have the merit of making the study of antiquities easy and interesting.

There is an old couplet,—

"Of all those arts in which the wise excel, Nature's chief masterpiece is writing well."

At the time when extemporaneous composition and thoughtless reading are much in fashion, it will not be amiss to invoke profounder studies, and slower, but more useful and permanent results. Let it be remembered that even the Divine Mind first called into being the chaos of creation, and then in seven days reviewed and elaborated it into a beautiful order."

Of course no novel reader will believe all Mr. Symonds says; but not even the most perverse lover of fiction should skip his very readable article, which will at any rate act with a wholesome suggestiveness upon his intellect, and which, even to me, who am the most obstinate and perverse of novel lovers, conveyed a deep truth—which every one must find out for himself.

"A Legend of Many Lands" is concluded. Other articles are, "A Journey to Sicily," a poem; "Anno Domini 1860," said to be by Paul H. Hayne, of Charleston, S. C.; a second article on "The Origin of Species," by Prof. Gray; "Victor and Jacqueline," a story; "The Professor's Story;" "Tobacco;" "Elen-Jinen;" "Shakespeare Done into French;" a funny account of the metamorphosis which the Merchant of Venice suffered in a French theatre; and some good poems.

Derby & Jackson will publish, next week, "Methodism Successful, and the Reasons for its Success," by Rev. Dr. Teft, author of a novel called "The Shoulder-knot," and some years ago editor of the Methodist Ladies' Repository. The same house will have ready in August, "The Household of Bonverie," an American romance, in two volumes, by Mrs. Warfield of Kentucky.

Messrs. Appleton & Co.'s new list of works in press includes twenty-five books of varying interest and importance. Among the original American publications are Mr. E. E. C. Benedict's "Run Through Europe;" a novel "by a lady of New England," whom report says is Miss Prescott, (author of "Sir Rohan's Ghost") called "The Ebony Idol;" Bishop Doane's "Life and Writings," to form five volumes octavo; several classical school books. The reprints comprise Miss Yonger's new book, "Hopes and Fears;" a condensed edition of Dean Trench on the Parables; Mr. Buckle's long-looked for second volume of "History of Civilization in England;" Macaulay's newly-collected Miscellanies; and a beautiful library edition of Shakespeare, the text printed in large and legible type, without note or comment, from a special revision by Mrs. Mary Cowden Clarke, which that lady has been engaged in for some years, expressly for Messrs. Appletons.

Messrs. Ticknor & Fields announce as in progress, a volume of Poems by Whittier; a volume of Sermons by Horace Mann; the complete works of Walter Savage Landor; a new book of travels by Miss Bremer; a Life of Lord Bacon; a new Poem by Coventry Patmore, the author of "The Angel in the House;" Martin's very excellent translation of the Odes of Horace; and two new books by Capt. Mayne Reid, "Old People," and a "Book of Animals."

Messrs. Harper & Brothers will publish "immediately" Captain (now Major) Burton's Explorations in Eastern Central Africa, with numerous curious engravings from the author's sketches. The book is creating an excitement in England, being not only an important contribution to geographical science, but also—such is the general voice of the critics—an exceedingly interesting book of adventure. The same publishers have just issued "Queens of Society"—stories of women who have ruled by beauty and intellect; and will issue immediately "a charming juvenile, by Miss Muloch, author of John Halifax, Gentleman."

Scribner is getting ready for the fall trade a "Commentary on Matthew," by Rev. Dr. J. Addison Alexander. It will be in one octavo volume. He has nearly ready Dr. Palmer's "Poets, Owe," a collection of those Poems which, like Hood's "Song of the Shirt," are most deeply placed in the people's hearts. Such a collection cannot be large, but this has the merit of being most beautifully printed and illustrated, and will be one of the finest and most valuable American books of that kind—one which has a right to lie not only on the center table but also on the study table.

MANSFIELD FEMALE COLLEGE.

SIXTH ANNUAL EXAMINATION.

These exercises commenced on Friday, June 29th, and closed on the following Tuesday. Wednesday was Commencement day. Notwithstanding the severe drought, the dust, and the intense heat, the attendance was larger than ever before.

As the classes were examined, the Committee adjudged them according to the standard of scholarship used in the college, which is divided into five grades, viz.: failure, indifferent, good, superior, and excelsior.

In the Preparatory Department seven classes were examined in the studies prescribed in the catalogue. Of these, six were marked excelsior, and one superior. We take great pleasure in stating that this department is presided over by a lady peculiarly fitted for the work of laying the foundation of an education; and those who proceed to graduation from under her hand will have a decided advantage over young ladies less fortunate in their early training.

In the Collegiate Department twenty-one classes were examined in the various studies belonging to their department. Of these, one was marked Indifferent; two, good; nine, superior; and nine excelsior. It was apparent to the public as well as to the committee that the examination was honest, rigid, and critical.

THE COMMENCEMENT SERMON was preached on Sunday, July 1st, by Rev. S. B. Spratt. It was appropriate and powerful.

THE ART DEPARTMENT.

During stated hours the studio was visited by a large number of persons, many of whom, having visited the finest galleries of Art in the United States, pronounced the Ornamental department of this institution to be second to none in the South-West.

THE MUSIC

was mostly of that defiant kind which forbids the criticisms of any but a connoisseur; yet there were occasional pieces within the comprehension of the multitude, who manifested their delight in music that stirs the soul. The grand concert on Tuesday night exhibited great skill in execution, and evinced the arduous toil of the Professor and his assistants in this department.

COMMENCEMENT DAY

presented a brilliant scene, and furnished a rich intellectual feast. First in order was the conferring of degrees on nine young ladies of the graduating class. Then came their addresses, all of which were highly creditable productions, delivered with a degree of eleganee and grace rarely excelled. The Salutatory was by Miss Sallie G. Moss of Mansfield, La., and the Valedictory by Miss Mary L. Payne of Natchitoches, La. The Baccalaureate, by Dr. Thweatt, was a masterly production, finished in the classic style of its gifted author. The literary address, by Prof. Virgil M. Dubose of Murry Institute, Texas, was practical and pointed. The speaker was humorous, sarcastic, and sometimes eloquent, and the audience frequently manifested their high appreciation of the orator and his sentiments. The festivities of this bright day closed with a valedictory address from Dr. Thweatt, who retires from the arduous post he has so faithfully filled for the last six years. With a tenderness characteristic of his large heart, he blessed all and bade all adieu,—masters, faculty, pupils, patrons and citizens, not forgetting the noble structure, the erection of which he had watched with so much anxiety, almost counting the very bricks as they were laid upon its walls. The Doctor goes from the institution to seek the health he has sacrificed in its establishment.

Long may these classic walls stand as a monument of the self-sacrificing zeal of the founder of the Mansfield Female College. Many will follow him with their blessings and their prayers that his useful life may be spared to the church and the world, and that when he comes to die, peace may be the pillow for his head.

THE PRESIDENT ELECT.

Rev. Chas. H. Stuart of Ashton, Va., succeeds Dr. Thweatt in the presidency. Mr. Stuart is a graduate of Randolph, Macon, and Yale colleges, and was Prof. of Natural Science in the former for eight years. He has been an educator for fifteen years, and brings to his new position the prestige of finished scholarship and high literary character. With such qualifications, and a faculty that will compare favorably, for ripe scholarship, with the faculty of any of our Male colleges, the Mansfield Female College will afford facilities for the education of young ladies, not surpassed, if equalled, in the South-West.

THE STEWARD'S HALL

is under the management of the efficient and very acceptable steward who has given such general satisfaction for two years past. He is prepared to entertain comfortably, in the college buildings, from sixty to eighty boarders. The next session begins on Wednesday, 3d of October.

PROTESTANT CHILDREN IN ROMISH SCHOOLS.

There is one sad mistake into which christian parents have sometimes fallen, which appears to admit of neither apology or explanation. I allude to the well known fact that there are Protestant children now in Catholic Colleges and Convents, for the purposes of education!

How can it be expected that a set of women excluded from general society, and having no true relation to the great human family, should be able to teach our daughters to perform their part in life? A woman who has abandoned her own family and home, must certainly be incompetent to inculcate the duties of a daughter, and know still less of what is required of a wife and mother. I once heard a lady remark, who had herself achieved much social distinction, "I would never educate my daughter in a convent, for I never yet knew a convent girl to make any figure on coming out. There is want of style in their manners, and the mind, the intellect, slumbers in unawakened dullness." True, such girls can do fine needlework, and execute wonderful things in colored wool—some of their flower pieces look almost as well as Brussels carpeting. They can spend a half day in counting stitches, when they are unable to maintain a sensable conversation for a half hour." This was the opinion of an intelligent woman of the world. Neither in this present life, nor that which is to come, can any good come of giving up our children to the care of our greatest enemies—Romish priests and nuns.

A sweet tempered young lady, who had come home for vacation, said to me: "I should have won the gold medal if it had not been for one thing: I had a friend; you know the ladies do not wish us to love one girl more than another." The natural affections are to be crushed, and cold dissimulation prevails under the rule of Jesuitism. When will our people see what they are doing, when they invite error and discord into their homes?

Let Catholics, if they choose, bring up their children under the crosses, and banners, and pictures, and images of the Romish Church, but for our own sake, nay, for God's sake, let us protect our children from contamination.—Let us give no power the opportunity of tampering with our faith, so consecrated by the blood of martyrs.

Unmindful of what may follow, this practice continues, to the detriment of the health and happiness of the poor victim. Many and bitter are the regrets which follow, but they ever come too late. Too late to save the prison-blighted flower from an early tomb; too late to save the pure and holy faith of our fathers; too late to restore alienated confidence and love; too late for the salvation of domestic peace.

Sometimes a young girl is sent to a convent to prevent a growing intimacy, or to break up an ineligible match; yet I can imagine no circumstances which would justify such a rushing from one evil into a greater. Degraded indeed must be the connection which is to be more dreaded than the loss of a precious soul. We have no right to entail a false religion on those who are to come after us. "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap."

You may indeed say, "Little children, keep yourselves from idols, and never kneel to the consecrated wafer which they tell you is God," but why lend the poor lambs so far away from the Good Shepherd into such fierce temptation? Why place before them the imposing pomp and seductive pageantry of Popery, when their minds are too weak to reason, and they are too young to withstand the teaching of venerable men in black robes, and low-voiced women in white caps and long veils?

I beseech you, brethren, let this wrong altogether cease out of the land.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE BOARD OF CENTENARY COLLEGE.

The death of Dr. B. M. Drake, late President of the Joint Board, having been formally announced by Rev. W. H. Watkins, it was ordered that a Committee be appointed to express, in some fit manner and form, the feelings of the Board. They find it difficult to do so satisfactorily. A truthful portraiture of character to one not knowing Dr. Drake, would seem like elaborate eulogy. They beg leave to present the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the death of our friend and brother, Dr. Drake, comes up with striking freshness as we engage here and there in life's most important and pleasant duties, so identified was he with every enterprise that honors God and elevates man.

That, as Trustee and President of the Board, we have only such recollections of him as make his memory like precious ointment poured forth.

That while we lament the loss of a personal friend and of a wise and true friend of the College, we thank God that his life illustrated the power of the Gospel to elevate a man up to the highest style of manhood, and that his death illustrated the same power to keep a man in the conscious enjoyment of triumph over the fear of death.

That this report be recorded in the minutes of the Board, and a copy sent to the family of Dr. Drake; and also, that a copy be sent to the New Orleans Christian Advocate for publication.

OUR CAUDAL APPENDAGE AGAIN.

We have received a letter from a correspondent in Illinois, in response to our recent article headed, "Our Caudal Appendage," in which we took ground against the continuance of the word "South" in connection with the name of our Church. The writer is pleased with the sentiments, and says the number of those in the Northern Methodist Church who regret the division of the great Methodist body, is on the increase. He thinks Northern Methodists are under political influence to their hurt, and that, though they will vote the Republican ticket this fall, they will soon have their eyes opened to the fact that the party they support is under anti-Methodistic control. We do not publish the letter, as this synopsis is sufficient. We think differently from our correspondent on some points. If Northern Methodists can vote the Republican ticket, the success of which will be dangerous to the Union, it will take a long time to open their eyes. We hope, however, our correspondent is mistaken. As to the word "South" attached to the name of our Church, we have always opposed it. Though "Southern rights" in politics, because Southern rights are simply Constitutional rights, we protest against any political nomenclature or influences, or any sectionalism, in the Church of God. If any are so obtuse as to not be able to discover this distinction, their opinions are not worthy of weight.

A PREACHER IN THE HOLYDAYS.—Rev. Samuel Briggs, of the Pikeville Mission, Alabama Conference, has been enjoying the holydays. First a trip to Florence, to the commencement of the University where he has a brother; with which he was delighted, as also with mountain scenery on the way. Then a trip to Summerfield, and a reunion at the paternal hearth-stone. Then back to Pikeville Mission, like a faithful itinerant. Thus much we must say, though we have not room for ordinary letters of travel.

AN IMPOSTER.—From reliable friends in Southwestern Louisiana, we learn that an Irishman named Johnson, professing to be a Methodist, is begging money from the unwary which he does not deserve. We are assured that he is a consummate hypocrite. He pretends to be lame in one arm, and says he has a family in Atlanta, Ga. The communication to us is from Rev. T. B. White and others.

THE PRINCE OF WALES.—The British Squadron conveying the Prince of Wales and his suite, arrived at St. John's on the 23d of July, the Prince landed on the 24, and was received with great enthusiasm. During his brief stay there were grand doings in the way of processions, levees, dinners, balls, regattas, etc., and the Prince appears to have been quite popular with his mother's colonial subjects. On the 28th, the Squadron conveying the Prince left St. John's for Halifax.

SEVERE, BUT TRUE.—Macaulay, in his history of England, in reference to the character of those who often become converts to Popery, remarks, "We frequently see inquisitive and restless spirits take refuge from their own scepticism in the bosom of a church which pretends to infallibility, and, after questioning the existence of a Deity, bring themselves to worship a wafer."

DIED, on the 20th of June, at the residence of his father and mother, on Deer Creek, ALFRED PRENTISS POWELL CLARK, youngest son of J. M. and Eliza S. Clark, aged 3 years, 9 months and 2 days.

REV. LEWELL CAMPBELL has been appointed by Bishop Kavanaugh Presiding Elder of Fayette District, Mississippi Conference, in place of the lamented Dr. Drake.

BETHEL.—Rev. H. F. Johnson writes us from Fayette that at a protracted meeting at Bethel, there was a gracious religious influence, the fruit of which was, ten conversions and nineteen additions to the Church.

DE SOTO.—Rev. O. P. Westmoreland writes that at his third quarterly meeting, the Church was much refreshed, ten souls converted, and eight added to the Church.

MANSFIELD.—Rev. A. E. Goodwyn writes us that they have encouraging prospects in Mansfield. They are holding daily prayer meetings—two have professed conversion.

COMMENCEMENT REPORTS.—We have received several, and well written ones, too. But we have not heard from Auburn and Tuskegee.

AUGUST 1, 1860.

WEEKLY SUMMARY OF NEWS.

DOMESTIC.

BOSTON SNATCHING AT ROSTON.—There is a good deal of feeling among the citizens of South Boston, caused by the recent developments in regard to the purloining of dead bodies by a medical cadetaker.

The Rev. Dr. M'Ilvaine has been chosen Professor of Rhetoric in Princeton College, N. J.

THE ARMY EXPENDITURES.—The appropriations for the support of the army for the fiscal year just commenced, do not vary materially from those of last year. The sum appropriated is in round numbers $15,000,000. For the recruiting service, the appropriation is diminished from $90,000 to $50,000; and in a few other minor items of expenditure, there is a small reduction; but in the main items—including pay of the army, subsistence, clothing, regular supplies, and transportation—the appropriations will undergone no reduction, except the latter, which is about $200,000 less. The cost of transportation has been, and still is, a great item of army expenditure, exceeding generally $3,000,000. This arises from the scattered condition of the army, and the necessary establishment of military posts at distant points, far beyond the boundaries of civilization and settlement. The construction of a series of wagon roads and military roads, and improvements generally in the facilities of transportation, are gradually reducing this heavy charge upon the army.

An immense bed of white marble, said to be equal to the finest Italian, has been discovered in Prospect Hill county, Michigan.

PRESIDENT BUCHANAN.—The Lancaster (Pennsylvania) Express mentions a report that President Buchanan has sold his residence near that city, known as Wheatland, and that he has purchased, or is about to purchase, a property in the vicinity of Baltimore.

The Mayor of Philadelphia declines signing an ordinance allowing steam passenger cars to run in that city.

THE GREAT EASTERN.—It is announced that the steamship Great Eastern will leave New York on the 15th of August, on her return to England. She has been visited by great numbers of people at New York, but not so many as was expected.

DEATH OF AN EMINENT JOURNALIST.—A Washington despatch announces that Joseph Gales, one of the editors and proprietors of the National Intelligencer, died at his residence, in that city, on the night of the 2d inst. Mr. Gales was one of the oldest editors of the United States, and beloved by all who knew him.

The health of Savannah continues excellent. With the exception "of occasional light fevers of but few days' duration," the city is entirely free from disease.

FIRES IN TEXAS.—About half-past three o'clock P. M., on the 9th inst., a fire was discovered in the store of James M. Smoot, situated on the corner of Elm and Hickory streets, at the southwest corner of the public square in the town of Denton, and in a few moments the whole building was a mass of flames. A gulf breeze at the same time sprang up, and in a few seconds the stores of Messrs. A. T. Jacobs, and of Messrs. Holmes & Somats, were wrapped in flames. There were twenty-five kegs of powder in a magazine in the latter store, which in a few moments exploded with tremendous force, scattering fragments of the building and goods in every direction, and setting several of the buildings on fire. The whole west side of the public square, with the solitary exception of Messrs. Blount & Scruggs's store, on the extreme northwest corner, is in ashes. The total loss is estimated at over $80,000. On the same day, and at the same hour, the store of Smoot & Turner at Pilot Point was consumed by fire. This swelled Mr. Smoot's losses to $60,000. The Austin Statesman has a report that at the same time the town at Milford, in Ellis county, was burned. At the about the same time is said to have occured at Black Jack Grove, by which the large store of Mr. Cole was destroyed. Loss, $30,000. By the McKinney Messenger we obtain the following particulars of other fires, occurring nearly at the same period. "On the evening of the same day, and about the same hour, the store house of Mr. Depre, at Ladonia, was destroyed by fire, together with material for a new building, etc. The loss is estimated at $25,000. Also the large steam flouring mill at Millwood, in Collin county, was destroyed by fire. The loss is estimated at $10,000. The dwellings of J. J. Eskins and Silas Leonard, about one and a half miles from Dallas, were consumed by fire, with everything in them. At about the same time that the town of Dallas was fired, a fire broke out in Waxahatchie, which was fortunately discovered, and extinguished before much damage was done." There are reports of serious fires also at Sulpher Springs and Denham. The impression prevails that these extensive conflagrations in Texas are the work of Northern Abolitionists, several of whom have been ordered out of Texas.

BATON ROUGE AND NEW ORLEANS RAILROAD.—Mr. W. St. Pike, of Baton Rouge, was in New Orleans a few days ago on his way to New York for the purpose of completing the arrangements to commence the Baton Rouge and New Orleans Road as a branch of the Jackson and Great Northern Railroad.

THE MASONS IN CALIFORNIA.—The Masonic Fraternity of California celebrated St. John's day in San Francisco on the 24th ult., with appropriate ceremonies. More than one 1000 joined in the procession. They laid the corner-stone of a new Masonic hall, which is to cost, with the lot, $162,000.

MRS. Susan Decatur, widow of the heroic Commodore Stephen Decatur, died at her residence in Washington on the 21st of July. She was in the 81th year of her age.

THE ECLIPSE.—The recent Solar Eclipse was observed by a party under the immediate direction of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey now stationed on Gunstock Mountain, New Hampshire. The morning there was without a cloud, and perfectly calm. Besides the usual phenomena, magnetic and meteorological observations, intended for comparison with those of the expeditions to Labrador and the Pacific coast, were made by the party.

NEW COTTON.—The first bale of new crop Georgia cotton received at Macon on the 21st of July, from Houston county. The first bale of new crop Alabama cotton was received at Mobile on the 22d, from Dallas county.

THE LYNCHBURGH EDITORIAL TRAGEDY.—The examination of Wm. L. and William Hardwicke at Lynchburg for killing Capt. Dalton, assistant editor of the Virginian, on the 23d of June last, resulted in the Messrs. Hardwicke being sent to the Circuit Court for trial.

THE REPORTED EXPEDITION TO MEXICO.—The Mexican Consul General at New Orleans declares that there is no truth in the statement that the so-called Knights of the Golden Circle have the approbation of the Liberal Government in their report of expedition to Mexico. It is true they had offered their services to President Juarez, but they were promptly and unreservedly declined.

THE LOST IN THE HUNGARIAN.—The Rangor (Maine) Whig states that the company engaged in taking out goods from the wrecked steamship Hungarian, obtain from five to six hundred dollars worth per day. The wreck is full of bodies, some of which can be seen at low water, and the sight is represented as extremely distressing.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.—The population of New Hampshire by its census of 1850 was about 318,000. It was thought by many that the census of 1860 would show an increase to 375,000 or 400,000; but a late estimate or guess, sets it at about 330,000. If this last estimate be correct, New Hampshire will barely retain her three representatives in Congress.

CROCKERY.—It is stated that the manufacture of crockery has been commenced in Illinois, on a scale large enough to supply the demand of the whole valley of the Mississippi.

RAILROADS IN WISCONSIN.—Ten years ago Wisconsin had not a single mile of railroad completed within her borders.—Now nearly one thousand miles are traversed daily by the cars.

The Hon. John H. Lumpkin died suddenly, of apoplexy, on the 8th of July, at Rome, Ga. Mr. Lumpkin was a member of Congress for several terms from the Fifth District of Georgia.

BUST OF ALEXANDER HAMILTON.—Palmer, the sculptor, has just completed a bust of Alexander Hamilton for Hon. Hamilton Fish, of New York. Dr. Nott states that the resemblance to his original is perfect.

THE LA PLATA EXPLORING EXPEDITION.—Late advices from Buenos Ayres state that the United States Exploring Expedition, under Captain Page, has finished its explorations, and is about to return home. All the principal tributaries of the La Plata have been surveyed.

NAVAL.—All the gun-boats recently built for the United States Navy are now ready for commission. There are at present fourteen of these vessels, six of which were purchased.—There are now but seventeen sailing vessels in the navy exclusive of store-ships.

A VAST GRAIN FIELD.—The whole West, from the Ohio to the Missouri, is said to be a vast grain field. It is estimated that the State of Ohio will have thirty millions of bushels of wheat, five millions more than it has ever produced before.

AN OLD PAPER.—Thursday, the 19th ult., was the ninetieth birthday of the Worcester (Mass.) Spy, which was commenced in Boston by Isaiah Thomas on the 17th of July, 1770, under the name of the Massachusetts Spy. It was so active in behalf of the cause of Liberty that it was obnoxious to the Tories, and during the siege of Boston its publication was suspended. After a silence of about four weeks, the Spy was presented to the public in Worcester with the motto—"Liberty or Death." It is now the oldest paper in Massachusetts.

TORNADO AT LOUISVILLE.—Louisville, which has several times suffered from hurricanes and tornadoes, during the past few months, was visited by another on the evening of the 22d ult., which occasioned great damage to property, but fortunately no loss of life.

ALLEGED DEFAULTER.—Fred. Hoffman, the alleged defaulting Secretary of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, has been held to bail at New York, to await trial on four distinct charges—two for illegal issue of stock, and two for forgery.

REVOLT IN THE MISSOURI PENITENTIARY.—A revolt took place in the penitentiary at Jefferson City, Mo., on 23d ult., and some forty convicts made a simultaneous attack upon the gate of the prison, and succeeded in forcing it open and effecting their escape. Twenty of them were soon captured, and the others were still at large at last accounts. In the affair seven were severely wounded and three were killed by the guards of the prison.

LIBERATED AFRICANS.—A Nashville despatch states that the government of Denmark has sent a commission to negotiate with our government for the Africans recently captured off the Island of Cuba, to employ them as apprentices at St. Croix.

ALLEGED DEFALCATION.—The Washington correspondent of the New York Tribune says that the books of the Post Office Department show that the Postmaster at New Orleans is a defaulter in the sum of $50,000.

INTERVENTION IN MEXICO.—It is stated that despatches received at the State Department from Mr. Faulkner, our Minister to France, make no mention of the rumored intervention by France in the affairs of Mexico.

ANOTHER ALLEGED DEFALCATION.—The Washington correspondent of the New York Tribune says that Major R. Sutherland, Quartermaster of the Marine Corps, is a defaulter in the sum of $30,000.

OUR COMMUNICATIONS WITH TEXAS.—The Chief Engineer (Mr. Bayley) of the Great Western Railroad, states that the whole line of road from its present terminus at Berwick's Bay to New Iberia, the point of junction with the Texas road, is under contract, and that it will be entirely completed and in running order by the first of July next. He further states that the whole line of road from New Iberia to Houston, in Texas, will also be completed in 1861. At Houston this road makes its connection with the whole system of Texas roads, completed and in progress, extending to Austin, 200; to San Antonio, 550; and receiving numerous feeders, which come in from various directions, to pour the commerce of that immense State into one great channel, whose terminus is New Orleans.

DEATH OF KOSSUTH'S SISTER.—Another sister of the distinguished Hungarian has recently died in New York city.—Though in exile she was surrounded with a large circle of appreciating and noble-hearted friends. Very touching addresses were made at the funeral.

PUBLIC GARDEN IN BOSTON.—The Bostonians are engaged in preparing a public garden at an expense of $100,000.

THE RIO MEMBRES GOLD FIELD.—Later and more authentic advices from Arizona are by no means encouraging as to the prospects of mining in the Rio Membres Gold Field. It is now admitted that the mines are not extensive, the estimate being that five hundred men, averaging from $3 to $8 a day, would exhaust them in one year. At present very little mining is being done, owing in some measure to the fact that the season is unfavorable.

THE LIBERTY OF CONGRESS.—This institution now contains about 65,000 volumes, exclusive of a large number of pamphlets, and about 50,000 public documents; the annual appropriation is $5000 for miscellaneous and $2000 for law books.

ABOLITIONISTS IN TEXAS.—It is stated that on the 3d ult., three men, Clock, Sr., his son, and Perkins, his son-in-law, were arrested in Chappel Hill, and brought before a public meeting, on a charge of being Abolitionists. A committee of twelve of the most respectable citizens was appointed to investigate the affair. It was proved by several gentlemen that the accused had repeatedly said that they were Abolitionists; that there were three thousand Abolitionists in the State; that in three years the Black Republicans would rule the State; and that they sympathized with the negroes. The accused were ordered to leave the State as soon as they could arrange their business. They have complied with the order.

MURDERERS AT LARGE.—The New York Tribune publishes a list of over fifty murders which have been committed in that city within the last three years, without one of the perpetrators being discovered.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.—The Engineer-in-chief of this Road and the contractors for building fifty miles of the road were daily expected at Marshall (Texas) at last accounts, to begin vigorous operations, looking to the completion of the fifty miles at a very early day.

STEAMBOAT SUNK AND LIVES LOST.—A despatch states that the steamboat S. P. Hibbard, from Louisville for Memphis, sunk on the 26th ult., when five miles below Louisville, by a collision with the steamboat Chancellor, and that one passenger and three of the crew are supposed to have been drowned. Boat and cargo a total loss.

NAVAL.—The Navy Department has ordered the United States steamer-of-war Seminole to join the Brazil Squadron.—The Seminole is now at Norfolk, and will sail from that port as soon as ready.

LAKE SUPERIOR IRON.—The iron interest of Lake Superior region is very flourishing. The shipments for June were more than double the amount sent forward in the same time last year.

THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.—The fund of the Smithsonian Institution, Washington, amounts to some $650,000, and the interest annually derived is $38,325. The expenditures amount to about $33,000, including $9000 for salaries, $9000 for publications, etc.

DEATH OF AN EX-CONGRESSMAN.—The St. Louis Republican learns that Samuel Caruthers, formerly a member of Congress from the seventh district of Missouri, died recently at his residence at Cape Girardeau.

THE OLDEST MAN IN THE UNITED STATES.—The editor of the Cincinnati Times, while on a visit recently, had his attention called to a venerable person, who it was alleged was probably the oldest man in the United States. His name is Solomon Pangborn, who says he was born in the city of New York, in a small town of five or six hundred houses, in 1725. He is consequently 135 years old. Shortly after his birth his father purchased a farm on the Mohawk river, not far from Fort Johnson, whither he removed. The old gentleman resides at Rising Sun, Indiana, where he has relatives in comfortable circumstances. He complained that for the last year or two his health has been much impaired, and that he is so old medicine fails to improve his constitution, as it might in a younger person. He is perfectly resigned to live as long as God will permit him, but says that he would have met the fate common to mortality with a similar resignation many years ago. His sense of sight, as well as that of hearing, is much impaired, and he moves about with difficulty, although he still contrives to help himself, and uses neither crutch nor cane.

DROUGHT IN RHODE ISLAND.—At last accounts, the streams in Rhode Island were so dry that in some places the manufactories had to stop work.

FIRE IN PHILADELPHIA.—A fire occurred in Philadelphia on Sunday afternoon, 22d ult., entirely destroying the store of Messrs. Yard, Gilman & Co., one of the most extensive silk houses in the country. The total loss is estimated at from $60,000 to $70,000, all of which is covered by insurance.

HARVARD COLLEGE.—On the 19th ult., Professor Felton was inaugurated as President of Harvard College. He is the twentieth President of the institution.

A METEOR.—On the night of the 20th ult., a meteor was observed over a large extent of country, being seen as far South as Petersburg, Va., and possibly farther, and as high in the North as Albany, New York. This proves that it was much higher in the heavens than most observers thought, some of whom describe it as only a few hundred feet overhead. The elevation at which it was seen at Washington was about ten degrees; while at Brooklyn, New York, it was said to be twenty-five or thirty degrees. The accounts agree generally as to the appearance of the meteor, the slight differences being attributable to the various phases it assumed to different spectators.

REACTION IN THE SHIP-BUILDING TRADE.—The Northern press report a favorable reaction in the ship-building business. Quite a revival is now visible in the dock yards of New York and New England, where for several months past almost the quiet of the desert had reigned. A large number of the smaller craft, and some eight or ten large vessels are now on the stocks.

EMANCIPATION BY A VIRGINIAN.—Miss Cornelia Barbour, a daughter of the Hon. James Barbour, of Virginia, formerly Governor of that State and a member of President J. Q. Adams's Cabinet, has resolved to emancipate her numerous slaves and locate them in a free State.

A NEW CHARITABLE INSTITUTION IN BOSTON.—Boston is about to add to her charities a home for aged men. $10,000 have been subscribed in a few days, out of $30,000 needed.—The institution is intended for aged men born in Boston, whom the reverses of business or loss of means of support have thrown upon the charity of strangers or the care of impoverished relations.

FIRE IN CUTHBERT, GEO.—A fire broke out in Cuthbert on the 14th of July which destroyed the greater part of the principal business square of the town. The loss is estimated at $50,000.

THE JEWELRY TRADE.—The New York correspondent of the Charleston Mercury writes that the erection of marble palaces by jewelers is one of the signs of the times. Warehouses, instead of small shops, are now needed to hold the vast stock of a first class establishment; and one wanders, bewildered, through furlongs of counters filled with diamonds, rubies, emeralds, opals, pearls of great price, cunning work in cameo, lava, malachite, and the softer stones, and bright gold wrought into every imaginable shape to set off the visible charms of the irresistible. Private jewels, to the extent of from $5000 to $10,000, are now a very common possession of New York ladies. Ten years ago there was probably not a lady in town who had such a store of the "little sparklers."

DESTROYED BY FIRE.—The residence of Colonel James Brown, at Oxford, Miss., was destroyed by fire on the night of the 18th ult., together with all his furniture and library. Loss $7,000.

LOW WATER IN ALABAMA.—The water in the Alabama rivers is said to be lower than it has been known for years. Navigation for even the lightest draught boats is very difficult.

RUMORED PIRATICAL EXPEDITION.—The New York Journal of Commerce says rumors are in that city that a piratical expedition has sailed with the object of intercepting and seizing the negroes, now en route from Key West to Africa.

THE FISHERIES.—Ex-Governor Hubbard, of New Hampshire, United States Commissioner, under the reciprocity treaty, has gone to Newfoundland, where he will be joined by the British Commissioner, and proceed to define the fishing boundaries, as provided for in the treaty between the United States and England.

REMARKABLE.—The Pleyaune states that since the month of May, the house of Russell, Conant & Co., of Boston, cleared three ships in succession, with cargoes of no less than 1,000 bags of ice, consigned to J. L. Warner & Co., of New Orleans, every one of which was lost. They were the Ashland, the Cicero, and the Nanset, the news of whose loss came to hand a few days ago.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The following is a summary of the most important news from Europe since our last issue:

Great Britain.—In the house of Lords, on the 5th of July, Lord Wodehouse laid on the table the copy of a treaty between her Majesty and the Government of Honduras. The Earl of Malmesbury wished to know what had become of the treaty with Nicaragua, which ought to have preceded the treaty with Honduras. Lord Wodehouse said the treaty with Nicaragua was not negotiated before, but after the treaty with Honduras. The reason that the government had not been able to lay the two treaties on the table at the same time was, that although the treaty with Nicaragua had been concluded and ratified by her Majesty's government, the ratifications had not yet been exchanged. He was not aware of the cause of the delay. During a discussion in the House of Commons, Lord John Russell intimated that an agreement had been effected between England and France, relative to the Newfoundland fisheries.—In the same House, Sir Robert Peel having called on the Government not to assent to the annexation of Savoy to Piedmont, Lord John Russell replied that the Government could not depart from the great principle that the people had the right to choose their own government without interference. Several steamships had been purchased at Liverpool for Garibaldi and two had left for some port in Sicily.

Austria and Prussia.—The Opinione National says a treaty of alliance is on the point of being signed between Prussia and Austria, by which the former guarantees to the latter her German possessions; but not Venetia.

Rome.—It is reported that the Pope is not only disposed to grant a liberal Constitution, but he is further inclined to adhere to the suggestion of the Emperor Napoleon, to constitute a federative empire as the best solution of the Italian question. The Pontifical Government has released the political prisoners belonging to the Romagna, who were confined in the forts of Paliano, Civita, Castellanan and Ancona.

Naples.—Affairs in Naples were still in a very ticklish condition at last accounts. Patriots gathered in large numbers and traversed the streets of the capital. A conflict had occurred between the Royal troops and the people and several were killed on both sides. It is reported that the king had summoned the most influential members of his former Camarilla to consider the position of the country, and adopt such measures as would be beneficial for the protection of the crown. Dissatisfaction among all classes of the people was daily increasing. Ships, with troops, were leaving for Messina.

Sicily.—Garibaldi was daily receiving accessions to his strength and was expected to besiege Messina soon. It is reported that the Neapolitan steam corvette Veloce, six guns, has gone over to him.

Syria.—The insurrection in Syria continues. Fuad Pashn had gone there on a special mission, armed with full powers, and in view of that fact, England and France have agreed to abstain from present interference. If Turkey, however, proves unequable, these two governments have agreed on identical instructions to their Admirals to stop the massacres. At the destruction of the villages the Druses killed more than 2000 unarmed men in cold blood. There was great alarm at Beirout, and the Franks and Christians had taken refuge on board the foreign men of war. The last accounts state that the British Government had been informed that a fearful massacre of Christians had taken place at Damascus. Five hundred Christians, including the Dutch Consul, had been murdered in cold blood by the Turks. The American Consul was seriously wounded.

MARRIAGE OF THE PRINCESS ALICE OF ENGLAND.—The New Prussian Gazette says the statement as to a projected marriage between the hereditary Prince Louis of Hesse Darmstadt, and the Princess Alice, of England, is well founded, and that the recent visit of the two Hessian princes to London was relative to the proposed union. Prince Louis was born in 1837, and is heir presumptive to the throne of the Grand Duke of Hesse.

A NOVELTY IN TURKEY.—The Grand Vizier has been making a tour of the Turkish provinces, and for a novelty in oriental customs, making speeches to the people at all the principal places. What is more, the speeches are sensible, promise equal justice to all, without regard to sect or rank, and urge the people to forget their old animosities and live together as brethren.

A POWERFUL BURNING GLASS.—A Mechanic in Islington, London, has recently made a burning-glass, three feet in diameter, by which steel, flint, and even platina, it is said, have been melted by concentrating the rays of the sun upon them. Owing to its great size, it has attracted the notice of several societies devoted to science and art.

TYRE AND SIDON.—M. Renan, member of the French Institute, has been charged by the Emperor with the mission of endeavoring to discover the sites of Tyre and Sidon. He is to leave with his family in October.

PROVISIONS IN ENGLAND AND FRANCE.—Much complaint is made of the high price of provisions in England; and it is said that meat was never as high in France as at the present time. Some of the prices charged in Paris are given as follows: Fillet of beef, 48 cents per lb.; rump steak, 27 cents per lb.; inferior beef for making soup, (bone included), 18 cts. per lb.; ordinary joints of veal and mutton are 22 cents per lb. Salmon is sold at 84 cents per lb. A single mackerel costs 21 cents. Vegetables and fruit were never known to be as dear as now.

PERILS OF THE SEA.—Shipwrecks on the British coast were numerous and fearful last year, during which no less than 1616 persons perished; in the same time 2332 lives were saved from wrecked vessels, many of them by life-boats with which the coast of England and Scotland is well supplied.

SEBASTOPOL.—The city of Sebastopol, which before the siege contained a population of forty thousand souls, now numbers but ten thousand inhabitants, of whom eight thousand are men. The ruins are all cleared away, and the resurrection of the city has commenced, providing for forty-five highways, seventeen streets, and twelve squares.

A MATCH BROKEN OFF.—Some time ago it was announced at Paris that Miss Willing, an American belle, was to be married to the Count Henschel de Donersmark, a German millionaire. The Paris correspondent of the Courrier des Etats Unis now says that the match has been broken off, and that a brother of the lady has gone abroad, fought a duel with the Count, and wounded him severely. It is hinted that a fair Marquise, who formerly held the German in her graceful toils, but who had been deserted for the trans-Atlantic maid, had recovered her hold upon her recalcitrant lover.

LORD PALMERSTON.—The London Court Journal, of June 30, has the following familiar allusion to Palmerston:—"Our gay and gallant Premier rode to Harrow and back on horseback, on Thursday last, to hear the speeches. Lord Palmerston cherishes a great affection for Harrow, and made a great point to be present. He rode home against time, and did the eleven miles in about an hour." Lord Palmerston received his early education at the famous Harrow School, and has always been a great favorite with the Harrow boys.

THE PRUSSIAN GRAND MASTER MASON.—Prince Frederic William, heir to the Prussian crown, has assumed the duties of Grand Master over all the Masonic lodges of the kingdom, in succession to Gen. Schalsky, deceased.

POPULATION OF SICILY.—By the census of 1858, the population of Sicily was 2,231,000, which, as the area is about 10,000 square miles, is between six and seven hundred to a square mile.

The total number of registered electors in Great Britain is stated by a recent official return to be 1,071,975.

SUBMARINE TELEGRAPH BETWEEN FRANCE AND THE UNITED STATES.—Louis Napoleon has sent to the Corps Legislatif for approval a convention for the laying of a submarine telegraph between France and the United States. The subsidy promised by the French government is an interest of seven per cent during fifty years on a capital of 15,000,000 francs. Nothing is yet known of the route that will be adopted for the line, or the time when it will be laid.

The French Chamber of Deputies has voted an extraordinary credit of 4,000,000f. for the laying of a Telegraph cable direct between France and Algeria.

It is reported that Queen Victoria will visit Belgium and Prussia, some time this month, with Prince Albert. The royal pair go to Berlin to attend the baptism of the expected second child of the Princess Frederick William.

GREAT INCREASE IN RAIN IN ENGLAND.—The great increase in the fall of rain in England, during the past few years, is exciting much attention. The rain-fall in London during the first six months of the last four years has shown a gradual increase, the quantities being—In 1857, 8.273 in.; 1858, 9.938 in.; 1859, 10.995 in.; and, in 1860, 15.165 inches (to 0 a.m. 26th).

IN MEMORY OF THE VICTIMS.—Messrs. Gibbs, Bright, and Co., of Liverpool, owners of the ill-fated steamship Royal Charter, are about to erect an obelisk to the memory of the victims of that most terrible catastrophe on the spot where she was wrecked.

RETIREMENT.—A vacancy has occurred in the Professorship of Botany at University College, London, by the retirement of the veteran author, Dr. John Lindley, who has filled that post for thirty years, and is known to naturalists in every part of the world by his classic works on the vegetable kingdom.

THE FRENCH EMPEROR ON ITALIAN AFFAIRS.—The Turin correspondent of the London Times, in his letter of July 9, writes: "I hear from the very best sources that a person of high rank, just on his return from Paris, who saw Napoleon at Villafranca, related that the monarch had expressed himself, in the most unequivocal and positive terms, "that it had become a matter of necessity that both the Bourbon of Naples and the Pontiff of Rome should decamp." The Emperor added that it was possible the Pope might inhabit the island of Sardinia, with the nominal sovereignty over the island, but allowing it the full enjoyment of its free institutions. The Pope would enjoy a civil list of 10,000,000 francs. The Emperor professed the utmost admiration for Garibaldi's past exploits, and said France would never be a hindrance to the furtherance of that hero's future achievements.

PHOTOGRAPHIC PICTURES.—It is stated that M. Toulasant, of Paris, has made the discovery of taking and fixing the natural colors on photographic pictures.

EMIGRATION FROM LIVERPOOL.—The official returns of emigration from Liverpool, for the half year and month ending 30th June, amounted to 48,076, which is an increase of 6065 over the corresponding period last year. The great bulk of this emigration was directed to the United States, viz., 807 cabin and 33,381 steerage passengers.

A MAGNIFICENT TELESCOPE.—A new and magnificent equatorial telescope has recently been mounted at the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, under the direction of the Astronomer Royal, Professor Airy. It surpasses in magnitude any other instrument of the kind in England or France, and is nearly on a par with the celebrated instrument at Pulkown, the principal Observatory in Russia. The object glass is nearly thirteen inches, and the length of the telescope fifteen feet. It is so nicely balanced on its axis as to be movable vertically with the slightest touch. The movement in longitude is effected by clock work, and the apparatus set in motion, although weighing several tons, is moved by the clock with the greatest evenness and regularity. The motion, by a simple contrivance, can be applied or removed in an instant, by the observer.

AMERICAN TRAVELLERS IN THE HOLY LAND.—The number of American travellers journeying in Syria and Palestine this year is quite unparalleled. Nearly twenty left Beirout on the 9th of April, having completed the tour of the Holy Land, and there are said to be more than fifty in the interior.

THE KING OF NAPLES.—A Berlin paper affirms that the chateau of Rosenhofen, the summer residence of the King of Bavaria, is being prepared for the reception of Francis II. in case he should find it necessary to make a precipitate retreat from Naples.

FRENCH NATIONAL RIFLE ASSOCIATION.—It is said that the Emperor of the French has authorized the formation of a National Rifle Association, like that in England.

LIVINGSTONE'S EXPLORATIONS IN AFRICA.—Among the appropriations to be voted by the British Parliament, is one of $57,500 for Dr. Livingstone's explorations in Africa, for which another steamer is needed. The discoveries of Dr. Livingstone are regarded as of the greatest importance at the Cape Colony, and the Colonial Legislature has appropriated funds to keep up a regular inland communication with the exploring party.

THE HARVEST IN ENGLAND.—By the late accounts from England, it appears that the prospect of the harvest was very considerably improved. The wheat promised to be excellent in quality and a fair average. The only crop that is spoken badly of is mangel-wurzel, an important one, it is true, but less so than grain and potatoes. This prospect has ceased a decline in the wheat trade, which may effect considerably the shipments from this country.

A COAT OF MAIL FOR GARIBALDI.—It is stated that a Parisian lady has gone to Sicily, taking with her a present to Garibaldi from a French armorer. The gift is a coat of mail, dagger proof and bullet proof. Its workmanship is perfect, and is valued at upwards of 5000 francs. It may be worn under the uniform like a shirt, for it is extremely flexible, light and portable.

RETURN OF SICILIAN FUGITIVES.—The Turin correspondent of the London Times writes on the 9th ult.: The Neapolitan Legation at this Court, probably in obedience to instructions received on the first promulgation of the still-born constitution at Naples, has signified to all the exiles from the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies, that it is ready to issue passports to any of them who may be inclined to go back to their country. We have here Salazza, the Prince di Lepille, Caracciolo, Piancane, Carrano, Camorrotto the Duke of San Donato, and many others, all on the move. From Florence and Pisa I have no doubt that Baron Belotti, Mariaeo d'Ayala, Paolo Emilio Imbriani, Poerio's brother-in-law, and from Bologne the brothers Spaventa, Settembrini and other men bearing equally illustrious names, will be foremost in the march. All those gentlemen go home on irreconcilable foes to the Bourbon, and irrevocably wedded to the principles of Italian unity, and the annexation of both the Sicilies to the kingdom obeying the sceptre of Victor Emanuel."

PROPOSED BENVAN MANUMENT.—A meeting was recently held at the Freemason's Tavern, London, under the presidency of the Earl of Shaftesbury, to take into consideration the most appropriate means for raising by public subscription a metropolitan monument to John Bunyan. The meeting was attended by many gentlemen of influence in the Established Church and Dissenting congregations, and the following resolution was agreed to unanimously: "That in the opinion of this meeting, the absence of any public record for a period of nearly two hundred years to the memory of so distinguished a man as John Bunyan, is a matter deeply to be regretted, and that his eminent services in the cause of religion, and his untiring zeal for the welfare of his fellow-men, demand the lasting gratitude of Christendom. It is therefore considered by this meeting to be very desirable that a statute to his memory be erected, by public subscription, in one of the leading and most public thoroughfares in the metropolis."

POLITICAL.

Two State Conventions are called in Virginia, both to meet on the 16th inst.—one at Staunton, by the friends of Douglas and Johnson, and the other at Charlottesville, by the friends of Breckenridge and Lane, the object of both being to appoint electoral tickets.

A State Convention is to be held in Chillicothe, Ohio, on the 15th inst., for the purpose of nominating Bell and Everett electors, etc.

The New York Houston convention, for the purpose of nominating an electoral ticket for Sam Houston for President, met at Schenectady on the 18th ult. Commodore Stockton was named as Vice President, but in the attempt to make an electoral ticket, the meeting, though composed of only a few persons, broke up in confusion.

Senator Fitzpatrick, of Alabama, has written a letter in which he expresses his concurrence with the platform of principles on which Breckenridge and Lane were nominated, and his determination to give them his support.

The New York Republican State convention is to be held at Syracuse on the 22d inst. to nominate State officers and a Presidential electoral ticket.

A Douglas State Convention was held in Nashville, Tenn., on the 28th ult., and a full electoral ticket was nominated.

A State Convention is to be held in Georgia on the 13th inst. to nominate Presidential electors for Bell and Everett.

A committee of radical Abolitionists have called a Convention to be held at Syracuse N. Y. on the third Wednesday in this month, to nominate candidates for President and Vice President of the United States. This would indicate that Lincoln and Hamlin are not radical enough for them.

Three Southern State elections take place this month—in Missouri and Arkansas on the 6th, and North Carolina on the 9th.

A Douglas and Johnson electoral ticket has been formed in Arkansas.

LITERARY GOSSIP.

Dr. Bunting's Life is not yet completed, but the second volume will probably appear before the summer has passed.

A new edition of Adam Clarke's Commentary is about to be issued, much improved, in England.

Rev. G. F. Playter, of Canada, is writing a History of Methodism in Canada; it will open a mine of Ministerial romance.

The copyrights of Peter Parley's works are estimated to be worth $75,000. The copyright of Mr. Bancroft's history is probably—next to that of Webster's Dictionary—the most valuable in the United States.

It is stated that Lord Brougham has recently completed a treatise on the British Constitution, which will be published during the coming winter.

The works of Maranlay are being translated into French by a son of the historian Guizot.

We learn from the N. Y. Methodist that Dr. Abel Stevens is about to visit England for a few weeks, for materials for the History of Methodism, and to get out an English edition of his first two volumes.

Our Methodist brethren in Paris publish a little periodical entitled L'Evangeliste, which does good service for evangelical piety.

The Irish Methodists are issuing in Dublin a spirited journal entitled the Irish Evangelist. It is one of the signs of the new progressive spirit of that portion of the Wesleyan army.

In England, a Life of Robert Stephenson, the engineer, to include the history of railway engineering and progress, as connected with his professional career, is in preparation, with the sanction of his friends, by whom all the necessary documents, etc., are contributed.

The Memoirs of Lorenzo da Ponte, the Venetian poet and collaborateur of Mozart, are shortly to be published in Paris.

The executors of Theodorn Parker's will have notified the city of Boston that the books of Mr. Parker will be ready for delivery, according to the will, by December. There are between 10,000 and 17,000 volumes, and have been appraised at $20,000.

Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, who has recently returned from a European tour, is engaged in the preparation of a new work, on which, it is stated, she means to rest her reputation as an authoress.

Among the many books in press in Philadelphia at present we may note, "Recollections, historical, political, biographical, and social, of Charles J. Ingersoll, by experience, presenting annals, with portraiture of personages of this country, from Genet's arrival in 1792, to the purchase of Louisiana in 1803, with which increase of the original United States, many of their great events, physical and constitutional, are supposed to be connected;" and "Occasional Productions, political, diplomatic and miscellaneous, including, among others, a glance at the Court and Government of Louis Phillippe, and the French Revolution of 1848, while the author resided as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States at Paris, by the late Richard Rush." Both of these must prove readable and instructive works.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

THE ENGLISH BIBLE.—The London Athenæum says: "The annual production of Bibles in this country is estimated by Mr. C. Knight at between two and three millions of copies. The books for which there is the next largest permanent demand are said to be 'Shakspeare,' and perhaps 'The Pilgrim's Progress;' but it is not considered that more than 20,000 copies of 'Shakspeare' are sold in a year. It appears that there was, until of late years, much carelessness in printing the Bible. So recently as 1851, Principal Lee stated 'I do not know of any book of which it is so difficult to find a very correct edition as the English Bible.' The Bibles now issued from the universities and by the queen's printers are very accurate; the Oxford printers offer a guinea for the discovery of any mistake. But some of the Bibles allowed (on account of having notes) to be printed by private printers have verbal inaccuracies, and there are errors in some Bibles which have been published in Scotland, where Bible printing is free to all, but under supervision. Printers state that there is great difficulty in attaining correctness with regard to the Italics; one improvement proposed has been that of printing within brackets the words necessary to make up the sense, instead of printing them in Italics 'according to the barbarous custom of the present printers of the Scriptures,' which Mr. Knight also condemns as embarrassing to unlearned readers."

AN English letter-writer states that the old plan of pew rents for church expenses has been successfully exchanged in many Baptist churches for voluntary offerings, secured by boxes placed at the entrance of the chapels, to receive what the congregation freely casts in every Lord's day. In Scotland the new plan is all but universal.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF CONGRESSIONAL LIBERALITY.—Sir Moses Montefiore, the distinguished member of the Jewish faith in England, has addressed to the Jewish citizen of Washington a letter, handsomely acknowledging his deep sense of the liberality of our House of Representatives, in inviting a minister of the ancient faith to offer prayers at the opening of the House on the day the election of a Speaker was effected.

A Convention, composed of ministers and laymen of the Methodist Episcopal Church within the bounds of Rockingham (Va.) district, Baltimore Conference, has been recommended to be held in Harrisonburg on the first Thursday of August next. The object of the convention is to consider the action of the late General Conference of the Church on the subject of slavery, and to appoint delegates to a general convention of the church on the same subject.

The Rev. James Hobart of Berlin, Vt., is now about entering the ninety-fifth year of his age, and the seventieth year of his ministry, and still he is vigorous and active, preaching every Sunday when and wherever he can engage himself. About thirty years ago he was dismissed from the congregation over which he was settled, on the plea that he was worn out.

Brooklyn is the City of Churches. Methodism has considerable sway there. There are, Methodist Episcopal Churches, 24; Methodist Congregational, 1; Methodist Protestant, 2; African Methodist Episcopal, 5—32 in all.

The new connection Methodists, in England, report 22,630 members; and in Canada, 6421.

Dr. Schauffler gives, in the Missionary Herald, an account of a remarkable movement in Constantinople, by which some 10,000 Turks have embraced doctrines closely allied to Christianity; some 10,000

ALINE ELWIN: A TALE OF ALABAMA.

BY FANNY SHELDON.

CHAPTER XIII.

"Nay, speak no ill!—a kindly word
Can never leave a sting behind;
And to oft breathes such tale we've heard,
Is the beneath a noble mind."

Aline was an only daughter, and would have been spoiled, perhaps, by a careless observer. But Mrs. Elwin was too careful, and even too solicitous for her daughter's welfare, which rendered her very disagreeable at times. She had been petted, flattered and caressed by her parents, till vanity and self importance were her most observable characteristics. Thus did Aline form a striking contrast to her manly, high-minded brother. Edward had noticed with much pain the unkindness of his sister, and was often pained by her ridiculous imitations of aristocratic and fashionable style. She had never fancied Anna as school-mates, they were constant companions

PROGRESS OF PROTESTANTISM IN MISSISSIPPI AND THE SOUTH-WEST.—No. XXVI.

Mr. Editor—I have several times alluded to the disorganized and rude state of society in Western Louisiana when it was first visited by the Methodist Itinerants. The mass of society was heterogeneous, but the elements of evil predominated greatly over the good. Some immoral practices were connived at not often tolerated in civilized communities. Among others was that of men and women entering into housekeeping arrangements without being legally united in the bonds of holy matrimony. The parishes in those days were very large, so the citizens often lived from fifty to one hundred miles from the parish site, and the difficulty of obtaining licence from a priest so remote, or a suitable officer to officiate at the hymenial altar, was often rendered as an excuse for this condition of affairs, but no doubt the ignorance and depravity which were prevalent were the principal causes.

As late as 1826, I preached and organized a society in the house of a man in Washita parish who had never been lawfully married to his house-keeper; otherwise they were well behaved, and well thought of by their neighbors, and his house being the most commodious for preaching purposes was offered by him, and accepted by the community as a place of worship until they could do better. The woman was awakened, and applied privately to know if she could be admitted into the Church, offering her entire willingness to be legally married. I told her the marriage would have to precede her entrance into the Church. She then requested me to use my influence with her partner to have this stumbling-block removed, and this reproach put away. I proceeded to converse with him kindly, but faithfully on the subject, and he seemed fully alive to the disabilities they were under and the odium that necessarily attached to their manner of life, but offered as a palliative the difficulties in the way of a lawful marriage when they first agreed to live together, and now they had lived together so long he had not the courage to brave the excitement in the public mind that would be aroused by their marriage. I told him he had not a friend in the world that would not heartily commend him for it, for, with that exception, they were highly esteemed as neighbors and citizens; and moreover, the woman seemed deeply concerned about her soul's salvation and desired to join the Church, but could not be admitted unless they either got lawfully married or separated forever. He came into measures and promised to have the ceremony performed, and the marriage recorded as soon as he conveniently could, but it was not done when I left the country, which was soon after. I have introduced this subject not only as an illustrative item of the times, but also to show the reclaiming and renovating power of the gospel among such people.

In early times, when the place now called Monroe, on the Washita river, was known as "the Post of Washita," there came into the vicinity, from puritan New England, a young adventurer by the name of Sylvanus Bascom. He engaged in the ordinary pursuits of young men for money making purposes, until he gathered enough to get him a piece of land on the western side of the river a few miles above the Post, upon which he settled. He had been religiously raised, and brought with him from the land of steady habits, a tender conscience and a good moral character, but his "evil communications" with the society about the Post "had corrupted his good manners" until he fell an easy prey to the vices of the country. To other evil deeds he added that of entering into partnership with a transient housekeeper, with whom he seemed to live in the closest union in every respect except that of being joined together in holy wedlock. They were somewhat thrifty and soon were "well to do" for the grade of society to which they belonged. In this state of affairs Thomas Griffin entered the pine hills west of the Washita river as a pioneer preacher, and the scattered population was attracted from all parts to hear his heart-searching and powerful preaching. Among others Bascom was an attentive and deeply interested hearer one Sabbath at Hunnicutt. Brother Griffin "got at the sinner's track" that day, and pressed him closely to all his degrading, dangerous, and often fatal wanderings from God, and pointed him to the "burning lake" as the basis of his course, unless avoided by early repentance and thorough reformation. Bascom's conscience had been pierced by sin, and he had seldom resorted to the pious lessons of his New England training. But under this sermon he was greatly awakened. The impressions of his earlier days were powerfully renewed. The sins of his heart and life came up in fearful remembrance, and he was ready to exclaim "woe is me, for I am undone!" He determined at once to invite the preacher home with him, and ask his counsel and prayers. While Sally was busy here and there about dinner, with evident emotion he unbosomed himself freely to brother Griffin—giving him a history of his early, religious training, and his wide departure from the counsels of his youth since his settlement in Louisiana, and finally his relation to the woman who was his housekeeper. "Bascom," said brother Griffin with his usual directness, "you have choice of one of three alternatives. Either marry that woman and live with her according to God's ordination, in the holy estate of matrimony, or put her away forever, or go to perdition; for to become a christian in your circumstances is an utter impossibility." Bascom was truly penitent. Conviction had searched him out and entered deep into his soul. His sins rose up in all remembrance and countless numbers, and he felt that further delay would be extremely hazardous, if not fatal to his salvation, and he resolved to act promptly. He made known his feelings and purposes to Sally, and proposed that they should get married and live together lawfully, as their present relation would be an effectual bar to his success in religion. She promptly rejected his proposal, and declared "she would not put her neck into such a halter; that she liked him well enough then, but she might see some one after a while that she would like better; that his treatment was kind enough up to that date, but it might not be so to the end of life, and she intended to have no legal bar in her way if she should ever have cause to leave him." He told her then that they must, without hesitation, separate forever. She consented, and entered into the excitement of the new arrangement with a zest. Bascom made an honest division of all their household and kitchen furniture, even to the smallest articles, and by her request put her portion on board a treding boat which then lay at their landing, in which she also took passage to seek her fortune elsewhere. Bascom now took up his long neglected Bible and began to search its truth-telling pages, which he found "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and for instruction in righteousness." He also became a man of habitual prayer, and betook himself to all the means of grace within his reach. But while he was yet bearing the burden of unpardoned sin, and struggling against the pollutions of an unregenerated heart, he found himself involved in new difficulties, and beset with new temptations. As soon as it was known that he was without a housekeeper, others were seeking the vacated berth, and as he would make no advances several of them made it convenient to visit him and offer their services. He rejected all their proposals; told them he was determined by the help of God to lead a new life, and he done with all such arrangements. But the situation was desirable; a comfortable home; a man more trustworthy and respectable than the vulgar and dissipated herd around them, and if he could not be brought to terms one way, other ways must be resorted to. In pursuance of their plan they would put on their best appearance and spend a night or two at his house occasionally. "How shall I manage this difficult case?" he enquired one day of Ashley Hewitt. "As a general rule," brother Hewitt replied, "it is best to assume a defiant attitude toward an enemy and overcome by superior courage and strength, but in this case there is no safety but in flight. Pause to confer with flesh and blood, or to tamper a moment with the enemy, and you are a ruined man. Take to your heels in the hour of danger." Bascom adopted this advice literally, and resolutely avoided their company, though on some occasions he had to leave them in possession of his house during the night. In the mean time the work of grace was taking deep root in his heart. He sincerely lamented his former course of wickedness, and after many sore struggles with his long cherished evil habits and an unbelieving heart, he was enabled to cast himself, all polluted and guilty as he was, on the atoning merits of Him "who died, the just for the unjust." In that act the guilt of sin was removed; the power of sin was broken; and he rose up renewed in the spirit of his mind, feeling that he was a new creature in Christ Jesus. His soul was appalled when he looked back to the horrible pit from which he had just escaped, but when appreciating the fact that he had now "put on Christ," he was filled with rapturous joy. Having been duly admitted to membership in the Church he soon became fully interested in all her movements. With what assistance he could get from a few of his very poor neighbors, he soon put up a decent log church, and supplied it with seats and a pulpit, and it was long known as "Bascom's church." His advancement in personal experience and religious knowledge was steady and rapid, so that he soon became the leading Methodist in his community.—There was such a change in the whole tenor of his life that all could see its reality. The candidates for horse-racing gave him up as an unmanageable case, and began to feel a reverence for him as a man of God. A Church was soon organized in his neighborhood and he was duly installed as class-leader. His example was good, and his influence as an active christian was felt throughout his community. He had no children of his own, but he took two orphan boys to raise, who, with the addition of two servants, composed his family when I became acquainted with him in 1826. He generally had plenty in store for man and horse, which, in addition to his amiable christian character, made his house a pleasant home for the travel-worn itinerant preachers. Many were the tranquil and profitable hours I spent with Sylvanus Bascom in 1826. While there I could rest or read, pray or converse, or go bathing in the river as I felt inclined. And what luxurious feasting on the best of front! Such as I have never met with elsewhere. Having demonstrative evidence of my penchant for fish, he generally anticipated my visit by sending his boys to the mouth of the Darbonne to catch a mess of fish for the preacher, which was served up in the most approved style and enjoyed to the full.

I have often reflected with pleasant emotions on the unusual circumstances attendant on one of my visits to Bascom's. There lived in his neighborhood a paralytic, who was very poor, by the name of Holland. He had long led a dissolute life, but in his affliction and poverty, he had sought the Lord and found him, "full of compassion, and ready to forgive." He was admitted to church fellowship and went on his way rejoicing. He loved Christian communion, and one afternoon he hobbled over to brother Bascom's to spend the evening in holy converse. In the mean time Bascom's health was declining, and he felt that he was nearing his eternal home. As they eat in the deepening twilight recounting what great things the Lord had done for them, and how he had begotten them to a lively hope—to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for them, then the holy fire burned and glowed in their hearts until they were wrapt up in the visions of God. "Glory to God," exclaimed poor Holland, "I am so happy!" "So am I, bless the Lord, O, my soul," responded Bascom. "Nothing is wanting to complete our rapture but the presence of brother Jones. O, that he were here to share our joy! But we will see him to-morrow." On that day I had filled my appointment at Abram Pipes' and felt almost uncontrolable promptings to go that night to Bascom's. For more than half way I was teased with the suggestion that perhaps I had neglected some pastoral visitations in the neighborhood above that ought to have been attended to that afternoon and night, and that I was seeking my own ease and pleasure by hastening on to Bascom's, but still I seemed not to be able to change my decision. I lifted my heart in prayer to be forgiven if I had been delinquent, and to be shown the path of duty. Presently I felt an overwhelming sense of the approving presence and love of God. The rapturous emotions of my heart prompted me to alight from my horse, and roll on the grass in joyous praise to God for his abounding goodness to his unworthy servant. It was dark when I arrived, and I passed to the door unobserved. As I entered the door, Holland vociferated, "glory to God, here he is now!" "Hallelujah," exclaimed Bascom, "now our joy is full!" They soon clasped me in their brawny arms and we all shouted. Yes, enjoyed a real ontspoken, old fashioned shout. How could it be otherwise when we were all as happy as we could well be in the body? The mystery of my afternoon experience was now explained. God had sent me on a mission of love to his afflicted children. Poor paralyzed Holland soon passed away from the sorrow stricken scenes of earth to his home in Abraham's bosom. Bascom lingered a few years to be perfected in the crucible of sanctified affliction, and then entered into rest. After the lapse of thirty-five years I am still here, and still happy in the service of my Master. I am after you, old friends, and the time of our re-union draweth nigh. Glory be to God for the blessed prospect!

THREE BOOKS OF 1860.

BY LUTHA FONTELLE.

So much has been said and written about "Adam Bede" and the "Mill on the Floss," that any thing further may appear superfluous. But the demand for these works, extraordinary as it has been, is still unsated.—The large and repeated supplies have been bought up so rapidly in the city, that there are still many in the country to be envied for the pleasure yet in store for them.—There are even some quiet people in the city, who, seeking rather what is worthy than what is new, have stood aside until the marvelous rush for them abated.

But now, that they have been generally read, let us calmly inquire into the secret of the author's great success, and into the character of the influence they will exert upon the public mind.

"Adam Bede" is the story of a carpenter, and the "Mill on the Floss" deals also with lowly life. All can readily understand how these faithful portraitures of simple English country life, and of every-day emotion, can move the heart of the mass, that toils and struggles, thinks and suffers, more or less, like them. Some would be fine people speak of them with disgust as sketches of low characters and scenes with which they have nothing in common: I pity them, for while the true earnest nature everywhere, among the refined as among the uncultivated, responds to the utterance of these elemental emotions of the common human heart, their narrow souls are incapable of appreciating a thought or feeling in others ungilded by a proud title, or silken surroundings. And the names of the miller's daughter and of the carpenter "are so unromantic." Not very promising in themselves, I admit. Christ was styled the carpenter's son, and had these dainty people lived in His day, they would doubtless have found very little promise of a universal King in His humble life and sympathy with the masses. Let them pass.

Miss Evans tells us why she has made choice of these scenes, these characters.

> "So that ye may have
> Clear images before your gladdened eyes,
> Of nature's unambitious underwood,
> And flowers that prosper in the shade."

She enjoys the old Dutch paintings with their truthful representations of domestic life. She says, "I would not, even if I had the choice, be the clever novelist who could create a world so much better than this, that you would be likely to turn a harder, colder eye on the dusty streets and the common green fields—on the real breathing men and women who can be chilled by your indifference, or injured by your prejudice; who can be cheered and helped onward by your fellow feeling, your forbearance, your outspoken, brave justice. There are few prophets in the world, few sublimely beautiful women—few heroes. I can not afford to give all my love and reverence to these rarities; I want a great deal of these feelings for my every-day fellow-men."

But she invests every page with a charm, by the piquant boldness with which she makes use of universal facts, and weaves her story out of homely truths. Touches of unaffected nature move us continually. There are some who delight in saying that "circumstances make the man." Miss Evans gives us the effect of circumstances upon each character, showing how they develope the beauty and strength of the firm and the true, and how they wither the energies and sweep away the principles of the weak and selfish. And while the plot moves steadily on to a characteristic denouement, the inner life is laid bare before us; we feel the heart-throbs at each new sensation, we read the passing thought, the controlling motives.

But while admiring the author's genius and enjoying her intimate acquaintance with the human heart, one may still inquire, "Cui bono?" What is the actual benefit we derive from all this? Of the two works, I prefer "Adam Bede," as the more complete, for this reason: every character accurately drawn from breathing nature, either holds up before us some beautiful truth in a strong, clear light, or conveys some never to be forgotten practical lesson. I would like to see it in the hands of every young man, of every young woman, where our language is read. They will find in it no incentives to a sinful or sinless existence, but many to a pure, earnest life. Vice and virtue are not blended by scarcely perceptible shadings, but there is ever a nice discrimination of the dividing line. And the varied scenes, from the festive hall to the cool sweet dairy; from the grand old park, with the glimmering sunlight and deep shadows, to the green-robed fields shelving down to the old black-pool, over which darker thoughts are brooding; from the rich fields full of promise to the skillful agriculturist, to the bleak hillsides of the miner's home; all these are so many landscapes of varied coloring for the mind's picture-gallery. And the portraits are never to be forgotten, because taken from life, and breathing into our souls some of life's needed lessons; from the wee pet nelvoly peeping into your pocket, to the pastor's stately mother, and the stern, selfish old man shrinking from the waiting grave. Among all the rare touches of female loveliness, where will you find a face that will win its quiet sure way to the heart of the strong and gentle, of the rough and the refined, like the sweet "lily face" of Dinah Morris, with the pure, warm, earnest soul, looking calmly out through the love-shedding gray eyes.

"The Mill on the Floss" is the work of a true artist, in its nice perception and analysis of character, in its felicitous discription of natural scenes, and the familiar incidents of real life. The "Dodson family" form a group of graphic sketches with which we feel more or less familiar. I am quite certain that I stopped a few weeks with Maggie's mother. Not that she kept a boarding-house. O, no. That would ill comport with the dignity of the Dodson family. But she would "accommodate a friend" if the liberal purse was ready; or, like "Miss Simmons," "take a stranger in," with the same proviso. A most admirable body in every way, in her own estimation. In "Adam Bede," one of the prevalent vices of the day is handled most delicately, and with loving pity for the consequent suffering, while it is held up to just censure. In the "Mill on the Floss," principle is made to take its own high position, and to resist the strongest passion of the human heart. Maggie, withstanding the strong pressure of circumstance, the tender force of inclination, lest she outrage the claims of friendship, and break the ties of nature, is a profitable study for young ladies romantically inclined. And from the unrest, the painful, passionate yearnings of Maggie, and the discontented gloom of Tom, we can turn to the serene joyful trust and calm life of gentle Lucy, as we turn from the fierce heat of noonday, or from the devastating storm, to repose and refresh our thoughts on some quiet landscape, some sweet-eyed violet that scatters fragrance and a pervading but half unconscious sense of beauty all around. With the exception of Dr. Kenn, there is little knowledge of practical piety among the country people of the "Mill on the Floss," and we greatly fear that similar neighborhoods might be found in our own land. Maggie, after long groping in the darkness, and striving painfully after the light, finds her way, at last, into the clear beams of God's presence.

Very different from all these is Havilah in "El Furcidis," a rarely strong and noble character, but a true woman in all her emotions, in all her active goodness. You perceive that the only true knowledge has taken deep root in her being, and filled her eyes with a soul-searching light, for she shrinks from a union with one who has not this inner higher life—this moving principle that glows and purifies, strengthens and enlightens. Can any thing be more beautiful than the scene in which the mother pleades the suit of the English lord? Can any thing be truer to the unerring instincts of a woman's guileless soul than Havilah's reply? Let every mother, every daughter, read this chapter. It touches the full significance of the true marriage so often ignored. How often will you now find a Christian maiden, who, appreciating the wisdom, the generosity, the blended firmness and gentleness of a handsome suitor, who besides possesses a proud name, and princely wealth, will not stifle her native convictions, and accept the proffered hand? Havilah could not love him, and she shrank from acting the gilded and world-permitted lie, for he lacked one thing to enhance the value of all his rare possessions, to be the crowning glory of his wisdom and virtues. Havilah is a noble creation. In her, the lithe symmetrical frame, the gifted intellect, the glowing heart, the God-linked soul, have found a full, an almost perfect development.

But some dear scrupulous soul may say, "Do not tell me anything about them. Are they not novels?"

Not so fast, dear friend. You and I would never condescend to read one of the trashy stories, the merely sensation novels, the extremely light literature that is so voraciously devoured by the "fast" men and women, the "fast" girls and boys everywhere; that is even smuggled into respectable seminaries, into pious families who have vetoed all novels, and will not make a selection of what is really excellent for the eager young minds that will read stories in some form. Answer me truly, you who condemn works of fiction as a whole, do you not have a keen relish for a choice dish of gossip served up with savory condiments? Is it not palatable? Is it not a most delightful tonic? Do you not forget fatigue, forget care, forget your private griefs, in listening to the account of some noble deed or some simple generous action, some struggle with a fierce temptation and the final triumph? Do you not sometimes amuse yourself in dissecting character, in weighing the motives, or imagining them? You perceive (I am not addressing those who, in their cruel selfish gossiping, seek to make good evil, and to affix a stain to purity itself), you watch the development of the living tragedy, or the progression of a nicely involved plot, with absorbing interest. "But you know the characters, you know the events to be facts." Are they so? Is gossip ever wholly true? Does not the imagination clothe the meagre skeleton with throbbing flesh and fancy drape it? But it is only when fictitious works are sketches drawn "to the life" of men and women living here and there, all around us, with the same throbbing, earnest, struggling, suffering, or rejoicing hearts like our own, like those we have met or may meet, that they are worthy of attention. Not always then. But when vice veiled in the garb of beauty, and honor, and pleasure, is revealed in all its naked deformity, is it not a startling lesson to such as are just entering, perhaps half unconsciously entering, the flowery path of evil? And when you read of some noble deed, some beautiful trait of character, some story of life-long devotion and sacrifice, some struggle to attain the true and pure, is not the heart made better, the thoughts elevated by dwelling on the sublime and accomplished purpose? We need these lessons, these living, inspiring truths constantly repeated for ourselves, for others.

Let us, then, turn a deaf ear to the vulgar gossip that would pollute the purest fame, that leaves its own black impress on the minds of every one who listens to or repeats it, and dwell on the noble earnest souls of "Adam Bede," and Dinah Morris, on the symmetrical character of Havilah, or on any others whose perusal may aid or cheer the steps of love and duty.

REMARKABLE CONVERSIONS.

Several papers, from different pens, in different sections of country, were placed in our hands for publication last winter, by Rev. Jefferson Hamilton, D.D. We published some of them at the time, and now publish another one.

In 1831 there lived in the village of Darlington, S.C., two highly respectable gentlemen between whom existed a distant relationship. Capt. John Gibson was a man of noble parts; tall, and well proportioned, though rather too rotund, perhaps. His countenance was expressive of kindness, mildness, firmness. Moses Saunders, Esq., was not unlike his kinsman in form and face, so far as general outline of person and expression were concerned. Neither had what would be regarded a handsome face, but taking in the entire contour; any one observant of human nature would have had no hesitancy in deciding that each was a Southern gentleman worthy of the country he called his own. An Englishman would say that each was a fine old English gentleman, living rurally, yet with elegant comfort, on his broad acres among a contented tenantry. Nor would after acquaintance lead to any change in the opinion so formed. Each occupied an elegant mansion, and Hospitality made her abode with each. Capt. Gibson's wife would have graced a court, and could have been at ease in a cottage. She had the dignity of one born to rule, and the grace and gentleness which precluded all embarrassment in her presence. She was a pious, devoted christian. O she was a noble woman! Mrs Saunders had a kind, gentle expression, but no other personal prestige. She was almost a bundle, one would say; but what a bundle of simplicity, and sweetness and kindness!

A feud existed between these two high-minded men—a feud originating in the most trivial difference imaginable, but which seemed destined to be as permanent as the life of the parties. They did not seem disposed to injure each other in any way, but a perfect non-intercourse existed, and the mediation and efforts of mutual friends had been made or tendered in vain. With every one in the village, except each other, these gentlemen were on terms of kindness, and it was a sorrow generally that they could not or would not be reconciled. Reconciliation was a triumph reserved to the power of the gospel, and it may be interesting to trace at least some of the steps leading to the gracious conversion of these two men.

The ministry of the word in the Methodist village church had been in "demonstration of the spirit and of power" on different occasions through the early part of the year named—1831. On one of these occasions the preacher was led to condemn sinful amusements, the congregation appearing to be in a very solemn mood. This, however, gave offense to a young man, the son of Capt. Gibson, and a chief leader in such courses as the pulpit was at the time censuring. He rose, and as indignantly as possible stalked out of the church. Not one followed him. He remarked afterward (for he too was converted) that he knew that day that there was an unusual influence in the assembly, else a dozen or more would have followed him. He went home with the sneering reflection, "well, I suppose we are going to have a revival!"

A week later, at a two days' meeting near Capt. Gibson's plantation, where the family marooned for the occasion, the preacher was favored with divine unction and the word was in power. Capt. G. was present and felt its full force, up to deep awakening. Shortly after this a four days' meeting was held at Darlington, where, it will be remembered, Mr. Saunders and Capt Gibson resided. The awakening influence which affected Capt. Gibson had affected somewhat deeply Mr. Saunders also, but without any very special manifestion till Sunday morning. The sermons on the occasion had been very telling; and, as the result showed, were carried home to many a conscience by the Holy Ghost. These two men applied for admission into love feast, each knowing nothing of the other's intention. What a "time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord" we had in that love feast! At its close persons were invited to come forward and join the Church. Mr. Saunders moved into the aisle with his usual measured tread, his countenance all aglow, the index of a heart exclaiming as it were, in one breath, "God be merciful to me a sinner!"—"I will go in the strength of the Lord God!" His wife, her face beaming with lines and points of rapturous expression, from the simple, intense feelings of her gentle heart, joined him, and, she leaning on the stalwart man who had long been her protection and her pride, both advanced toward the altar. But he was trembling now—all unwont to tremble—and so was she; for glad as her poor heart was that her husband was about to be saved, that at last the long prayed for event had come, and he and she were setting out together for heaven, she felt the guilt of sin, and groaned to be set free. Capt. Gibson, the while, was sitting against the wall scarcely conscious of aught around, his head bowed and his heart melted into contrition, and tears flowing from his eyes. Thus, while Saunders approached the altar, his face the index of fixed determination, yet of utter self-despair, Gibson trembled also, broken, dissolved, and for the moment seemed to feel himself unworthy even to come to Jesus. The two haughty men are humbled—humbled in each other's presence; the two bold, mighty men, who would have stood each alone against a world in opposition, are now feebler than very childhood, each confessing, "I am wrong!" and each ready to say to the other, were they face to face, "Can you forgive me?" if it were not that now each is overwhelmed with the conviction and engrossed in the confession,—"against THEE, thee only, have I sinned, and done evil in thy sight!" Mrs. Gibson could keep her place no longer. She made her way to the aisle, crossed it, and was by her husband's side before he knew that she had moved. As she took his arm and drew him up and forward, the words, "my husband!" bore to him the earnest suggestion and the full tide of affection of one of the noblest hearts that ever lived.—While the voice and the touch broke him still more, they at the same time inspired him. He rose, and leaning on rather than supporting the magnificent woman who adored him as her wedded lord, he too approached the altar, his bowed head scarcely allowing a sight of his face, her whole countenance lighted with heavenly radiance. What has been described was the transaction of a very brief period, so that the hands of Moses Saunders and his wife had scarcely been received by the minister and their names written, when the hand of John Gibson was extended and his name put on record. All knelt in prayer. Oh, it was a time of power! On rising the two great men (for they were large of body as well as big of soul) embraced each other. "Come, Saunders," said Capt. Gibson, "we will kneel again, and let these good men pray for us." That was a great and a good time; the animosity of years was uprooted in an instant and given to the winds. This too after the kindest, strongest, most prudent, and influential efforts that man could put forth had been made in vain to overcome it. Can any wonder that there was deep feeling in that Church on that day? Who would blame the worshippers if they shouted forth their exultant joy,—"Glory in God in the highest! Hallelujah! Bless the Lord, O my soul!" Who would blame them? Not Isaiah; for he exclaims, "Cry out and shout, thou inhabitant of Zion; for great is the Holy One of Israel in the midst of thee! Not the Savior; for he says to those who would silence the exultation and praise of his disciples, "I say unto you, that if these should hold their peace the stones would immediately cry out."

Mr. Saunders lived till 1839, when he closed peacefully a pious and useful career. The following fall, Capt. Gibson fell asleep in Jesus, having adorned the doctrine of God his Savior till the year 1840. Then followed Mrs. Gibson, who in 1843 died as she had lived—a Christian. Mrs Saunders was the last to pass away.—She entered into rest in 1847, leaving behind her the fragrance of a good name.

How blissful is the fellowship of these four in heaven! And how many who loved them here are pressing ardently on to rejoin them!

THE ABOLITION PLOT IN TEXAS.

Last week we gave the particulars of several destructive conflagrations in Texas—at Dallas, Denton, &c.—and ding that, as these and several attempts at incendiarism had occured on the same day, and almost at the same hour, there was no doubt of there being a regular organized band of outlaws in the State, whose object was a wholesale destruction of life and property, and, indeed, that the impression prevailed that these numerous fires were the work of Northern Abolitionists. This impression it seems was well founded. A letter dated Dallas, July 26th, published in the Houston Telegraph, gives an account of the discovery of an abolition plot for a slave insurrection and the destruction of life and property. The writer says—

"The outhouses, granaries, oats and grain of Mr. Grill Miller were destroyed a few days after the destruction of Dallas. This led to the arrest of some white men, whose innocence, however, was proved beyond a doubt. Several negroes belonging to Mr. Miller were taken up and examined, and developments of the most startling character elicited. A plot to destroy the country was revealed, and every circumstance, even to the minutiæ, detailed. Nearly, or quite, a hundred negroes have been arrested, and upon a close examination, separate and apart from each other, they deposed to the existence of a plot or conspiracy to lay waste the country by fire and assassination—to impoverish the land by the destruction of the provisions, arms, and ammunition, and then, when in a state of helplessness, a general revolt of the negroes was to begin on the first Monday in August, the day of election for State officers. The conspiracy is aided and abetted by Abolition emissaries from the North, and by those in our midst.

"The details of the plot and its modus operandi are these: Each county in Northern Texas has a supervisor in the person of a white man, whose name is not given; each county is laid off into districts under the sub-agents of this villain, by whom the firing was to be done. Many of our most prominent citizens were singled out for assassination whenever they made their escape from their burning homes. Negroes never before suspected are implicated, and the insurrectionary movement is widespread to an extent truly alarming. In some places the plan was conceived in every form shocking to the mind, and frightful in its results. Poisoning was to be added, the old females to be slaughtered along with the men, the young and handsome women to be parcelled out among these infamous scoundrels. They had even gone so far as to designate their choice, and certain ladies had already been selected as the victims of these misguided monsters.

"Fortunately, the country has been saved from the accomplishment of these horrors; but then, a fearful duty remains for us. The negroes have been incited to these infernal proceedings by Abolitionists, and the emissaries of certain preachers who were expelled from this county last year. Their agents have been busy amongst us, and many of them have been in our midst. Some of them have been identified, and have fled from the country; others still remain, to receive a fearful accountability from an outraged and infuriated people. Nearly a hundred negroes have testified that a large reinforcement of Abolitionists are expected on the 1st of August, and these to be aided by recruits from the Indians, while the Rangers are several hundred miles to the north of us. It was desired to destroy Dallas, in order that the arms and ammunition of the artillery company might share the same fate.

"Our jail is filled with the villains, many of whom will be hung, and that very soon. A man was found hung at our neighboring city of Fort Worth, two days ago, believed to be one of these scoundrels who are engaged in this work. We learned that he had stored a number of rifles, and the day after he was hung a load of six-shooters passed on to him, but were intercepted. He was betrayed by one of the gang, and hence his plans were thwarted. Many others will share his fate.

"I have never witnessed such times. We are most profoundly excited. We go armed day and night, and know not what we shall be called upon to do."

The Galveston News of the 28th furnishes further particulars, as follows:

"We learn from a gentleman, a resident of Ellis county, who left Waxahatchie on Monday last, and arrived this morning, some further details of the results of the discovery of the diabolical abolition plot, that was to sweep over Northern Texas with the incendiary's torch and murderous weapon.

"In Dallas and Ellis counties, committees composed of the coolest, steadiest and most respectable citizens, were appointed and were at work all last week investigating the whole affair. No one but those immediately interested knows the committees, nor where or when they meet, or what they are doing. Their chief object is to ascertain what whites are at the bottom of the plot. No one else interferes in the investigation.

In Ellis, the County Court has organized patrols on an extensive and well managed system.

"The negroes' confessions—made apart and at great distances—concur in the leading points; and all over white men originated the plot and directed their movements.

"They promised the negroes their liberty and their masters' goods, etc., and to lead them to Kansas; the negroes were told also that the next President would be a Northern man, who would free them all.

"The negroes concerned in Ellis county were principally of mature age and those allowed by their owners a good deal of liberty. The young ones were not allowed to participate in the plot; and many were not trusted with the secret at all. Their idea was to burn all the stores where arms and ammunition were kept; and on the election day—the 6th August when the citizens were away from their farms and houses—the negroes were to rise, seize on all arms, and, headed by their white leaders, to attack the houses here and there, murder defenseless women, burn and destroy, and finally, it is presumed, march off in a body towards Kansas.

"Waxahatchie was to have been set fire to on the 8th—the same day Dallas and so many other places were fired; but an accidental fire in the town, that day, aroused the citizens, and the negro appointed to the deed became alarmed, and left. He was to have returned and repeated the attempt last Sunday, had not the plot been discovered."

THE BRITISH PARLIAMENT AND THE MASSACRES IN SYRIA.

In the House of Lords, on the 10th ult., in reply to a question relative to the massacres in Syria, Lord Wodehouse said:

"I am afraid that, as my noble friend did not furnish me with a copy of the exact questions which he meant to ask, I may not be able to answer all of them as precisely as I should have wished; but, with regard to the general question of what information the Government have received from Syria, I am sorry to say that I can confirm entirely the lamentable accounts which he has given of the events which have taken place there. Despatches received yesterday, of recent date—I can not state what is the latest, but I remember one despatch was dated the 18th of last month—describe a state of things than which nothing can be more miserable or more deserving the compassion of all Christians. The principal places at which these outrages have taken place are Hasbeiya and Zahleh. At Hasbeiya the principal Christians were congregated together, and, having been induced to lay down their arms, they were next day attacked by the Druses, and a large portion of them massacred in the presence of the Turkish troops in the place, who do not appear to have interfered.

"Your lordships will see in the newspapers accounts of this massacre, but it is stated in one of the despatches that a considerable number of the Christians had escaped; and we therefore have reason to believe that the massacre was not so general as is represented. It seems that this massacre was not confined merely to the Christians, but that the chief of the Druses, who had commanded on that occasion, took the opportunity to revenge himself on some Mussulmans, with whom there had been a feud. It seems that at Zahleh the people made a defense, but were at last overpowered.—The Druses gained possession of the town, and committed most horrible brutalities. But there, also, a considerable number of the Christian population were able to retire before the massacre began. The general state of that country is one of the greatest confusion and disturbance. How the feud originated is at present almost a matter of doubt, for not only does it spring from the hereditary hatred of the Druses against the Maroultes, but the Druses are joined by other tribes, to some extent, by the Mussulman population generally.

"The Turkish authorities are much to be blamed for not having taken active measures. The Turkish troops in the neighborhood of Zahleh took no steps to put down the disorder, and nothing to resist the Druses. The only excuse is that practically they are powerless.—There is a great want of troops, and their authority is altogether disregarded by the mountaineers. The Embassadors of the different Powers met together some weeks ago, and agreed to send instructions to their Consuls in Syria to communicate with the Turkish Pashas, and to endeavor to induce them to take some active measures. We have not received the information, but intelligence has reached France that a Pasha has been sent with extensive powers to put down rebellion, that reinforcements of troops have also been sent, and that efforts will be made to restore order.

"The latest account is from the Consul at Damascus, who thinks that apprehension is not altogether well founded, although it is only right to say that there are other persons who take a different view; but it is his opinion that Damascus will not undergo the same horrors which have occurred in other towns, and that it will be able to resist all attacks which may be made upon it. My noble friend asks whether we can lay the papers on the subject on the table of the House. I have not had an opportunity of communicating with my noble friend at the head of the Foreign Office, but I do not think it likely that there will be any objection to their production. With regard to the steps which have been taken by her Majesty's Government, as soon as intelligence reached us, before the latest accounts, orders were sent to Admiral Martin to proceed with a squadron to the coast of Syria, to take such steps as might be necessary for the protection of British subjects. We are informed that the French Government has sent some ships of war for the same purpose to that coast, and that there are also vessels there belonging to Russia and other Powers. Her majesty's Government has been in communication with the Governments of Turkey, Russia, Prussia, Austria and France as to the measures which will become necessary."

THE FUNERAL OF JOSEPH GALES.

The National Intelligencer, of the 26th ult., thus records the funeral of its late chief editor:

"The funeral of Mr. Gales on Tuesday, was an event which it was the desire of the people of Washington, without distinction of classes or sentiment, should be marked with an expression of the deep and sincere veneration and esteem in which they held the deceased. Besides the tokens of respect on the part of all the branches of the City Government, many citizens made individual indication of their sense of the general loss. All the booksellers of the city kept their stores closed for the day, and some private citizens draped their houses in the habiliments of mourning. Notices of the deceased, couched in terms of the kindest remembrance, were prominent in the columns of all the city press.

"At the late residence of Mr. Gales, and where he has held his home for the past twenty-five years, a very numerous assemblage of ladies and gentlemen were gathered to witness the last services in the presence of the remains of their venerated and respected friend. The President of the United States was there, and nearly the whole of the City Government, many of the officers of the General Government, and most of the leading citizens of the Federal Metropolis. In the course of the afternoon a numerous deputation from the City Council of Alexandria came up to participate in the last honors to one for whom the people of that ancient and honorable town have invariably entertained an almost unlimited regard. Owing to the lateness of the hour at which the arrangements of the funeral were completed, the Alexandria delegation, with great regret to themselves, were compelled to return to Alexandria without taking a place in the procession.

"At the head of the procession, which passed at a slow pace from Eckington to Fourth street, and thence by New York avenue to Seventh street, and down that street past the office of the National Intelligencer, to Pennsylvania avenue, was the Columbia Typographical Society, on foot. After them followed the employes of the office of this paper, interspersed with other citizens, also on foot. The cortege in carriages came next, conveying the officiating clergy, the Rev. Drs. C. M. Butler, Pyne, and Hall, who had conducted the services at Eckington, Dr. Thos. Miller, the family physician, the hearse, the family and friends of the deceased, the members of the City Councils, and the citizens of both sexes. The pall-bearers were Gen. Walter Jones, Gen. R. C. Wolghtman, Richard S. Coxe, Thos. L. Smith, William L. Hodge, James M. Carlisle, William B. Lee, and James O. Welling.

"The City Hall was draped in mourning, as were also the office of the National Intelligencer and the club rooms of the Bell and Everett Association of this city, and suspended above the hall door of the latter was a large photograph likeness of the lamented deceased, enshrouded in black crape; and business was suspended for the day, the members feeling that they had lost a noble leader and an unerring counsellor. The office of the Congressional Globe, the residence of the Swedish Minister, and the hotel of Mr. Casparis were also enshrouded with emblems of mourning.

"As the procession passed the Intelligencer office the firemen's bells tolled, and the scene was witnessed by many hundreds of persons who had gathered at an early hour in the afternoon for that purpose, all indicating the deep hold which Mr. Gales had on the popular heart.

"The procession reached the Congregational Cemetery about 7 o'clock, and as the sun departed serenely from a bright sky, the remains of the beloved friend and benefactor were deposited in the grave, the clods reminding the spectators, amid the solemn words of the officiating ministers, that this was but the consummation of the 'Dust to dust, ashes to ashes,' but also assuring all that there is a resurrection and a life to come."

INTERESTING INCIDENT IN THE HISTORY OF TWO PUBLIC MEN.

In the fall of 1843, a young man twenty nine years of age, who had served two years as a member of the Senate of his State, being without property or influential friends, concluded to take a trip to the west, and perhaps remain in that section of our country. He left his State in October, and took the route by the Great Lakes to Chicago, with a trunk full of law books, a spare suit of clothes, and about sixty dollars in his pocket. After stopping one week at Chicago, he went to Joliet, about forty miles distant. He there met a gentleman from the south west about his own age. An acquaintance immediately sprung up between them, and the New Englander was advised by his new friend to accompany him to Missouri. He did so, travelling over-land to head of navigation on the Illinois river, thence down the river to St. Louis, and thence to "north east Missouri," about 250 miles up the river Mississippi

New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Terms—$2 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 8, 1860.

Only $1 00 for the Advocate from the first Number in July till the end of the Year.

PAY TO THE END OF THE YEAR.

We have made out, and sent out, all our accounts, to the end of the present year. Many have responded and paid up, but many have failed to do so. The object we have in writing these lines is, to call upon all who have not paid up to the end of the year, to do so immediately, by remittance to the office, or by payment to our agents. The year is more than half gone, and yet we have much to collect of our accounts, and to clear off books, between this and January next. This work we must accomplish. Come friends, you have received your accounts, through the paper or through the preacher; the amount is not large in each case; pay up to the end of the year, and let us all begin even again.

THE COMING KINGDOM OF ITALY.

The great republic of the United States was born in a day, and the coming constitutional kingdom of Italy has come to the birth. It is not the "Sicilian question," nor the "Roman question," but the "Italian question," which is now the principal problem in the politics of Europe. The success of Sardinia, assisted by France, against Austria, and the success of Garibaldi in Sicily, are but preliminaries in the great revolution, which, we trust, is to result in Italian nationality and independence. Sicily is already virtually free; Naples will follow; then the remaining States of the Church; and then Venetia. Everything promises, and points to, this glorious consummation. The great body of the Italian people are as thoroughly imbued, as enthusiastically inspired with the idea of national independence and unity, as were the Americans at the time of the Declaration of Independence. They have wise, brave, and patriotic leaders, in council and in arms. Victor Emmanuel, brave, frank, chivalrous and discreet; at once the very beau ideal of a constitutional king and a patriotic leader; already at the head of a compact and popular government, partly constituted of Italian provinces rescued from the tyranny of Austria and Rome; is almost boundlessly popular wherever the blood of Italy flows, or the language of Italy is spoken. Count Cavour, his Prime Minister and confidential counsellor, is astute as Metternich, and as politic and invincibly persistent as Louis Napoleon. And Garibaldi is as brave and incorruptible a patriot and military leader as ever lived. Although an "outsider" apparently, and although his course in Sicily is officially disavowed by the Sardinian government, yet he is to be the real active instrument in the accomplishment of Italian independence. Whatever may be his official rewards, or otherwise, his name will take rank in history in the same class with that of Washington.

With such political and military leadership, and such a unanimity of national sentiment, it seems impossible that the Italian cause can fail. There is no doubt of the ability to overthrow the resistance of Naples and Rome. The most difficult task will be to rescue Venetia from the power of Austria, which, though defeated, humbled, and immensely in debt, has a powerful and well-disciplined army, equal in numbers and equipments to any in Europe. Louis Napoleon will prevent the interference of Austria in the affairs of Naples and Rome, and will probably not interfere himself, except to guarantee the "Eternal City" to the Pope as a residence. But even united Italy will have a tremendous struggle when she comes to measure arms, single-handed, with the overwhelming military force of Austria. But, if not interfered with by other Powers, she will ultimately succeed. She has the open sympathy of England and the United States, and money, munitions and volunteers will continue to pour in to her help. The greatest cause of anxiety, with many, is as to what may be the course of Louis Napoleon. He has more weight, and is more feared, in the politics of Europe, than all the other diplomatists and crowned heads combined. Should he oppose the programme of Italian unity, its accomplishment would be hindered, if not prevented. The world may yet find out, however, that he is the prime mover in the whole affair, and that the whole scheme now being developed originated in his brain before he commenced the war with Austria as the ally of Sardinia. In that war he went far enough to assure the continuance and ultimate success of the Italian movement, without becoming responsible for it himself. This has been our opinion from the beginning. He may, however, and we think will, seek some addition to his own dominions, without materially violating the plan of Italian unity. Should the revolution finally succeed, Victor Emmanuel, who, a few years since, was at the head of a little kingdom of little more than a million population, and who, by the annexation of Lombardy, Modena, Parma, Tuscany and the Romagna, increased the population of his kingdom to eleven millions, will become the head of a nation of twenty-seven millions. He will not only have become a great monarch, as the head of a great national Power, but he will have become a great man, as the champion of the independence and unity of an ancient and renowned people, long divided, degraded, and enslaved. And all this will have been accomplished simply by his having espoused the cause of the liberties of the people, instead of following the absurd and decaying precedents and traditions of the despotic dynasties by which he has been surrounded. He is not only the representative of civil, but also of religious liberty in Italy. In that fair but blighted land, where a priestly despotism has for so many centuries crushed out every pulsation of freedom of conscience, the government of Sardinia has already set a noble example, in breaking this intolerable yoke, and allowing all men "freedom to worship God." The whole christian world should pray for his success in placing all Italy in the same blessed condition, and in breaking down that hated political power of Rome, which, from the days of the pagan emperors until now, has been "drunk with the blood of the saints." And the fact that the sagacious and powerful Louis Napoleon sympathizes with him, should give us hope for religious liberty in France, and elsewhere.—The time is coming for the liberation of the conscience of the world.

NEW ORLEANS AND THE TEXAS RAILROADS.

In a short time New Orleans will be connected with a railroad system west of her, the importance of which is now but inadequately imagined. The Opelousas R.R. is already completed and running to Berwick's Bay, 80 miles. By the first of July next it will be completed to New Iberia, 45 miles further, 125 miles from New Orleans. Here it meets the Texas and New Orleans road, which extends through Louisiana to the Sabine river, 116 miles, and thence through Texas to Houston, 106 miles—222 miles in all, and 347 miles from New Orleans. The Texas division will be completed during the present year, and the Louisiana division will be completed during 1861. At Houston it strikes, almost at right angles, the line of railroad now running from Galveston through Houston to the distance of 120 miles from the former place. The first branch of this line is the Galveston, Houston and Henderson road, now completed from Galveston to Houston, 50 miles. The second branch is the Houston and Texas Central road, completed 70 miles. By August, 1861, the latter road will be completed to the distance of 125 miles, and will ultimately reach Red River, running due North through the heart of Texas. It will be a great feeder to the New Orleans road.

The H. and T. Central Railroad will have for its feeder the Washington County Railroad, extending from Hempstead (50 miles above Houston) to Brenham, 22 miles, into one of the richest portions of Texas. Eleven miles of this road are already completed, the grading done, with ties and rails on hand for the balance, only awaiting the erection of the Brazos river bridge, now building.

From Brenham to Austin, 62 miles, the Air Line Railroad Company are now calling for proposals for construction, and as their private subscription is large, the early completion of their road is beyond doubt.

The next feeder is the Buffalo Bayou, Brazos and Colorado Railroad, which crosses the Brazos river, at Richmond; thence extends to Columbus, on the Colorado, 80 1-2 miles from Harrisburg; thence to LaGrange, 28 miles; and thence to Austin, about 140 miles from Houston.

From Columbus, on the Colorado river, another road will run to Gonzales and San Antonio, about 125 miles, and it is expected that 25 miles of this road will be built during 1861. The total distance from New Orleans to San Antonio will be about 550 miles, and there can be but little doubt of the ultimate extension thence to Guaymas, and also to Mazatlan, of this route from New Orleans to San Antonio; thus developing a Southern Pacific Railroad route. The entire distance from New Orleans to the Pacific would be about 1300 miles; the route would afford a lucrative way business throughout its whole length, and its terminal on the Mississippi and upon the Pacific coast, would be accessible to shipping—a very important consideration.

It remains to notice the Houston Tap and Brazoria railway, commencing at Houston and extending to Columbia, on the Brazos river, and thence to Wharton. The H. Tap and B. R. R., is finished to Columbia, 30 miles, and this portion of the route traverses the rich sugar district of Oyster creek.

It is expected that this road will be completed to Wharton, 88 miles, by the 1st of January, 1861, and from Columbia it is contemplated to extend it to Matagorda. The Texas railways radiating from Houston, and the completion of that of the Texas and New Orleans Company to Iberia, where it will unite with the N. O., Opelousas and Great Western, open at once to New Orleans about 750 miles of finished railway.

THE ANGLO-FRENCH WAR IN CHINA.

It seems almost a certainty, now, that there will be war between China, and England and France. It is said also that, while England and France are approaching Pekin from the East and South, a corps of 12,000 Russians is marching from the North on the same point. What the result of such a war will be it is difficult to predict. Though utterly inferior, in everything necessary to military success, to their antagonists, yet, with such an immense population, and with the willingness of the Chinese authorities to sacrifice any number of human lives, together with the fact that the Anglo-French force is far removed from home, there is no calculating the difficulty and loss that may be necessary in bringing this strange people to terms. They are not as warlike as the rebels against British rule in India, but they are more crafty and more numerous; and then, they have a stable government, while the British have no footing nor prestige on the soil, as they had in India. We believe, however, that the arrogance and hypocrisy of the Chinese are about to receive such a humiliation and punishment as they have never had before. And truly, while we regret the war, yet, as it is necessary, we trust this stronghold of oriental darkness and cruelty will have its power broken for ever. With nearly half the population of the entire globe, it has not made one step in real human progress for thousands of years, and promises nothing for the future. Neither the national character nor the national government has a single trait or tendency which commands the respect or inspires the hope of the civilized world. China is important only in view of her tremendous power for evil over nearly one-half of our race. A lying, thieving, treacherous and cruel nation and government, it will be for the good of the world, and her own future welfare, if she be chastised into decency, and be made by force and fear to observe those principles and duties which honor and truth do not influence her to respect. We trust it may be done with little bloodshed, but we hope she may be humbled. The punishment of the Chinese government for its violations of international faith and truth, will do more to inspire the Chinese people with respect for those virtues than all other influences combined for a century to come. We rather think that the diplomacy of the British has been somewhat hasty and dictatorial, but they have had numberless vexations and exasperations. Although they are not ignorant of virtue, there is neither truth, faith, nor honor in the Chinese. They are a civilized people, but with all the vices and none of the virtues of civilization. In China, half the population of the globe is locked up in the prison-house of selfishness, a prey to themselves and their own vices. It is too large a portion of the race to be buried alive, mentally and morally, until the day of judgment. If nothing but war will break their prison-bars, and we believe nothing else will, then let it come. The world will be in better health after it is over.

THE VIRUS OF ABOLITIONISM.

Can any unprejudiced man doubt, after contemplating the John Brown raid, the recent conspiracy for fire and assassination in Texas, and the recent Occoquan disturbance in Virginia, together with the long-continued and shameful operations of the "under-ground railroad," in which even statesmen, clergymen, literary men, and intelligent citizens have been engaged; can any man doubt that abolitionism is a sort of mental and moral poison? The greatest nation, and the most glorious government in the world, is distracted and endangered by one element alone—abolitionism. A union of sovereign States, under a common Constitution, protecting the rights of each member, and providing a strong and dignified general government, a model and a praise in all the world, is endangered, and rendered doubtful at home and abroad, by one only element of discord—abolitionism. The North and the South are mutually helpful; the North needs the cotton of the South, and the South needs the manufactures of the North; they should be bound together by all ties, not only of nationality and patriotism, but also of mutual interest; and this is prevented by one cause alone—abolitionism. Commerce, christianity, civilization, are dependent for the present rapidity of their progress upon cotton, and cotton is dependent upon African slavery; slavery is a blessing to the world—one of the mightiest instruments of Providence; and nothing prevents its full development and fruition but—abolitionism. Slavery is the highest state of civilization the negro has ever enjoyed in the history of the world. In Africa he is a brute; in the so-called free States he is a beggar and an outcast. In the slave States, he has a home; is well fed and well clothed; has the protection of the law; has friends and associations among the most refined of the land; has religious instruction, and his family without poverty or care. He is the happiest laborer in the world. Capital cannot oppress him. He is fitted for his relation. He is no more oppressed in his feelings by subjection to his master than are white men by civil and social law. Had there been no abolitionism, no agitation, no so-called free States, and consequently no delicacy surrounding the "institution," he would, by this time, have begun to enjoy the blessings of education. Slavery is the only condition of his progress, and abolitionism is the only incubus upon that progress. The success of abolitionism can only ruin him, in addition to the ruin of the country. And yet, in addition to the destruction of peace between the North and the South, by an agitation which has disgraced the country in the eyes of the world, emissaries are constantly endeavoring to form conspiracies for insurrection and civil war. If there is a single element of madness lacking in abolitionism, we cannot discover it. It blasts everything it touches—the senate, the pulpit, the fireside—the taste, the intellect, the conscience. And moderate anti-slaveryism lends to the delirium tremens of abolitionism, just as certainly as moderate drinking leads to the delirium tremens of drunkenness.

A LITERARY LIFE.

Messrs. Ticknor and Fields have just published "Memorials of Thomas Hood," collected, arranged and edited by his daughter, Mrs. Frances Freeling Broderip, and with a Preface and Notes by his son, Thos. Hood, who is also a writer of some reputation in England. The work is in two volumes, and is illustrated with numerous sketches in Hood's quaint, funny style.

When it was first announced that the children of him "who sang the song of the shirt," were preparing some final memorials of his life, we feared, not unreasonably, considering the frequent dullness of such works of love, that they would give the public a book which, dull in itself, would not be of value even as a further exposition of the character of their father. But nothing could be done in better taste than these very interesting volumes; as a biography they are complete, affording a most satisfactory view of the man, as he lived, and worked, and suffered; as a collection of unpublished writings of Hood, they are most valuable and welcome, and form a most readable addition to his many published works—which, by the way, have been collected with more care and kept in print longer in the United States than in his own England.

The editors of these volumes have wisely chosen to make their lamented father as much as possible his own biographer. He seems, notwithstanding his constant labors, to have been a "good correspondent," as boarding school misses term it; and his letters to various friends make up the bulk of these volumes. These are connected only by brief and judicious comments of the editors, and by such short quotations from his unknown fugitive writings as are apposite and welcome, because we learn here for the first time the occasions which drew out these "occasional pieces."

To the sympathetic reader these memorials are very sad. They show a gentle and manly spirit, engaged in an almost hopeless struggle with fortune—and doing his battle manfully against the fearful odds of almost constant ill health, repeated pecuniary losses, and often disappointments. It is pleasant to know, that, unlike most literary men of his time, Hood was from first to last a "family man." He loved his home, lived in it, and enjoyed there, with his wife and children, whatever fortune gave him. When, in nearly the last year of his life, he was once persuaded out to a dinner, he shows plainly how unused he is to pleasures in which his beloved wife does not share.

In all his many years' sickness, his was always the most cheerful face and heart in the house. It is curious to find how little exaggerated or out of his usual tone were his most laughable pieces of published fun. He had no need to "grind out" his quips and puns; they came naturally.

What, be it remembered to his honor, that writing in a style which oftener and more readily than any other glided into low buffoonery, or vulgar profanity, no word he ever wrote would bring the blush of shame to the most delicate cheek—no word but any mother may place in the hands of her best loved child without fear of harm. Few professional writers can say as much.—With a wit as brilliant as Swift's, a humor as bright and much more sweet than Sterne's, he never abused his great powers.

That Hood was a man of genius few will deny at the present day. The mere vehicle in which he conveyed his thoughts, the puns, the quips, the oddities, the uproarious fun—these, though perhaps the most widely appreciated, are the least parts of him. Beneath all runs a vein of tender sadness, of deep and ready sympathy with all sorrows and all wrongs, which was the soul of the man, and which, as in the Song of the Shirt, in the Bridge of Sighs, in the Dream of Eugene Aram, and other pieces, gives him his title to a place among the greatest and finest minds and hearts of our century. To this place nothing will do more to help him than the glimpses of the inner life of the man which we get from these charming volumes. For here we see that not only was he a writer of very extraordinary powers, but he was also a true man, faithful husband, loving father, cheerful companion, bearing the numerous ills of his life with unfailing patience, uttering no complaint of "unappreciated toils," such as fancied genius troubles its friends with—such as Lamartine is now boring a disgusted world with.

We have little space left for an account of the life here revealed. Hood's father was a bookseller in London, where he himself was born on the 23d of May, 1798. He lost his father in his thirteenth year, and picked up a pretty good education—English and Arithmetic, Latin and French—before he was fifteen, when he took a clerkship in the office of a Russia merchant in London, but his health failing, was sent to Dundee, a seaport in Scotland, and read a good deal in the two years he remained there. Returning to London in good health, he was apprenticed to an engraver, but at the age of 22 was seduced into the literary profession, by an offer to act as sub-editor of the London Magazine, a famous periodical some forty years ago, in which Charles Lamb published his Essays by Elia, Carlyle his life of Schiller, and De Quincey his Confessions of an English Opium-Eater. While in Scotland he had written for one or two local publications.

Mr. Hood's marriage was a happy one. His wife had a cultivated taste, and he had such confidence in her judgment that he read and re-read and corrected with her all he wrote. Many of his articles were first dictated to her, and her ready memory supplied him with references and quotations. In his latest years her time and thoughts were entirely devoted to him, and he became restless and almost seemed unable to write unless she were near.

From the date of his connection with the London Magazine to his death in 1845, he made literature his profession. In 1835 the failure of a publisher's firm involved him in debt. He had to go to Germany to live economically, having determined not (as too many would have done) to wipe off his debts by a passage through the bankrupt court, but to pay off all. He says of himself in a private letter, speaking of himself in the third person:

"Emulating the illustrious example of Sir Walter Scott, he determined to try whether he could not score off his debts as effectually and more creditably with his pen than with the legal whitewash or a wet sponge. He had aforetime realized in one year a sum equal to the amount in arrear, and there was consequently fair reason to expect that by redoubled diligence, economizing, and escaping costs at law, he would soon be able to retrieve his affairs. With these views, leaving every shilling behind him, derived from the sale of his effects, the means he carried with him being an advance upon his future labors, he voluntarily expatriated himself, and bade his native land good night."

In 1840 he returned to England, broken in health, but with a gallant spirit, as this extract proves:

"You will be gratified to hear that, without any knowledge of it on my part, the Literary Fund (the members of the Committee having frequently inquired about my health, and the B—— Business, of Dilke), unanimously voted me £50, the largest sum they give, and setting aside their standing rules, to do it without my application. I, however, returned it (though it would have afforded me some ease and relief), but for many and well weighed reasons. I am, however, all the better for the offer, which places me in a good position. It was done in a very gratifying and honorable manner, and I am the first who has said 'no.' But I am in good spirits and hope to get through all my troubles as independently as heretofore."

When he published his first book, "Whims and Oddities," he dedicated it to the reviewers, in the following epigram:

"What is a modern poet's fate?
To write his thoughts upon a slate;
The critic spits on what is done,
Gives it a wipe—and all is gone!"

In 1831 he made the acquaintance of the Duke of Devonshire, by furnishing him with a series of mock titles, for a set of sham books, for a library door. Some of the titles are both humorous and curious—"On the Lung Arne in Consumption. By D. Cline." "The Racing Calender, with the Eclipses of 1831." "On Cutting off Heirs with a Shilling. By Barber Beaumont." "Percy Vere. In 40 vols." "Tadpoles; or, Tales out of my own Head." "Macintosh, Macculloch, and Macaulay on Almack's." "On the Site of Tully's Offices." "On Sore Throats and the Migration of the Swallow. By T. Abernethy." "Life of Jack Ketch, with Cuts of his own Execution," &c. &c.

"The death of kings is easily explained,
And thus it might upon his tomb be chiselled—
'As long as Will the Fourth could reign he reigned,
And then he sizzled.'"

Another on Prince Albert's breaking in through the ice when skating, Her Majesty pulling him out with her own hands:

"Long life and hard frosts to the fortunate Prince,
And for many a skating may Providence spare him;
For surely his accident served to convince
That the Queen dearly loved, tho' the ice couldn't bear him."

Dr. Elliott, his physician, had a party on May 23d, 1841. Hood, dangerously ill at the time, wrote:

"A pleasant party to you. To-day is my birth-day—forty-five,—but I can't tell you how old I feel; enough to be your grandfather at least, and give you advice! viz.: don't over-polka yourself."

EPIGRAM ON DR. ROBERT ELLIOTT.

Whatever Doctor Robert's skill be worth,
One hope within me still is stout and hearty,
He would not kill me till the 24th,
For fear of my appearing at his party!

Yet another:

EPIGRAM.

My heart's wound up just like a watch,
As far as springs will take;
It wants but one more evil turn,
And then the cords will break!

Of his sufferings in illness in a strange land, (for he never liked Germany, or indeed any place but England) he wrote this humorous account:

"Denied beef, I had Bulwer and Cowper; forbidden mutton, there was Lamb; and in lieu of pork, the great Bacon, or Hogg. Then as to beverage; it was hard, doubtless, for a Christian to set his face, like a Turk, against the juice of the grape. But eschewing wine, I had still my Butler, and in the absence of liquor, all the Choice Spirits from Browne to Tom Moore. Thus though confined physically to the drink that drowns kittens, I quaffed mentally, not merely the best of our own home-made, but the rich, racy, sparkling growths of France and Italy, of Germany and Spain; the champagne of Moliere, the Monte Pulciano of Boccaccio, the hock of Schiller, and the sherry of Cervantes. Depressed bodily by the fluid that damps everything, I got intellectually elevated with Matton, a little merry with Swift, or rather jolly with Rabelais, whose Pantagruel, by the way, is equal to the best gruel with rum in it."

Of his constant love and appreciation of his wife these volumes have many evidences. Here is a touching little poem, written to her when they had been long married:

Those eyes that were so bright, love,
Have now a dimmer shine,—
But all they've lost in light, love,
Was what they gave to mine:
But still those orbs reflect, love,
The beams of former hours,—
That riper'd all my joys, my love,
And tinted all my flowers.

Those locks were brown to see, love,
That now are turned to gray,—
But for one it bore the care, love,
That spoiled a sunny brow.
And though no longer there, love,
The gloss it had of yore,—
Still Memory looks and dotes, my love,
Where Hope admired before.

When the end of all drew near, he was resigned. He worked to the last. Here is his last poem, written when, as he said, he stood so near death's door he could hear it creak:

STANZAS:

Farewell Life! my senses swim;
And the world is growing dim;
Thronging shadows cloud the light,
Like the advent of the night—
Colder, colder, colder still—
Upward steals a vapor chill—
Strong the earthy odor grows—
I smell the Mould above the Rose.

Welcome Life! The Spirit strives!
Strength returns, and hope revives;
Cloudy fears and shapes forlorn
Fly like shadows at the morn—
O'er the earth there comes a bloom—
Sunny light for sullen gloom,
Warm perfume for vapors cold—
I smell the Rose above the Mould!

Long before, he had written from a sick bed:

I'm sick of gruel, and the dietetics,
I'm sick of pills, and sicker of emetics,
I'm sick of pulses' tardiness or quickness,
I'm sick of blood, its foulness or its thickness—
In short, within a word, I'm sick of sickness!

During his last illness he said once—"It's a beautiful world, and since I have been lying here, I have thought of it more and more..... I have had some very happy days while I lived in it, and I could have wished to stay a little longer. But it is all for the best, and we shall all meet in a better world." His last words were, "dying, dying," as if "glad to realize the rest implied in them." As regards Hood's religious character, his children state that he lived and died a Christian. It is easy to see the reverent and loving spirit of religion in all the records of this book. He had a loving heart; a cheerful, long-suffering spirit; and we are sorry that the editors should have printed here, and in such tone of commendation, probably the only ill natured epistle he ever wrote. The note to an old lady who persecuted him by asking him if he was an infidel. It does not sound like Hood at all, and it jars on the sweet influence and charm of the rest of the book. With this exception, we can highly commend the modesty and self-restraint of this children's offering to the memory of their lamented father.

THE DRUSE AND CHRISTIAN WAR.

The Holy Land, for a thousand years under Mohammedan rule, utmost lost to civilization, is once again attracting the attention of the christian world. The Druses and Christians, different in blood and religion, and long hating each other most heartily, have at last engaged in a war of seeming extermination. The Druses, though inferior in numbers, having a population of 70,000 to 100,000, while the Christians are near 200,000, have been victorious. More warlike than the Christians, better organized, and encouraged and assisted by the Turkish authorities and military, who should have suppressed the war at once, they have burned between one and two hundred Christian villages in Mount Lebanon and elsewhere, have murdered in cold blood between 7,000 and 8,000 men, besides those slain in battle, and have outraged and murdered women and children with more than Indian ferocity. And, at last advices, the carnage and destruction of property continued with undiminished fury. This war, first waged only against the Maronite Christians of Mount Lebanon, seems now to include all the Christians in Syria, Greeks, Catholics, and Protestants. The Turkish government, in whose dominions these atrocities have occurred, will doubtless be held responsible for them by the other European powers. It has connived at them, or been unable to repress them.—Certain it is that the Turkish troops sent to protect the christians, have deceived them, disarmed them, betrayed them into the hands of the Druses, and prevented their escape, frequently joining in the massacre. And the European powers, jealous of each other in regard to intervention in Turkey, the cause of the Crimean war, have waited, with their tardy diplomacies, until the mischief has been done.

Indeed England will be as much ashamed, in coming years, of her war, and expense of blood and treasure, in support of a heathen despotism in christian Europe, as she now is of the war waged against the liberties of the American colonies. This country, though always sympathizing with England when possible, sympathized with Russia in that war, and every succeeding year, and this Syrian out-break especially, demonstrates the correctness of that sympathy. Russia and France will swallow up Turkey at last, and every English life lost in the Crimean war will have been wasted. And, indeed, Turkey is not worthy of support. A barbarous and semi-savage nation, incapable of taking on European culture, however willing and wisely disposed the heads of the government; a heathen religion, inculcating polygamy, and all the vices of an anti-christian civilization; with a cruel and despotic government, holding in miserable subjection nearly twenty millions of Christians, allowing the fanatical Muhammedan hall of its population to constantly persecute and murder them; for such a government to be supported by the most enlightened christian nation of Europe from motives of mere jealousy and ambition, is a shame in the eyes of the christian world.

THE VIRUS OF ROMANISM.

While all true-hearted American citizens are looking with the deepest anxiety upon the struggle now going on between the Italian people on the one hand, and Popery, and Popish despotisms on the other, we have witnessed the strange spectacle of American citizens, so-called, holding meetings in different parts of the country to sympathize with the trembling despotisms, and to denounce the struggling patriots. What is the explanation of this un-American and unnatural conduct? The leaders in these demonstrations are members of the hierarchy of the Romish Church, whose dignity and emoluments are involved in the permanency of the Romish State, and who have a better prospect of being elevated to the Chair of St. Peter, or to the hat of a cardinal, or to the mitre of a bishop, than to the Presidency of the United States, or to any of the distinctions open to every American citizen. Of the Romish religion, as such, we have nothing to say.—It is a matter of conscience which we feel bound to respect. But the spirit of the Romish hierarchy, and of the Pontifical government, which cannot be separated, is utterly opposed to all national independence, all loyal citizenship, and all human progress. As a proof of this, notice the hinted attempts to murder Louis Napoleon, Victor Emmanuel, and Garibaldi—all Catholics.

Of the great clerical plot against the Sardinian Government, new ramifications are coming to light almost every day. The Espero, in its issue of June 12th, remarked:

"Domiciliary visits and arrests of priests and monks continue all over the State, and from the papers confiscated and indications gathered, it appears that the government now holds the threads of a great conspiracy in which are the heads of Austria and the Pope. According to what has already leaked out, the plan was as follows: While our forces would be divided, to resist at the same time the Austrians and the bands of General Lamoriciere, orders were to be given, at a convenient time and place, to enlist and seduce people, to raise whatever tumult and confusion they could, in order to plunge the government into grave trouble, and if possible, to overthrow it."

A great number of priests were arrested at Turin and Piacentia; at the latter place twenty at once. Papers discovered in the Piacentia Seminary deeply implicate the Cardinal Archbishop Ranza, and suffice to institute a criminal procedure against that high dignitary of the Church. In the city of Rome another plot has been discovered by the French military authorities, whose aim it was to murder at the same time the Emperor Napoleon and General Garibaldi, these two persons whom the Papal government takes for its most dangerous enemies. The examination of a number of witnesses by the French provost has revealed the fact that Baron Pontalba, director general of the Roman railroads, and some members of the Roman prelacy, have hired two murderers, who were to kill the Emperor for the price of 500,000 francs and the General for 100,000. This interesting discovery will serve to accelerate the downfall of the Papal Rule.

FRANCE AND ENGLAND IN MEXICO

Once or twice in these columns we have, in connection with notices of the deplorable state of affairs in Mexico, intimated that the United States government had a duty to perform in that direction. For this we have been stigmatized as "filibusters," and called all sorts of ugly names. Lately England and France, weary of waiting for the United States to take charge of Mexico, and thus secure the rights of the citizens of those nations as well as those of our own, and also save that country from utter national ruin, have resolved to take the matter in hand themselves. We are truly rejoiced to hear it. If our government will do nothing, we hope some other government will. Nothing but European intervention will temper the ultra scrupulosity of many of our people in regard to such countries as Mexico, Cuba, and parts of Central America. European intervention is our only hope, while our present policy lasts. European intervention will soon rouse up an immense American indignation, and the "Monroe doctrine," which, though true in theory, has been practically one of the grandest political humbugs of this country, will be rung from one end of the land to the other. France and England have no right to intervene in the affairs of this continent, but our government will not, and some government must. A people that is incapable of self-government, must be governed by some other power, and providence always points out that power plainly enough. This truth applies to Mexico most certainly. The common people are peaceable, tractable, harmless and industrious, and, under an American system of territorial governments, with a few troops to restrain their rapacious chiefs, and to preserve order, would progress more in ten years in the path of civilization than they have done heretofore since the invasion of Cortez.

Many of our people have their consciences in a state of constant uneasiness for fear we shall wrong the people of Mexico, and violate their sacred rights of self-government. They are wronged now to the utmost extent except being murdered, and that is being done as rapidly as the means of destruction will permit. As to government, there has never, within our recollection, been such a thing in Mexico, which either emanated from the will of the people, or maintained its own constitution and laws, or commanded even respect enough to justify foreign recognition. Ever since we have known Mexico, it has been, and it is to this day, the theatre and prey of succeeding robber chiefs, who have ruled and ruined without constitution or law, though cloaking themselves under constitutional professions, until expelled by others more successful. They have never had a republican government worthy of the name, and according to all human wisdom, they never will have. Their different administrations are simply organized forces and quasi legal forms of oppression, revenge, robbery, and murder. Our government has the same right to assume the control of that country as it had to assume the control of the countries formerly occupied by the Indian tribes and now composing great and prosperous states. And the Mexican population, unlike the Indians, will, under American control, become a civilized and prosperous people. They have the elements already, and only need permanent order, repose and confidence in order to their development.

AUTHORS AND BOOKS.

NEW YORK, July 30, 1860.

Since my last the English Reviews have come to hand. The Edinburgh has articles on the following subjects:—"Chevalier on the probable Fall in the Value of Gold," in which the Reviewer comes to the conclusion that by this change in value the rich will become richer, and the poor poorer; and that men with salaries will in particular suffer more than merchants and speculators. "Diaries and Correspondence of George Rose;" "D'Haussonville's Union of France and Lorraine;" Murchison's Latest Geological Discoveries;" The Patrimony of St. Peter," a searching inquiry into the merits and demerits of the Papacy, considered only as a political institution—in which it is proved that from first to last, from the beginning to the end of its political authority, that has been misused, and the people have always suffered. The only difficulty is, that it deals with the Papal government as with one having common sense and a power of reasoning; expects it to take courage by the example of other governments, and in fact to progress with the species. Now the Papacy is in its very nature a despotism, and is not to be compared to any other form of government. It is a matter of difficulty to regenerate or improve even the mildest form of despotism—as the Emperor of Russia is discovering just now. You cannot tinker with such a thing. It will not exist with any other form of government, for the reason that if it did it would cease to be a despotism; change Rome, and it ceases to be Rome, and no one knows this better than the Cardinals, who most often laugh at the simplicity with which well meaning men reason with them. It is precisely the reasoning that they have no use for. Their only care is to "preserve;" and they well know that they, least of all, have business to touch with improving hand their "ruins," which must crumble away with the first attempt at improvement. Other articles of the Edinburgh are on Vaughan's Revelations in English History; Mrs Grote's Life of Ary Scheffer, the Painter; Prince Dolgorrodow's Russia, and Serf Emancipation; Humboldt's Correspondence with Varnhagen; Cardinal Mai's edition of the Vatican Codex (which gives a very interesting historical account of that volume); and Secret Voting and Parliamentary Reform.

The Westminster has for its contents: "Strikes, their Tendencies and Remedies;" "The Mill on the Floss," a review of the works of "George Eliot," in which that lady is compared favorably with Charlotte Bronte; Rawlinson's Bampton's Lectures for 1859; The Post Office Monopoly, in which the proceedings of the British Postal Systems are reviewed, and it is argued that the postal arrangements of the world should be in private hands—a view which is not easy to be practically carried out, because, for instance, in our country it would be difficult, if not impossible, to get individuals to contract to carry letters and newspapers to all parts of the country at a uniform rate of postage, and to serve remote and isolated places as well as the general centers of trade and population. Any Scheffer; The Irish Education Question; Germany, its strength and weakness; Thoughts in aid of Faith; Grievances of Hungarian Catholics, and the French Press.

The National Review, which is now one of the best, though it is the youngest of its kind in England, has the first thorough review of the writings of Edmond About, the very brilliant author of "The Roman Question," a book which did more toward the settling of the vexed question of the Temporal Sovereignty of the Pope, than all that has been written on it together; and which, while it is the most brilliant book I ever read, is at the same time as full of facts and statistics as Gazetteer.

The National has also a laudatory review of the novels of George Eliot; and articles on the Natural History of the Ancients; Michelet's Life of Richelieu; The Devil of London; Horace; What is the House of Lords; William Caldwell Roscoe's Poetry; De Brian's Reign; The Protestant and Catholic Revolt from the Middle; Scheme of Henry VIII; and on Mr. Gladstone. I wonder the National is not reprinted here by Messrs. Leonard Scott & Co. It is abundantly worth it, and it would be a boon to the readers of Reviews on this side of the water; who are I hope yearly becoming more numerous.

In the Reviews of America, England, and France is now found the best and healthiest general reading of the day. In this country we run too much to newspapers—pray let me say it in your columns, oh kindest of Editors!—we live on the daily press, which an enthusiastic friend of mine calls the "modern Illiad." But the dailies don't educate us; they don't elevate our taste or taste. They simply satisfy the lowest intellectual craving of which the human species is capable—the craving for news. A good review is an educator of the best kind. The young man or woman who can be brought to read the best of our Foreign and Home Reviews comes in contact in the best manner with the finest products of the most cultivated minds of the day; and cannot help but imbibe something at least of their elevated tone in morals and intellect. If I were at the head of a High School or College, I should make it a point to see my students fond of this kind of reading.

A friend of mine has a theory that in a few years we shall be rid of daily newspapers in a great measure. He thinks—with some show of justice—that they are over-doing themselves; that the people will tire of fruitless discussions or half discussions on hastily studied themes; and that they will become disgusted with the immense space devoted to poor misrepresentations of the events of the day. He gravely declares that we shall return to the era of pamphlets; that every great question will be fully discussed in this way; that pamphlets will circulate by hundreds of thousands; and that then questions which are worth discussing will at any rate have the benefit of being stated fairly, wittily, and in such a way that the reader will be enlightened; whereas—he says—it is evident to every one who is capable of judgment that a "leader" in a daily paper is a mere partisan half statement of one point in a great question.

Meantime, of course, the dailies will laugh; and I shall read reviews, and wait in patience the era of pamphlets. I suppose few, if any, of the dailies will stop on account of this unannounced of their impending doom.

The third volume of Mr. Massey's History of England in the reign of George III is just out. It is an interesting volume to American readers, the narrative commencing in 1760, and including the capture of Yorktown and surrender of Cornwallis to Gen. Washington. Curiously enough, Mr Massey takes the view that Andre's execution as a spy was quite justifiable on settled ground and principles of public law. He says it was illegal to maintain that a flag of truce, which is intended only for those communications between hostile forces, which the courtesies and exigencies of civilized warfare require, can be available to cover such a transaction as that which Andre came on—to negotiate, is a mockery and so absurdity. The Adjutant-General of the British army was no common spy, he says, and argues that he fully deserved his fate, according to every usage of war. Such a view has not been popular in England, where Andre has a monument in St. Paul's.

The British Association for the advancement of science is now holding its sessions in Oxford. Among the papers read have been nearly a dozen from American men of science, who take a very honorable position among the assembled savans. The paper which attracted the largest audience, several of the Sections adjourning purposely to hear it read (an honor which was not vouchsafed to any other), was that by professor J. W. Draper, the talented professor of chemistry and natural history in the University of the city of New York, and until 1839, professor of chemistry and physiology in Hampden-Sidney College, Virginia. Prof. Draper attended the meetings at the special invitation of the committee and President of the British Association. His paper was a resume of his views on the "intellectual development of Europe, considered with Reference to the Views of Mr. Darwin and others, that the Progression of Organisms is determined by Law."

These views he has elucidated at length in a work which the Harpers have in press for him; the fruit of many years of study and reflection, and a work, so say those who have seen his MS., of the highest philosophic character and literary ability. The London Athenæum, which reports Mr. Draper at length says:

"The object of this paper was to show that the advancement of man in civilization does not occur accidentally or in a fortuitous manner, but is determined by immutable law. The author intermixed his subject by recalling proofs of the manifestation of law in the three great lines of the manifestation of life. First, in the successive stages of development of every individual, from the earliest rudiment to maturity; secondly, in the numberless organic forms now living contemporaneously with us, and constituting the animal series; thirdly, in the orderly appearance of that grand succession which in the slow lapse of geological time has emerged, constituting the life of the Earth, showing therefrom not only the evidences, but also proofs of the dominion of law over the world of life. In those three lines of life he established that the general principle is, to differentiate intelligence from instinct. In man himself three distinct instrumental nervous mechanisms exist, and three distinct modes of life are perceptible, the automatic, the instinctive, the intelligent. They occur in an epochal order, from infancy through childhood to the more perfect state. Such holding good for the individual, it was then affirmed that it is physiologically impossible to separate the individual from the race, and that what holds good for the one holds good for the other too; and hence that man is the archetype of society, and individual development the model of social progress, and that both are under the control of immutable law: that a parallel exists between individual and national life in this, that this production, life, and death of an organic particle in the person, answers to the production, life, and death of a person in the nation. Turning from these purely physiological considerations to historical proof, and selecting the only European nation which thus far has offered a complete and completed intellectual life, Prof. Draper showed that the characteristics of Greek mental development answer perfectly to those of individual life, presenting philosophically five well-marked ages or periods,—the first being closed by the opening of Egypt to the Ionians; the second, including the Ionian, Pythagorean, and Eleatic philosophies, was ended by the criticisms of the Sophists; the third, embracing the Socratic and Platonic philosophies, was ended by the double of the Sceptics; the fourth, ushered in by the Macedonian expedition and adorned by the splendid achievements of the Alexandrian school, degenerated into Neoplatonism and imbecility in the fifth, to which the hand of Rome put an end. From the solutions of the four great problems of Greek philosophy, given in each of these five stages of its life, he showed that it is possible to determine the law of the variation of Greek opinion, and to establish its analogy with that of the variations of opinion in individual life. Next, passing to the considerations of Europe in the aggregate, Prof. Draper showed that it has already in part repeated these phases in its intellectual life. Its first period closes with the spread of the power of Republican Rome, the second with the foundation of Constantinople, the third with the Turkish invasion of Europe: we are living in the fourth. Detailed proofs of the correspondence of these periods to those of Greek life, and through them to those of individual life, are given in a work now printing on this subject, by the author, in America. Having established this conclusion, Prof. Draper next briefly alluded to many collateral problems or inquiries. He showed that the advances of men are due to external and not to interior influences, and that in this respect a nation is like a seed which can only develope when the conditions are favourable, and then only in a definite way; that the time for psychical change corresponds with that for physical, and that a nation cannot advance except its material condition is touched,—this having been the case throughout all Europe, as is manifested by the diminution of the blue-eyed races thereof; that all organisms and even man are dependent for their characteristics, continuance, and life on the physical conditions under which they live; that the existing apparent invariability presented by the world of organization is the direct consequence of the physical equilibrium, but that if that should suffer modification, in an instant the fanciful doctrine of the immutability of species would be brought to its proper value. The organic world appears to be in repose because natural influences have reached an equilibrium. A marble may remain motionless for ever on a level table, but let the table be a little inclined, and the marble will quickly run off; and so it is with organisms in the world. From his work on Physiology, published in 1856, he gave his views in support of the doctrine of the transmutation of species; the gradual forms of the animal and also the human type; the production of new ethnical elements, or nations; and the laws of their origin, duration and death.

It might be expected, the communication of such views drew out the strength of the assemblage of savans in opposition and support. A very lively discussion followed, when the Professor from New York sat down; and one only wishes that the Rev. Sidney Smith, who didn't read an American book, had been present on the interesting occasion.

College honors have been showered thickly this summer. At the late commencement of Dickinson College the degree of D.D. was conferred on Rev. Henry Slicer and Rev. D. W. Bartlue, and LL.D. on Hon. William Dyson, of England. The Indiana State University, Bloomington, conferred the D.D. on Rev. Michael Morley, the presiding elder of the West Cincinnati district, Cincinnati Conference; also on Rev. John L. Smith, of Indiana, and the Rev. John Trimble, Jr., president of the Masonic University, Lagrange, Ky. At the last commencement of Trinity College, the degree of D.D. was conferred on the Rev. R. T. Heflin, editor of the North Carolina Christian Advocate.

Carlton & Porter are now passing through the press the Rev. Wm. Rice, of the New England Conference, a volume of poetical quotations, the fruits of several years' research. Also a minister's Hand-book by the same author; and "the missionary in many lands," by Rev. Erwie House of the Western Christian Advocate.

Mr. Ingersoll, a lawyer of Philadelphia, has written, and is about to publish a book, of extraordinary interest—"Recollections, Historical, Political, Biographical, and Social"—presenting portraitures of the men of the Revolution and of personages of this country from 1792 downwards.

A new work by Marion Harland, entitled Nemesis, is in the press of Derby & Jackson. 'Marion Harland,' it is well known, is the nom de plume of a lady of New Jersey, the wife of a clergyman. The coming book is a tale of Southern life. The same publishers have ready for issue, "the Household of Bouverie," a novel by a lady of Kentucky.

The Harpers have nearly ready for issue: Italy in Transition, by Wm. Arthur; The Woman in White, by Wilkie Collins; Studies in Animal Life, by G. H. Lewes; The Queens of Society, by Grace and Philip Wharton; Rosa or the Parisian Girl; The Lake Regions of Central Africa, by Captain Burton.

The Freewill Baptist Quarterly, for July, contains articles on—1. Inspiration, by Rev. E. M. Tuppan, Lawrence, Mass; 2. The Two Covenants, by Rev. G. H. Ball, Whitestown, New York; 3. The Revival in England, by Rev. Wm. Hurlin, East Sumner, Mo; 4.—Forces in the Formation of Character, by C. J. Mavis, Esq., Portland, Mo; 5. Universalism, by Rev. G. J. Day, Providence, R. I.; 6. Advantages and Disadvantages of a Permanent Pastorate, by Rev. J. A. Stetson, Providence, R. I.; 7. Webster's and Worcester's Dictionaries, by Rev. G. J. Day; 8. Contemporary Literature.

The Biblical Repertory and Princeton Review for July, contains articles on: "the Bible its own Witness and Interpreter," "the Heathen Inexcusable for their Idolatry," "Theories of the Eldership," "Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy of the Conditioned," "the General Assembly," "Presbyterianism."

Messrs. Ticknor & Fields have just published a new and much enlarged edition of the poems of Gerald Massey. The volume is dedicated to Mr. J. T. Fields, of Boston, in a letter, in which the author says:

"In this volume will be found some one hundred and thirty to one hundred and forty pages of new matter.—The series of "Christie's Poems," "England and Louis Napoleon," "Burns," and "Apposalix," are mainly new. The rest are scattered through the various other sections. The old matter has undergone a through revision. I should have preferred to leave a good deal obt, but it was thought best to retain the earlier poems as they are. You must let me use my English privilege and have one gamble at your previous title of "Poetical Works" 58 too presumptuous in its challenge. As yet I am a man of faith—for the future—rather than of works."

J. B. Lippincott & Co., publish "The Mountains," by Dr. R. M. S. Jackson, of Cresson, Pa.; a general, scientific, and popular description of the Alleghanies, treating of their geology, soil, waters, flora, fauna, and climate, etc., etc.

Joseph M. Wilson, Philadelphia, has just published The Divine Purpose Explained, or All Things Decreed Yet Evil Not Caused, Nor Moral Freedom Impaired; and the Glory of God the End of All." By the Rev. George Morton.

The Presbyterian Board of Publication have just added to their series for youth: "The Lost Children, or Henry and his Torch," by the author of the "Widow's Sixpence." "Nursery Tales for Little Friends," by Cousin Martha. "Little Annie's first thoughts about God," by Nellie Graham.

N. Tibbals & Co. have ready: "Life in Sing Sing State Prison;" an account of the management of one of our chief penitentiaries, and of the characteristic features and effects of prison life in this country. It is by the Rev. John Luckey, who has been for twelve years chaplain of the Institution, and has in that capacity enjoyed unusual opportunities for observation.

The "Shakespearean controversy" is not settled yet.—It is announced that Mr. T. D. Hardy, of the Record office, is preparing a new pamphlet. Mr. Hardy was one of the five commissioners whom the master of the Rolls appointed to examine the "Players' Petition," preserved in the State paper office, and who unanimously pronounced it a forgery; and the author of a recently published and ill received pamphlet abusive of Mr. Collier's opponents, is to try his hand again, in a work announced for "next week," by Messrs. Longman & Co., entitled, "Collier, Coleridge, and Shakespeare." A review." And, more than all, Mr. Hamilton, of the British museum, has a work in hand upon the subject.

The Messrs. Blackwood are just publishing the late Sir William Hamilton's long expected lectures on metaphysics, edited by Mansel and Veitch.

The success of Dr. Abel Stevens' History of Methodism has been so considerable in England, that Alexander Heylin, the publisher, announces a cheap edition.

A Berlin paper announces that the sale of Humboldt's library will begin on the 17th of September. The orders so far, are more numerous from America than from any other foreign country.

The British laugh at our sensitiveness to criticism; but here is a case on their own side. Dr. H. Owgan recently wrote and published a work called "The Lang Run," of which the Literary Gazette spoke somewhat harshly. On which the author writes to the editor:

"Sir—Having just seen in your last impression a notice of my novel, 'The Long Run,' in which, after a few sentences of frantic and spasmodic vituperation, you promise that if I question your verdict, you will publish a full review of the work and support your statements, I beg to say that I do question your verdict, as being dictated either by very gross ignorance or by some outrageously whimsical prejudice."

"A DRY AND THIRSTY LAND."

"The hart panteth after the water-brooks." In many parts of the land, "the whole stuff of bread, and the whole stay of water," threaten to fail. The South, especially, favored with an immense cotton crop last year, and neglecting, for cotton's sake, to provide sufficient grain for man and beast, has a gloomy prospect. With not enough corn last year, a failure of the corn crop this year, and straitened by debts incurred in buying more land and labor, "to make more cotton," retribution for such folly is at hand. The rich can bear it, but the poor will have a hard struggle, and many of them, we fear, will suffer. The drought is still heavy over the greater portion of the South and South-West. The corn, in many places, is dying in the fields, and in most places it will prove almost an entire failure. In parts of Texas the cattle are dying for want of water. In Arkansas, in Georgia, and in some other regions, hot winds, resembling the simoon, have swept over the country, blasting vegetation and endangering life. And still the drought continues. Happily, the grain crops of the North and West are abundant. We trust, also, that the crops in the South may turn out better than is hoped. Preparation, as far as may be, should be made, as early as possible, by legislative and municipal authorities, and by individuals, to avert the evils threatened, especially those menacing the poor. We trust the lesson will not be lost—that the people will humble themselves under the mighty hand of God, and, in future, keep out of debt, be content with more limited and healthier gains, and pay more attention to grain crops. Two or three more immense cotton crops will bankrupt the country. People go madly in debt for labor and land. After the last great cotton crop has been sold for fine prices, the money market is unusually stringent, from this very cause.

THE GREAT PICTURE.

The "Great Picture" of the last General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, together with the Bishops, living and dead, and the Wesleys, which has been undertaken by W. T. Smithson, Esq., of Washington City, engraved by J. C. Buttre, Esq., of New York, will be ready for delivery by the first of September next. It will be a magnificent work of art, and on that account alone will be an ornament to every household. In addition, it will be of historical interest and value. It will be a picture of the great representative body of the Southern Methodist Church, which meets only once in four years. It would be well if such a picture could be taken of each succeeding General Conference. What would the present generation of Methodists not give for pictures of each General Conference from the beginning of American Methodism until now! And the last General Conference was a peculiarly memorable one. At that session the great error, never sufficiently to be deplored, of American Methodism—legislation on slavery—was blotted forever from our Book of Discipline. Let every Methodist family be supplied. Let every preacher bring as large a list of subscribers up to Conference as possible. The first impressions will be the best, and early subscription will procure them. All the profits go to build the Washington City Church.

MALE COLLEGE COMMENCEMENT AT AUBURN.

Prosperity of the College—244 Students—Success of the Faculty—Commencement Sermon—Prize declamation—Addresses by Col. Sanford, Hon. D. Clopton, and Professor Slaton—Five Graduates—Hon. J. F. Dowdell—A new Professor—Enlargement prospects.

The friends of the East Alabama Male College are thankful to a kind Providence for the uninterrupted prosperity which has marked the first year of its organization. The patronage extended to the College has far exceeded the expectations of the most sanguine, and we trust that the high hopes now entertained for the future are destined to have a happy fruition. The Preparatory Department numbered 141, and the Collegiate 103, making a total of 244. We believe these figures to be unexampled in the history of similar Institutions at the South. Nor have they been the result of a spasmodic effort to rally all available strength to swell the numbers at the beginning, but we believe that we speak the sentiment of the community at large, when we say that this Institution has, in many respects, a wider field and a more fruitful, for cultivation, than any other Southern College.

The examination of the students, preparatory to the public exercises of commencement, was in all respects satisfactory. When we consider the great diversity which exists among teachers, in the methods of instruction, we shall be prepared to appreciate, to some extent at least, the difficulties to be met in College training. Gathered from all quarters of the country, the effect of these diverse methods of training become obvious, when the minds of the students are subjected to close and competent tests. Notwithstanding the difficulties arising at this point, difficulties which are greater the first year than they are likely to be hereafter, the Faculty have acquitted themselves of their delicate task with signal ability.

On Sabbath, July 8th, the Commencement Sermon was preached in the Methodist Church, to a very large audience, by Dr. M'Tyeire, of Nashville. It is enough to say of this discourse, that it was a plain gospel sermon, full of religious life, light and power. The Spirit of grace and liberty filled the heart and moved the lips of the preacher. May the Doctor live to preach many more such discourses.

The Sophomore class had a trial at public declamation on Monday night. Ten or twelve young men contended for prizes, which were awarded by a committee of gentlemen, the first prize to Mr. W. T. Patillo, and the second to Mr. R. W. Drake. All of these young gentlemen, as well as those of the junior class, who held their exhibition on Tuesday morning, acquitted themselves well, giving entire satisfaction to the large audiences present. At the conclusion of the exercises on Tuesday, Col. J. W. A. Sanford, of Montgomery, delivered a chaste and beautiful address on "Eloquence." Professor Slaton, in the afternoon, addressed the Websterian Society, and Hon. David Clopton, the Wirt Society of the College. The writer did not hear the address of Mr. Clopton, but it is highly commended by those who heard it. Professor Slaton's address was a plain, sensible and cogent argument, in favor of a thorough moral culture. Several speakers were called out in both Societies on this occasion, to the satisfaction of all.

On Wednesday the following young men graduated and received the degree of A. B., viz.:—A. F. Woolley, jun., Cass county, Ga.; W. C. Thrash, Orrville, Dallas county, Ala.; B. D. Lumsden, Talbot county, Ga.; F. S. Johnson, jun., Clinton, Ga.; W. F. Gleun, Floyd county, Ga. The last named, Mr. W. F. Glenn, delivered the Valedictory Address, an effort which did him great credit. The address was well conceived, and delivered with grace and elegance.

These young men, of whom the institution is justly proud, were addressed by President Sasnett in words of counsel and encouragement. The President, on this occasion, well sustained his reputation as a practical thinker, thoroughly versed in all the machinery of human thought and action.

Many illustrious names in the different departments of life belong to Staffordshire. Among them may be mentioned, Dr. Samuel Johnson, the "lewisthan of English literature;" Elijah Fenton, the poet; Bishop Hurd; Bishop Newton, author of the celebrated "Dissertations on the Prophecies;" Dr. John Lightfoot, author of some well known theological works in Latin and in English; Isaac Walton, the "common father of anglers," and who wrote many books, and commenced one of them (the life of Bishop Sanderson) in his eighty-third year; and last, not least, Francis Asbury, the pioneer evangelist and Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States of America. Who would have thought, while gazing upon the little boy who was brought up in the fear of God in an humble cottage in Staffordshire, that he would exert the potent influence for good that he did in the rising republic of the Western World?

It may not be known to many of your readers that much of the porcelain and other kinds of earthenware, as well as the tiles upon the floors and roofs of their houses, and other articles of usefulness and ornament used by them, are manufactured in this county. The other day, in company with my wife and one of my cousins, I went through the celebrated manufactory of the late Herbert Minton, Esq., of Stoke-upon-Trent, one of the chief towns of the district, called the "Staffordshire Potteries." In this district there is a population of nearly a hundred thousand, of whom about seventeen thousand males and ten thousand females are regularly employed in the manufacturing of earthenware. Here we saw the whole process of transforming dust and clay into the most magnificent table services, elegant statuary, garden seats, flower vases, etc. Some of these flower vases sell at twenty-six guineas a pair. The varied processes of mixing and preparing the clay, moulding, turning, firing, engraving, printing, transferring, painting, gilding, enamelling, etc., are carried on in the same establishment, with wonderful celerity and skill, such as some men could never acquire, and which could be acquired by none without protracted study and practice.

It was quite a novelty to my wife, who had never been in England before, to see girls and women of her own color and race working in the clay, turning wheels for men, and sometimes bearing heavy burdens on their heads or shoulders, through the streets, as we did while passing through the Potteries; but they, of course, were "free" to do this, or starve, or emigrate to a foreign land. There is a great diversity of character among these operatives, from the lowest degradation of poverty, ignorance and vice, to a high position of intelligence, refinement and virtue.

I perceive a vast improvement, in almost every respect, within the last thirty years. And there are few men who have exerted a more beneficent influence upon the working classes of the district, than that exerted by Mr. Minton, who now sleeps with his fathers, and who has left behind "footprints on the sands of time" that will not soon be forgotten by the wise and the good.

The quantity of small inns and beer-houses in these towns, and all along the roads in every direction, is almost incredible, and it furnishes a striking illustration of the drinking habits of the people. Very praiseworthy efforts are being made by philanthropists and Christians to allure the working-men from the public-house and the gin-shop, from the resorts of impiety and vice, to the reading-room, the lyceum, and the house of God; and while there is a fearful amount of intemperance and vice still to be overcome, their efforts have been crowned with encouraging success.

The next day was spent in a trip to Trentham Park, one of the country seats of his grace the Duke of Sutherland. The distance is four miles from Newcastle, and when I was a boy it was commonly said that the Marquis of Stafford, now the Duke of Sutherland, owned all the land on the road and a large number of the best houses in the town. We had to pass through two villages, Trent Vale and Handford, before we arrived at Trentham. The road, like all the roads we have yet seen in England, was quite smooth and hard, with an elevated foot-path for pedestrians, and a beautiful hedge on each side of the road. Though it had rained almost every day for six or seven weeks previous to the last few days, we saw neither mud nor water in any part of the roads that we traveled all the day. The heavens were overspread with clouds, and the air was chilly; but the peasantry were hard at work in the hay fields, mowing down the grass, and turning it over, trying to make hay without any sunshine.

Owing to the inclemency of the weather, the hay harvest is several weeks later than usual; but if a kind Providence should favor us with a few days of such sunny weather as we have while I write, an abundant crop will be made. I observed a clergyman of the Church of England and his wife leading a helping hand to the laborers in one of the fields, as we passed by. Everything about the roads and the fields was neat and clean, the land was in the highest state of cultivation, and the scenery, when our backs were turned to the smoking towns, was exquisitely beautiful. The river Trent is quite a small affair, not much too wide here for a man to jump over; but its waters are useful for irrigating the land, and they add somewhat to the beauty of the scene.

In my next I will introduce your readers to Trentham Park.

POLITICAL.

New Jersey Conventions.—The result of the three State conventions, held on the same day, at Trenton, New Jersey, was as follows: The regular State convention of Democrats called by the State Executive Committee, had 540 members, 420 for Breckenridge, and 120 for Douglas. It nominated an electoral ticket, containing three names of Breckenridge men, three Bell men, and one Douglas man. The understanding is that, the electors, if successful, shall vote for any man whom the vote of the State will elect, except Abraham Lincoln, otherwise to vote according to their own preference. The Union convention was also quite numerous. They nominated a full Bell and Everett ticket, including the three names on the Democratic "fusion" ticket, giving the State Committee power to fill vacancies. It is implied that a portion of the ticket may be withdrawn if it appears necessary, in order to carry the State against Lincoln. This ticket is supported by a portion of the friends of Mr. Douglas. There was also a pure, straight-out Douglas convention called by the New Jersey portion of the Central Committee, at Washington City, which nominated a full Douglas ticket.

Francis Hoffman has withdrawn his withdrawn his resignation of the candidacy of the Republican party for Lieutenant Governor of Illinois.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The Massacres in Syria.—In the British House of Lords, on the 17th ult., in reply to a question relative to the massacres in Syria, Lord Woodhouse said the official accounts from the scene of the massacres corroborate everything published, and added: "With regard to the steps which have been taken by Her Majesty's Government, as soon as intelligence reached us, before the latest accounts, orders were sent to Admiral Martin to proceed with a squadron to the coast of Syria, to take such steps as might be necessary for the protection of British subjects. We are informed that the French Government have sent some ships of war for the same purpose to that coast, and that there are also vessels there belonging to Russia and other powers. Her Majesty's Government have been in communication with the Governments of Turkey, Russia, Prussia, Austria and France, as to the measures which will become necessary."

The London Court Journal contradicts the report that the Princess Alice is to marry the Prince of Hesse Darmstadt.

Expected Disclosures.—It is reported in Paris that the death of Prince Jerome will occasion the most extraordinary particulars of the latter portion of his past life to be brought to light; that the Countess A., the Florentine lady, well known to English society of Florence, means to bring her claims before the French tribunals as the late Prince's lawful wife; that the Emperor intends to admit the fact of the marriage, but to oppose its legality from the circumstance of its having been contracted without the confirmation of his consent since he has become Emperor.

Mrs. Hemans.—A memorial window is to be erected in the chancel of the Church of St. Anne, Dublin, to the memory of Mrs. Hemans.

The Prince of Wales will be nineteen years old on the 9th of November.

EUROPEAN CORRESPONDENCE.

Newcastle-under-Lyne—Staffordshire—Thick with Towns—Population, manufactures, agriculture, and scenery—Antiquity and progress—Great men, Francis Asbury—Porcelain and earthenware—Female labourers—Improvement—Hay making.

Newcastle-under-Lyne, England, July 13, 1860.

Mr. Editor:—Since I last addressed you and your readers, I have had a pleasant and prosperous voyage across the Atlantic ocean, with some advantage to my health, and have been two weeks in this ancient borough enjoying sweet social intercourse with my kindred and some of the friends of my youthful days. Newcastle-under-Lyne is a small town for England, having only about twelve or thirteen thousand inhabitants; but it is situated in a beautiful and populous region of country, abounding, in many things, both ancient and modern, of great interest to a traveler. Staffordshire, of which this is one of the chief towns, is situated near the centre of the island, and is one of the largest and wealthiest of the English counties, containing no large city, but having numerous towns and villages very near to each other, and often so close together that the stranger passes out of one into the other without perceiving any separation between them. The population at the last census was 608,716, and the people are engaged in manufacturing and agricultural pursuits. Here we see numerous coal mines, forges, and manufactories of earthenware, where immense fires are burning day and night; while from towering chimneys, and enormous round ovens, piercing the air like pyramids and obelisks, volumes of mingled flame and smoke ascend, darkening the skies and obscuring the light of heaven. In the spaces not occupied by these Vulcanic towns may be seen, when the fog and smoke will admit of it, some of the most beautiful rural scenery that the sun ever shone upon. Every nook and corner of the land is pressed into service, and made to contribute something for the necessities or for the luxuries of man. In close proximity you see the crowded manufacturing town or village, where the swarthy sons of toil dig their subsistence out of the bowels of the earth, or labor, almost in a state of nudity, among blazing furnaces and in darksome mines,—and sweet rural hamlets, spacious parks, beautiful gardens, and the elegant mansions of the nobility and gentry, teeming with wealth and adorned with the richest treasures of nature, science and art.

The county abounds in relics of ancient times, of deep interest to those who have taste and leisure for antiquarian researches. Remains of Roman roads, and camps, buildings and ruins, reaching back to the days of the Saxon Heptarchy, and even vestiges of the Druids, have been saved from the ravages of time. More than two thousand years the people have been struggling upwards from barbarism, heathenism and ignorance, into the pure light of science, civilization and christianity; and who shall tell the story of the long and arduous struggle? Who can estimate the progress that has been made? Who can tell the work that remains to be done before the purposes of God with regard to the Anglo-Saxon race are accomplished?

Many illustrious names in the different departments of life belong to Staffordshire. Among them may be mentioned, Dr. Samuel Johnson, the "lewisthan of English literature;" Elijah Fenton, the poet; Bishop Hurd; Bishop Newton, author of the celebrated "Dissertations on the Prophecies;" Dr. John Lightfoot, author of some well known theological works in Latin and in English; Isaac Walton, the "common father of anglers," and who wrote many books, and commenced one of them (the life of Bishop Sanderson) in his eighty-third year; and last, not least, Francis Asbury, the pioneer evangelist and Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States of America. CITY NEWS.

The City Council has adjourned until the first Tuesday in October.

The Louisiana State Bank has declared a dividend of 8 per cent for the last six months.

Early on the morning of the 31st ult., the frame houses on Erato-street, between Magazine and Constance, occupied by Mrs. Thorp and Mr. Gast, were destroyed by fire. Hardly anything was saved so fierce and rapid were the flames. There is strong reason to believe that the fire was started by an incendiary. The whole loss is from $6000 to $8000. It was a peculiarly sad disaster to Mrs. Tharp, who is a poor widow, her husband having been crushed to death some time ago in Mebbins' cotton seed oil mill. She had barely time to save herself and children, in doing which she had one of her arms badly burnt.

COMMERCIAL.

Monday Evening, July 30, 1860.

We condense the following statement from the New Orleans Price Current of the 28th inst.:—

Operations in our general market are still of a moderate character, though in some articles a fair amount of business has been done, considering the advanced period of the season. In Cotton we have noticed rather more movement with a firmer market under the influence of more favorable advices from Europe and accounts of injury to the crop from the long and excessive drouth in many sections of the interior. In Tobacco the transactions have been on a limited scale, and in Sugar the supply is too light to allow scope for any considerable operations. In Western Produce there have been some few variations which will be found detailed below. In Coffee we notice a further and considerable advance.

COTTON.—With respect to prices, we have to remark that there prevails considerable irregularity, but the market has generally shown more steadiness than we have had occasion to notice for some weeks past, and closed at about the range of our quotations.

The receipts at this port since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 2,113,133 bales, against 1,654,194 bales to same date last year, and the increase of the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 781,875 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is an increase of 703,646 bales to Great Britain, and of 147,153 to France, while to other foreign ports there is a decrease of 49,176 bales.

New Orleans Classification:

Ordinary	8 @ 8	Middling Fair	12⅜@12¾
Good Ordinary	8⅝@ 8⅞	Fair	—@—
Low Middling	8¾@ 9	Good Fair	—@—
Middling	10⅜@11	Good and Fine	—@—

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to 700 hhds. We quote for Inferior and Refining 4½ to 5½; Common to Good Common 5 to 7½; Fair to Fully Fair 7¾ to 7¾; Prime to Choice 8¼ to 8¾; Centrifugal and Clarified 7 to 9¾ cents per pound. The above quotations apply to round lots, but small orders of 5 hhds and under, could not be filled without paying a further advance of ¼ to ½c per pound.

MOLASSES.—Total receipts of the week 155 barrels. The prices obtained during the week were: Inferior to Fair, 18 to 25 cents per gallon; and Prime to Choice, 20 to 30 cents; half barrels, 2d to 30 cents per gallon.

GRAIN.—The receipts of Corn continue light. About 20,000 sacks have been sold at from $0 68 to 0 70 for ordinary, and 0 80 for good white. Oats have been in moderate request at 40c to 44c per bushel for good to prime St. Louis. Bran sells at $1 10 to $1 15 for ordinary to choice lots. Wheat sells at $1 10 per bushel for prime red.

FLOUR.—About 8,000 bbls have been sold during the past week, at from $5 45 to $5 55 for superfine, $6 25 to 7 00 for ordinary to good extra, and $6 75 to $7 25 per bbl. for choice extra brands.

ALLINE ELWIN: A TALE OF ALABAMA.

BY FANNY SHELDON.

Chapter XV.

"When with rich hopes o'erfraught the young high heart
Bears its first blow, it knows not yet the part Which life will teach—to suffer and be still."

Alice seated herself at the feet of Mrs. May, her eyes fixed in silent wonder, her pale brow covered with the deep dew of suppressed agony. She listened, as Mrs. May, gently and soothingly as possible, related to her how she first came into their possession; for this was all they knew or had to tell.

"Alice, my dear child," began the old lady, with a trembling voice, "Mr. May and I once lived in one of our Southern cities. We married early in life; but months and years rolled on, and still we were childless. We were wealthy; all that money could give, or affection bestow, we possessed; and yet, with this only can want unsupplied, we were unhappy. At length, Mr. May's mother died, bequeathing to us her only child, a little girl of five years of age. We received her as a precious boon sent us by heaven. We nourished and cherished her with all the devotion of fond parents; she knew no want, felt no care. She grew in beauty, Alice, even as you have, around our hearth, gladdened our hearts with her smiles, and made the old rooms, which had seemed so lonely before, echo with her ringing laugh. Oh, we idolized our child! And God is a jealous God, and he removed her from us. Petted and spoiled, she acknowledged no will, no authority but her own. We often spoke of this to ourselves, and I had a vague and undefined fear that she would, at some future time, cause us much sorrow. She burst forth into a full blown flower, more beautiful than the bud had ever promised. We often now tried to restrain her self-willed, wayward propensities; but it was too late. She became acquainted with a gentleman of good appearance and winning manners. But though our Gertrude was beautiful, it was not by this, or by her intrinsic worth, that he was attracted. He knew that she was the sister of Mr. May, and his adopted daughter, and that, as such, she would heir his fortune. This it was that urged him on. Gertrude would not listen to reason or affection. All that we could do was done to prevent her throwing herself away on this man of the world, who acknowledged no law of man or God. She was blind, infatuated; and one morning she was missing. Her brother had vowed never to consent to her union with one so unworthy of her. And thus she left her home, and the hearts that had overflowed with affection for her—left us all alone, and doubly desolate. Her name is never mentioned now. Mr. May has never recovered entirely from this disappointment. His hair whitened in a few days, even as you see it now. Again, I say, we were alone.—Months rolled on, and God sent us another child; yes, even you, Alice, and I have fancied often that I could trace her lost yet worshipped image in thy pure unclouded face. He also has observed this, for I had ventured to speak of your face seeming familiar to me; he looked up surprized and startled; yet he answered, saying, 'It was only a fancy.' One day, however, while you lay asleep, I entered noiselessly, and he was standing over you, darling, with his eyes fixed in wonder upon your face, while he murmured several times, 'so like! so like! the same hair and brow, the same soft smile—strange! strange!' I crept out of the room as silently as I had entered. I, too, thought it strange, strange!"

"But, mamma, you have not told me how you came by me," said Alice, in a voice which was low and awfully distinct from intense excitement.

"Well, began Mrs. May again, "it was months after we were left to mourn for our child that, one night, we were seated alone around our fireside. It was a bitter cold evening in December; the sky looked gloomy; cloud after cloud rolled up upon each other till the heavens were entirely obscured; the wind came and went in fitful gusts, dying away in mournful silence far, far beyond all human ken. We neared the fire instinctively, looking at each other, as if to gain nourage, for we were momentarily expecting a fierce storm. Our tea was ready, but we had not seated ourselves at the table, but sat listening to the storm without, when a servant entered, exclaiming, breathlessly, 'there is some one at the door calling loudly for a light; he says there is a child at the gate.' We both started up hurriedly, and wonderingly followed the servant with a lantern to the door. Storm, wind and cold were forgotten for a time, or lost in the thought of a child, for this theme ever thrilled through our souls; no other ever seemed so sweet to our ears, or awakened such eager interest in our hearts. Over a roll, of what we yet knew not, stood a man; he informed us that, in passing, he heard a feeble wail, which seemed to proceed from a place quite near him, almost at his feet; that he fancied it the wind or imagination, and was passing on, when he again heard it more distinctly, and stooping, groped awhile with his hands, for it was too dark to see, he found what he first imagined must be a bundle of clothes, but which he perceived, on examination, to be a blanket, in which you, my child, lay—a little quivering infant, entirely destitute of clothes, and exposed to the keen cold blast as it swept by. Oh, Alice! you can never know what my heart felt at that moment. I raised you from the ground and folding you to my bosom, I passed in. There was no hesitation, no wondering what I should do with you; but I felt that you were mine, and nothing should ever induce me to give you up. I chafed your little limbs, provided nourishment for your body, and sat holding and caressing you for the entire night. Mr. May sat by as much interested as I was, lost in trying to realize that I did indeed possess a babe, and wondering by whom you could have been left there, your parentage, and the circumstances which could have led to your being thrown so destitute upon the world to chance. And now you know all that I do, Alice. Do not let it make you unhappy, my dear child. God will make it all right in his own good time. You know you are our child now, and that it would sorely grieve us if our darling appears unhappy or sorrowful."

Alice laid her head on the bosom where it had nestled in infancy, and tears of bitterness and regret flowed for many minutes unchecked and unrestrained. Then she rose, and pressing her lips to the brow of her more than parent, she went to her own room, and seating herself, she became lost in her own reflections. Her eyes wandered around her luxurious apartment. Thoughts of who she was filled her mind, and she began to experience a yearning desire to see her mother.

"How did she look? Why had she thrown her so helpless on the world?" And of her father, "who, what was he?"

Such were her vain, useless cogitations for many hours. She had been all life and cheerfulness before; but from this day she seemed cold, proud and haughty; collegiate, it is true, to those whom she knew to be her friends, but shunning with haughty disdain those whom she deemed her enemies. They thought to humble her in the eyes of the world, but they were mistaken; she felt conscious of her own purity of heart and life, and her friends asked not from what land she came—

"Nor where her youth was nursed,
So pure the stream it mattered not
The spot from which it burst."

She had learned all this respecting her life but a few days before the one in which we see her seated at dinner with Ellen Carlton. Frank had perceived that Alice looked paler and more than usually reserved on first entering. He loved Alice almost as he did his own sister. They had been associated from childhood together, and many of their youthful pleasures had been shared by each other; and still, though now grown, there was no reserve between them. Even as brother and sister they communed together. He had heard, long before, the mystery surrounding the birth of Alice, and his heart ached at the thought that she, too, would, at some future time, know it also, if she remained in ignorance for the present. He knew she would never more be the gleeful, merry Alice that she then was, if this knowledge ever came to her.—Her proud, sensitive nature would chafe at this doubtful parentage, and her heart would waste itself in vain yearnings after what seemed impossible it should ever attain.

"O, I am so weary! I wish I was at home."

"Dear child, you are at home."

"Oh, mother, I do not mean my home on earth when I say I wish to go home. I mean my home in heaven; that is the best home, mother."

Watchers have gathered in the sick room quietly, sadly. The unwearied mother is still at her post. The clock tolls twelve, the solemn midnight hour,

"'Tis a time
For memory and for tears.

Not for an instant does that young Christian waver.—Jesus is the anchor of her soul, and without a shudder she enters the cold floods.

"I am happy, mother—Jesus is my friend," and she strives by every means to lessen her parent's grief.

July 1st.—The Sabbath morn came clothed in calm beauty. One by one the watchers leave the sick room, and seek a short rest. The clock tolls nine, ten, eleven! And the ransomed spirit of MARIA H. ALLEN, aged 13 years and 13 days, is with "Our Father in Heaven."

Sabbath Eve, July 1st, 1860.—The waters of the Bartholemew flow silently, stealthily past a neat framed house embowered in trees, in Ashley county, Ark. The light and gauze like crape jasmin casts its perfume upon the breeze that comes ever and anon, and with its refreshing breath cools the feverish brow of "a man of God," who, in yonder comfortable room, is just entering "the valley of the shadow of death." The REV. JOHN HAWES, of the Louisiana Conference, has fought the good warfare, has kept the faith, and will soon enter into "the joy of his Lord."

"God's grace sustains me. I am in the hands of God. His providence is over me."

"Brother Hawes," asks a friend, "where do you think you would go were you to die?"

Unhesitatingly he answers—

"To a better world."

The sun, unobscured by a single cloud, hastens beyond the western horizon; friends come in to sit up; lights move from room to room; the night is vocal with the incessant hum of insects, and the owl hoots dismally from the cypress brake near by. Bro. Hawes, in restless slumbers, still lives.

"'Tis midnight's holy hour, and silence now
Is brooding like a gentle spirit o'er
The still and pulseless world."

Whispers among the watchers say, "he will soon be gone!"

Another hour moves slowly away, and at one o'clock, a.m., on the 2nd July, 1860, Brother Hawes breathes his last. He has been the means of turning many unto righteousness, and his crown will be set with the choicest jewels.

"Rest on thy sheaves, thy harvest task is done;
Come from the heat of battle, sad in peace,
Soldier, go home; with thee the light is won."

July 3d.—In sadness the people collect at Jones' Chapel, Morehouse parish, La., to pay the last tribute of respect to the remains of their lamented pastor. With mournful honors they are conveyed to the grave, and the beautiful service is read. How tearfully sad is the repeated "alas, my brother!" as the sprigs of evergreen are cast upon the coffin! "It is the will of God—so mote it be, amen." "Dust unto dust, ashes unto ashes, and the spirit unto the God who gave it."

Returning to the chapel, Bro. Wright, of Bastrop, La., preached an eloquent funeral sermon from the text: "Thou shalt die and not live." And we went that we should see no more on earth the face of him who had labored so faithfully among us.

July 4th.—We met, in a social way, our neighbors at Jones' Chapel; had an eloquent oration and sermon from Bro. J. C. Faulk; the "Declaration" read by Mr. Freeland; then a most sociable dinner. To the church again, and songs of praise, with prayer and the sweet converse of Christians, while away the hours of our glorious anniversary.

How appropriate than to spend it in God's service!—"Our Father" cares not for worldly pomp, or the booming of cannon; but the sacrifice of an humble, grateful heart is ever acceptable unto Him. Had the thousands of dollars given by the different cities, towns and villages, for the purpose of feasting, rioting, and millinary display, been placed in the hands of suitable persons, for the building and finishing of churches, asylums, or other benificent works, and the people of the nation have met to praise God with voice and heart, and to distribute portions to the poor, blessings would have been poured out on us, as a nation that would have caused our hearts to rejoice in God our Benefactor. But, alas! the spirit of the world reigns, and nearly every newspaper published in our beloved country will record the murder of one, two or more immortal souls sent without warning to the eternal world, on this day, that should be a blessing and a thanksgiving to all.

Children's Column.

"EMMA, DEAR!"

As these words were uttered in a low tone of reproach, a little flushed face and pouting lips were turned to the speaker, Kittie Summers, whose soft hazel eyes betrayed the presence of washed tears, "how could you treat little Willie so?"

"I don't care if I did," cried Miss Emma, making a desperate attempt to justify herself. "See how he has spoilt all the beautiful flowers on this new bed papa gave me this morning. I started out for a walk with Eva and Mary Clive this evening; but I suppose I'll have to stay at home now," and a cloud passed over the beautiful brow as her gaze met the hat, with its crushed flowers, laying on the grass.

"Oh, Emma, Emma! you will break my heart. What would our mother say, were she to see you now?"

As that one word, breathed forth in mournful tones, fell upon Emma's ear, with a long, low sigh of anguish she fell at her sister's feet.

"Oh, sister Kittie! I shall never see mamma again, I am so naughty. Please forgive me. Kiss me, as she used to, when she called me darling, and said I should be an angel, if I would be good, love God, and do as you bid me."

Mr. Summers was a widower. Six months before, he had laid the idol of his heart in the village church-yard. He had three children—Kittie, Emma, and his beautiful baby-boy Willie. Kittie, although but twelve years of age, had endeared herself to all hearts by sweet womanly and christian graces. Yes, children, at that early age Kittie was a true christian. To her, by her dying mother, was committed the charge of her little brother and sister, and nobly did she strive to do her duty.

Emma, our heroine, was possessed of an extremely affectionate disposition; but, alas! she was passionate.—Though her angry bursts were only momentary, they gave her sister a great deal of uneasiness. Often did she tell her how sinful it was, and that God would not love her. Then she would talk of their mother, an angel in the "glory land." Emma idolized her mother. Often when in a passion, that name, tearfully spoken by her sister, like "magic music," would roll over her soul, breaking up the deep fountains, and she would lay sobbing for hours perfectly subdued.

Oh, children, what a pitiful sight! Try and never get in a passion, for by so doing you call down upon yourself the displeasure of your Heavenly Father, and draw tears of blood from Jesus, the "man of sorrows."

GENEVRAE BELLE.

THE CAPTIVE TEXAN BOY.

My little friends, I will tell you a story of a little boy who was stolen by, and lived with, the Indians, for nearly a year.

Away off on the frontier of Texas, there lives a wild and savage tribe of Indians, known as the Caninuches. Sometimes small parties of them slip down into the settlements for the purpose of stealing horses and mules, and sometimes they murder entirely families, or perchance they may not kill some of the younger ones, but carry them away off to their wild homes and rear them up as servants.

In the summer of 1859, two Comanches came to the house of a Mr. H., residing in Mason Co., Texas, and after stealing his horses, discovered his bright-eyed little boy, only ten years old, playing at some distance from the house. They approached him slily, and having secured him, he was tied on a horse. The little fellow cried for help, but no one heard him, and away went the Indians at full speed, carrying the little boy with them. Toward night he was missed. Search was made, but little Willie could not be found. As soon as it was discovered that the horses were also missing, it at once became apparent that the Indians had stolen the animals, and carried off into captivity with them the dear little boy.

Although the savages were warmly pursued, they could not be overtaken, and the kind-hearted people, who had followed them, were compelled to return.

The first day the Indians travelled seventy miles, and at night tied their little prisoner hand and foot to prevent his escape—but after that night he was permitted to run loose, although carefully watched. He was thus so far from a habitation that he could not make his escape and reach the settlement, without running great risk of starving to death or being devoured by some wild beast. At night he would think of saying his prayers; and his fond mother, who had taught him to say, "Now I lay me down to sleep," was thought of. His eyes would fill with tears, his little heart would almost break, to think that he would never again behold her. Then he would cry aloud, and keep it up until his nature was exhausted, when he would fall asleep. When he was hungry, he was fed on raw horse-flesh, without bread; and when he was sleepy, instead of having a nice bed upon which to sleep, the cold ground was his bed and the starry heavens his covering.

Weeks and months passed, and poor Willie had not been heard from, though morning, noon, and night prayers were offered up by distressed parents for his safe return; yet it did seem as if little hope could be entertained that he would ever be seen again. But God, who watches over, and cares for every living creature, was the friend of Willie and so directed his feet as to keep him from harm until some way would be given him to escape.

One Sabbath in April, after he had been given up as dead, or lost forever, he suddenly appeared at home, and throwing himself in his mother's arms, exclaimed: "Mother, God has sent me to you." Had he risen from the dead, he could not surprise or please his fond parents more. I saw the father of this little boy day or so since, and as he related the hardships of his little son while he was with the Indians, the tears moistened his cheek, but when he told me how surprised and delighted he was when he first saw him after his return, the old man could no longer control himself, but cried like a child for joy.

Willie's escape was effected in this way. He was sold to some Mexicans for $400, and bought from them by Kit Carson, who kept him in his own family, clothed him and fed him, until an opportunity offered to send him home.—Exchange paper.

THREE POETS IN A PUZZLE.

I led the horse to the stable, when a fresh perplexity arose. I removed the harness without difficulty; but, after many strenuous attempts, I could not remove the collar. In despair, I called for assistance, when paid soon drew near. Mr. Wordsworth brought his ingenuity into exercise, but after several unsuccessful efforts he relinquished the achievement as a thing altogether impracticable. Mr. Coleridge now tried his hand, but showed no more grooming skill than his predecessor; for, after he twisted the poor horse's neck almost to strangulation, and to the great danger of his eyes, he gave up the useless task, pronouncing that the horse's head must have grewa (gout or dropsy) since the collar was put on, for he said it was downright impossibility for such a huge os frontis to pass through so narrow a collar. Just at this moment a servant girl came near, and understanding the cause of our consternation, "Ln, master," said she, "you don't go about the work in the right way. You should do this," when turning the collar completely upside down, she slipped it off in a moment, to our great humiliation and wonderment, each satisfied afresh that there were heights of knowledge in the world, to which we had not yet attained.—Cottle's Life of Coleridge.

"SUCH A CROSS CRITTER."

Did our readers ever know of any good in being cross? The following incident gives a case where being cross seems to have been a benefit. This "Sister Nance" must have been a comfort to live with. We should think one such would be enough, even in a family of "leven" brothers and sisters.

A man traveling not long since in Illinois called at a house near the road-side to ask a drink of water, when the following conversation occurred:

"Well, my boy, how long have you lived here?"

"I don't know, sir; but mother says ever since I was born."

"Have you any brothers or sisters?"

"Yes, a few."

"How many?"

"Ten or 'leven, I reckon."

"Pretty healthy here, isn't it?"

"Yes; but sometimes we have a little ager."

"Any of you got it now?"

"Yes, a few on us goin' to have the shakes this afternoon."

"How many?"

"Why, all on us except Sister Nance, and she's such a cross critter the ager won't take on her; and if it did she is so contrary she wouldn't shake nohow you could fix it."

TAKE WARNING.—A young girl was struck blind on the 31st ult., in the city of Baltimore, under singular and awe-inspiring circumstances. She had been accused by her aunt of falsehood, which she positively denied, calling upon God to strike her blind if she was not telling the truth. In a moment after, a film began to gather over her eyes, destroying the sight, and leading her to confess her guilt.

Tribute of Respect.

REV. SAMUEL HAWES.—Bartholemew Lodge, No. 112, Plantersville, La., upon the announcement of his death, adopted the following resolutions:

1. That in his death our Lodge has been deprived of a worthy member, the Church of a zealous christian, the Conference of an able and worthy minister, and our country of a worthy citizen.

2. That while we mourn the loss of our brother, may we cherish his virtues, follow his example and precepts, and bow to the will of God.

3. That in token of our love, not only of his virtues, but of his untiring zeal in the cause of Christianity, and to this our beloved institution, we wear the usual badge of mourning thirty days.

4. That we tender to his bereaved companion and relatives our warmest sympathy, and pray and hope that the grace of God may sustain her and them, not to weep as those who have no hope, for we know that he is not dead, but calmly sleeps in Jesus.

REV. BENJAMIN C. STEARNS laid his armor down on the 10th June, 1860, in his forty-sixth year, and bade farewell to the toils and strife of earth to wear the victor's crown and enjoy that rest that remains for the people of God. Brother Steagall was a native of Georgia, Jasper county, where he embraced religion when quite a youth. He died on the second night of the week, and near the same hour, that he embraced religion in an upper room of his father's house, and came down shouting the praises of God with his youthful tongue. His brother, J. W. Steagall, and R. B. Jones were present on that occasion, and were present when death accomplished its work on his mortal body. He remarked to them, a few days before his death, that the same Jesus who converted his soul in the State of Georgia was with him still, and that he had no fear of death. The writer of this notice made his acquaintance in 1847, in Washita parish, La., where he lived and died. Since that time we were intimate friends. He was one of our best men. He had a heart to weep with those who wept, and to rejoice with those that rejoiced. He had a word of consolation for all that applied, and many there are in those ends of the earth that will call him blessed in the great day of accounts. He won the esteem and confidence of all classes. He had exalted views of the Christian religion. He was a good scripturian; and an acceptable preacher. The writer was with him during his illness, and at the closing scene, when the chill of death was on him, I asked him if his faith was unwavering. He replied, "Certainly, Bro. Williams; how could it be otherwise?" Thus the good man died, full of faith and hope. I may not enter the sacred enclosures of family sorrow, or reveal the pent-up anguish of a widow's heart, or children's deep abiding grief. These alone could reveal what he was in the family circle. Many of the ministers of Louisiana will feel sad at heart when they hear that bro. S. is dead. For fifteen years his house was their retreat and home; the writer has often received a kind welcome there. Brother Steagall joined the Conference about the year 1836, and has sustained his relation to the Conference, with very little exception. He was located at his own request for a short time, but renewed his relation some years past, and has been traveling over since, when his health would admit. At the time of his death he sustained a supernumerary relation.

MRS. PARTHENIA HAYDEN died in Columbus, Miss., on 5th July, 1860. She was born in Wilkes county, Ga., on 20th March, 1794. Her maiden name was Parthenia Irion. At the age of sixteen or seventeen she married Mr. John Thurman, who died in 1839; in June, 1846, she married Mr. James Hayden.—Her only child which survived the period of infancy (the late Mrs. McLaran) died in 1851, and consequently she died childless. In 1824 she removed to North Alabama, and in 1825 she professed religion and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1844 she removed to the vicinity of Columbus. She lived a retired life, finding her happiness in the society of her relations and immediate friends. She was devotedly attached to her family connections, and acted the part of a mother to many of them. She performed many kind and generous acts, and died deeply lamented by her large circle of relatives. Sister Hayden was modest and unobtrusive in her piety. She was deeply impressed with the necessity of holiness as a qualification for heaven, and manifested a great desire to have the visits, instructions and prayers of her ministers during her last illness. Bro. Hargrove, her pastor, and myself, often visited her, and had many interesting seasons in conversing with her on the subject of religion. Her last illness was protracted, and she gradually declined for several months. She always professed to have faith in Christ, but desired a brighter manifestation. She loved to hear the songs of Zion, and often united with us in singing. As she approached nearer her dissolution, her prospects brightened, and a few hours before death every cloud was dispelled, and she was happy in the Lord, and praised him for his love. She gave her dying messages to each of her relations present; and exhorted them to be earnest christians, and meet her in heaven.—She sent a like message to her servants, and then quietly fell asleep in Jesus.

GEO. SHARTER.

Columbus, July 19, 1860.

MRS. CAROLINE M. CLEVELAND, wife of Morgan S. Cleveland, of Dallas county, Ala., and daughter of Mrs. C. M. Pinson, of Summerfield, died on the 11th May last. She enjoyed all the advantages of wealth and received all the accomplishments it could give. By close reading and thought she had prepared herself for intercourse with the refined and the erudite; yet she was fascinated with the exhilirating pleasures of the young and the gay, and seemed careless of her soul, until God in love laid his afflicting hand upon her, which broke her proud spirit, and caused her to look to Him who gave himself for her, and to accept him as her Savior. For two months before she died she was resigned to the will of her Heavenly Father, and bore her severe sufferings without a murmur; often assuring those around her that her sins were pardoned through Jesus, who was very dear to her soul. She suffered intense pain, but when at ease she spoke composedly of death and desired her friends to read and sing of heaven. She knew her self; and bear testimony to her many endearing qualities of mind and heart; we remember well the joy her presence always caused, the sunshine her pleasant smile always made in our hearts; we loved her as our sister, and feel that He who doeth all things well hath afflicted us sorely. But our loss is her gain.

PASTOR.

MRS. ELIZABETH P. McCURDY, daughter of John and Mary Chandler, was born in Hancock Co., Ga., and died at her residence in Dallas Co., Ala., in May, 1860. Sister McCurdy was a member of the Methodist Church for more than forty-five years, and always maintained a good profession; consistent and decided in her attachment to the Church. She came to this State some time in 1819, and passed through scenes and services well calculated to try her faith and test the genuineness of her religion. In all these her faith wavered not, and her piety suffered no abatement. She bore her sufferings with patience, and served her Savior with marked fidelity. She was twice married and survived her last husband—A. P. McCurdy, Esq.—but a few days. Her end was triumphant.

PROGRESS OF PROTESTANTISM IN MISSISSIPPI AND THE SOUTH-WEST.—No. XXVII.

Mr. Editor—Harbord Hood and his wife, formerly of Lake Providence, should be gratefully remembered by their successors in the Methodist Episcopal Church in all that region, for they were the first to introduce the gospel, through our ministers, into that portion of the State, and were its warm supporters until death. I think they were from Kentucky originally, and they must have settled on the Lake as early as 1800. I presume they were without property when they were married, and from the fact that Mr. Hood was without a literary education, I suppose his early advantages were very limited. But they were a very industrious and economical couple, and having lived near thirty years on the Lake before the land came into market, they were permitted to cultivate the richest soil in the world without even paying taxes on it. But though the land was rich, the range boundless, and fish and game in great abundance, with the Mississippi river within a few miles, they found it difficult for a quarter of a century to accumulate property much beyond the present wants of their family. I first visited him in 1825, and my recollection is that he then worked only about eight hands. But when the lands came into market he accumulated property very fast. He entered these fertile lands to the extent of his ability, and, being an excellent woodsman, he was employed by other capitalists to locate and enter lands upon shares; some of these lands he improved for his own use, and others he sold at very remunerative prices, so that he amassed a large fortune in a few years. In 1833 he said to me one day that it was as easy then for him to buy a good field hand, as it had been to buy a cow and calf a few years before. Such was his success in life, that he became an object of envy and jealousy among some who were less enterprising, and they even insinuated that he must have used foul means somewhere to acquire so much property. This I never believed, for he not only had all the external marks of a strictly honest man about him, but I knew him when he was poor, and was familiar with the most important transactions which were evolved in the accumulation of his vast estate. Though he was uneducated, in the usual sense of that term, he was one of the best financiers, as well as one of the most energetic men in all the country, and could pick up a fortune where most men would think it impossible to find one. But I look upon his connection with the Church, and the aid he afforded in planting the gospel in that region as of infinitely greater importance to earth and heaven than his financial successes.

Previous to 1825 the settlement on Lake Providence was isolated from all the world; perhaps up to that date a sermon had never been preached within forty miles of the place. Mr. and Mrs. Hood began to feel their personal need of the public means of grace, and then they had children grown who had never heard a sermon in the neighborhood, and perhaps no where else. This familiar of the word of the Lord could be endured no longer—they must have a preacher at any cost. Ashley Hewitt, the apostle of Louisiana, was applied to, and Mr. Hood proposed to settle him on a piece of land near his residence, and assist him in putting up the necessary buildings if he would agree to preach for them as much as his feeble health would allow. Brother Hewitt looked on the proposal as a Providential call to carry the gospel into "the regions beyond," and early in 1826 he left the Prairie Mer Rouge for his new home on Lake Providence. Mr. Hood's house was opened for preaching, and himself and wife, and several members of his family, with a few others in the neighborhood, soon united in forming the first church on the Lake. Let our historians note the fact, that the gospel was first preached, and the first church was organized on Lake Providence, in 1826, by Ashley Hewitt. In November of that year, Alexander Talley, P.E. of the Louisiana District, and myself, had to start on horseback on one of our pleasant little jaunts to Cooleeree, which was to convene in December, in the city of Tuscaloosa, Ala., a distance, I suppose, of not more than five or six hundred miles. But what was that for such houseless, homeless wanderers as we were! Houseless and homeless? No. We kept house in our saddle bags, and our home was in the wilderness, and a merry time we had surveying the vast domain of the original Mississippi Conference. But to return to the subject: by the request of brother Hewitt we sent forward an appointment for a two days' meeting at Lake Providence, which was the first ever held there. At night we preached in private houses, and in the day held forth the word of life under a new gin-house, belonging to Messrs. Martin and Keane. Dr. Talley met with a singular trial during the delivery of his sermon on Sunday. A woman with a babe in her arms took a seat just in front of the beam of timber, upon which the Doctor stood, and soon after he announced his text the child began to cry lustily and kept it up for three quarters of an hour. The propriety of taking it out of the congregation never seemed to enter her mind until the Doctor paused and expressed a wish that it might be quieted in some way. She then rose up and walked a few steps in the rear of the stand, and after a few unsuccessful efforts to quiet her babe, she came round in front again and said aloud, "I reckon I'll have to take this child home, for I can't make it hush." With this the Doctor gave up and sat down, and, according to previous arrangement, I proceeded with the service.

Ashley Hewitt was on the Lake in 1826, as a supernumerary preacher, and in 1827 and 1828 as a supernumerary. After that it was regularly supplied as other circuits were. In the meantime brother Hood and his kind hearted neighbors put up a church, and soon after established a camp-ground, where we began to work Methodism four square, without knocking the corners off, and many were the happy and prosperous times we had there among the early settlers on the Lake and River adjacent. Brother Hood's was head-quarters for the preachers, and a more hospitable home they have never found in that country. In 1833, when I was on Lake Providence District, my little family resided some time at brother Hood's, and my daily intercourse with him and his excellent wife, led me to place a high estimate on their humble and unaffected piety. Most of their children preceded them to the spirit land, and I presume they have now but few descendants to represent them on earth. I hope the Church and her ministers will always have nursing fathers and mothers in the region of Lake Providence, but Harbord Hood and his wife were the first they ever had there. I now propose to close these brief sketches for the present, but if I can make my pen interesting and useful to my fellow-christians, when I have time I will write again. I might have extended these outlines indefinitely, but I did not think it advisable to do so, and have therefore selected, here and there, such representative characters and facts as would best illustrate the times of which I have written.

J. G. Jones.

EUROPEAN CORRESPONDENCE.

Newcastle-under-Lyne, England, July 17, 1860.

Mr. Editor—At the close of my last communication I was giving you an account of our visit to Trentham, one of the country seats of the Duke of Sutherland. His lordship is one of the wealthiest, if not the wealthiest, of the English Peers, his annual income being variously estimated at from three to four hundred thousand pounds. He is not now at Trentham, but as Parliament is in session, is we suppose living at Stafford House, one of the noblest palaces in London. Besides his other possessions the Duke has a vast estate in Scotland, extending all across the kingdom, on which lives a tenantry numbering more than twenty-one thousand persons. Some bad things have been circulated in American papers about the cruelty of the fathers of the present Duke to his tenantry, which, if we may place reliance upon the testimony of the author of Uncle Tom's Cabin, are all false; and it will be seen from the inscription on his monument, given below, that his tenantry at Trentham had a high regard for him, after he was dead. Mrs. Stowe helps us to the following facts, extracted from a speech made by Mr. Loch, the general agent of the Sutherland estate, in the House of Commons, on the second reading of the Scotch poor law bill, which throws a melancholy light on the condition of the peasantry on the Sutherland estate half a century ago.

"They were," said he, "every now and then exposed to all the difficulties of extreme famine, and obliged to bleed their cattle during the winter, and mix the blood with the remnant of the oatmeal that they had, in order to secure them from starvation."

Leaving our carriage and horses at the Trentham Inn, we called at the porter's lodge, and after some delay succeeded in procuring permission to enter the gardens, and the services of one of the gardeners as our guide, who, after we had entered our names in the visitors' book, escorted us through the gardens and pleasure ground connected with the Hall. The garden occupies about eighty acres, through which the river Trent, quite a narrow stream, pours its waters, and forms a small Lake between the garden and the woods at one end of the park. The river is spanned by light and graceful iron bridges; and stately swans are seen gliding over the bosom of the stream. In the open air, in green-houses, hot-houses, and conservatories, not only multitudes of herbs, trees, fruits and flowers, indigenous to Great Britain, in the highest state of cultivation, but exotics from almost every clime; and art has done its utmost to display the gorgeous productions of nature in such bewildering forms of beauty as mock all my attempts at description. Forty-five gardeners, as we were told by our guide, are constantly employed as Adam was in Eden, "to dress it and to keep it." In front of the hall, surrounded by beautiful shrubbery and flowers, we noticed statues of the four seasons, Persons with the head of Medusa, and others which we had not time to examine. The Hall is a plain, substantial edifice of brick and stucco, of the Corinthian order, with an Italian tower and gateway, which were added to the original structure by the present Duke. It did not strike me as being remarkable for size or beauty, or as being equal to its surroundings. As we passed through, we saw many beautiful and interesting things which my space will not allow me to mention; but I must not omit to notice the "childrens' garden," a portion of which we understood was allotted to the children of the present duke, and which was cultivated by and for them when they were children. At the end of it is a substantial house, containing several rooms. Through the window of the front room, we saw a large collection of toys, playthings, and curiosities for children. In the centre of the room was a table, with a miniature tea-service, chairs, etc. The back room of the house is neatly furnished as a kitchen, in which the children could exercise themselves in the great art of cookery, and supply themselves with such viands as might suit their youthful fancy. At a short distance we saw the dog's tombstone with an inscription to the memory of a dog! Here it is—

"SPERCH,
Stafford's first dog,
An attached and devoted Animal,
Died Aug. 11, 1841."

It struck me that in many cases it would be much better, as far as this present life is concerned, to be a nobleman's dog than to be one of the laborers on his estate. But all dogs are not so highly favored.

"At Trentham Hall "a dog was found,
As many dogs there be,
It ate mongrel, puppy, whelp and hound,
And cats of low degree."

The reader will supply what is wanting at his leisure, and we will pass on.

On some of the garden beds, lines of box had been planted so form in large capitals the names of the Duke's married daughters, as "Elizabeth Loroe," "Evelyn Blantyre," and others. Our guide was remarkably silent and evidently disposed to pass us along rapidly, without leaving us time to examine anything very closely, no doubt fearing that if we were not hastened in our journey through this aristocratic paradise, he would be detained from his dinner; but when we put some silver coins in his hand, a smile passed over his countenance, and he became more communicative. "This," said he, "is the favorite residence of the Duke, as it is warmer than his other places. They have a deal of company when they are here, but they seldom come for more than a week or two at a time, except in the winter season."

Passing out of the garden about noon, we had a beautiful drive through the park, where the deer were bounding across the green sward, and fat cattle were peacefully feeding or reclining under the stately trees. Parties of pedestrians, and others in carriages of various kinds, were passing up and down the avenues of the park, and bright-eyed, rosy-cheeked children were merrily amusing themselves with sports upon the lawn. On the first or second Thursday of August every year there is a grand holiday, called "Trentham day," when these magnificent grounds are open to the public, and on these occasions fifty or sixty thousand persons have been known to assemble in the park, to forget for a few hours the toils of the factory, the mine or the field, and the dull routine of ordinary life. The termination of the route was at the base of a hill, on which "the monument" stands. This is a colossal statue of the late Duke of Sutherland, on a high granite pedestal, in which he is represented as overlooking what were his vast domains. But he, too, with all his wealth, had to die. The inscription on the monument is as follows:

GEORGE GRANVILLE,
Duke of Sutherland, Marquis of Stafford, K.G.
An upright and patriotic nobleman,
A judicious, kind, and liberal landlord,
Who identified the improvement of his vast estates
With the prosperity of all who cultivated them.
A public, yet unostentatious benefactor,
Who, while he provided for the ample rental
For the active laborer,
Opened wide his hand to the distressed,
Of the widow, the sick, and the traveller.
A mourning and grateful tenantry,
Uniting with the inhabitants of the neighborhood,
Erect this pillar,
A. D., 1834.

As we sat at the base of this monument, and partook of the cold collation provided by our lady friends, the prospect around us was very extensive and beautiful. The hill on which we stood was covered on its sloping sides with fern, gorse, Scotch broom, and other shrubs, with a profusion of flowers of white and blue, green and gold, while the hills and plains beneath exhibited to our view a large number of fertile fields of wheat, oats and potatoes, and the hedge-rows that divide one field from another, were of a darker green, and appeared like broad and beautiful lines crossing in various directions. I notice that in this section the soil is of a dark red color, and as we cast our eyes around us in the distance, we saw here and there the little fields with the fresh earth turned up, containing the newly-sown grain, surrounded by beautiful hawthorn hedges, shining in the sun-light, like rubies set with borders of green, and these, with the pasture fields in which cattle and sheep are grazing, beautifully bespangled with daisies buttercups, primroses and other wild flowers, and fields of different colored grain, and hill-sides covered with fern, delight the eye with the appearance of beautiful mosaic work, while overhead the birds are on the wing, all the while cheering us with their merry songs. This is a kind of scenery which those only accustomed to the broad expansive fields and "grand old woods" of the southern and western portions of our own land are entirely unacquainted with. One field that I have seen in America would make almost a dozen such as are found around us now, but these are much more highly cultivated. Almost hidden from our view by the groves that surround them, we see in every direction the mansions of the rich and the cottages of the poor, while in the distance, with a dark cloud of smoke overshadowing them, we see spires, steeples, chimneys, &c., of the manufacturing towns. We are aroused from our reverie by a loud rattling noise, and looking down the valley we hear the snorting of the iron horse, and see him almost flying on his way to London, with a long train of carriages, and we exclaim, "these are the triumphs of industry and science, these are the proofs of the dignity and grandeur of humanity, these are the blessings of civilization," and if England could be freed from the scourge of intemperance and other vices; if her people would all fear God and keep his commandments, this would be truly a glorious land, and the traveller, from afar might cry out, as one of the Hebrew bards did with regard to Israel in the olden time, "Happy art thou, Oh Albion, who is like unto thee, O people, saved by the Lord. The eternal God is thy refuge, underneath are the everlasting arms."

But we cannot stay long in the Elysian fields; we must come down, and grapple with the cold, dull realities of life, and do our part of the work assigned to us in this sin-disordered world. While we do this we may learn from the bright things that we occasionally see on earth something of the wisdom power, and goodness of God, and to look for our home in a place of permanent happiness beyond the bounds of time!

On our way homeward, in a distance of four miles, we took another route, and pass through several other villages, and by the gate of Keele Park, the residence of Ralph Sneyd, Esq., one of the wealthiest landowners in the county, whose gardens and pleasure grounds are said to be in some respects more beautiful than those at Trentham. But we have not time to enter, and we only enjoy a distant view of these things. Our horses draw us swiftly along a road smooth and hard as a house floor, and we are regaled with fragrance from the flowers and the new-mown hay, as we pass along, the children sing—

"Little words of kindness,
Little deeds of love,
Make this earth an Eden,
Like to heaven above."

And soon we plunge again into the busy streets and smoky atmosphere of the dark-looking old town, and are home soon enough for a pleasant gathering at the family board, where, over the cup that cheers, but not inebriates, we talk over the incidents of a very happy day.

John Bayley.

P. S. Since writing the above, I have attended a meeting at one of the Wesleyan Chapels in the Newcastle circuit. Although it was a week-night meeting, and raining, there was a good congregation, and we had an excellent sermon. The Wesleyans have had a good time here during the past year, and an increase in their membership of 150. The Wesleyan Conference is now in session in London, and I expect to go up to the city next week, from which place you may expect to hear from me again. J. B.

COMMENCEMENT AT AUBURN.

The first Commencement of the East Alabama Male College, beginning on the 8th July, and closing on the 11th, was an occasion of great interest. The Church on Sabbath was crowded to its utmost capacity, by the old and sage, and the young and beautiful, who had come to witness this first literary festival. The sermon on that occasion was characterized by that good sense and sound analysis, which distinguishes Dr. McTyeire as one of the thinkers of the age. Monday evening was occupied by the speakers of the Sophomore class. A prize, to be given to the best declaimer, glittered before their vision, and aroused in them a spirit of emulation. The successful competitor for the first prize was a Mr. Patillo of Macon county, a young man of sincere and earnest character, religious and studious, and promising to reflect honor upon the College, and upon the Church. The Committee of award found it difficult to decide upon whom to bestow the second prize, as several of the class seemed to possess equal merit. It was submitted to lot, and fell to Mr. R. Drake, son of Dr. Drake of Auburn. This is a fine class of promising young men. On the second day was the Junior exhibition. With each succeeding day the interest increased, and the youths were visited by multitudes. Each passing train brought Irish guests to this educational feast. The young men who spoke, generally did well, some admirably.

Col. J. W. A. Sanford, of Montgomery, delivered the prizes of the Sophomore class in an elegant speech on eloquence. It must have made a fine impression on the students, and have stimulated their minds to strive for the mastery in this field of excellence. Ours is a nation of speakers; and nearly every school-boy expects to be an orator, and to wreathe his brow with the laurels of glory. This is a noble ambition when sanctified by religion, for it leads the aspirant to seek for such qualifications as will fit him for extended usefulness.

On the 11th, Commencement day, the graduating class of five handsome young men addressed the large and delighted audience on the following themes: A. F. Woolley of Cass county, Ga.—The Glory of America; W. C. Tarash, Orrville, Alabama—Lives of Great Men; B. B. Lumsden, Talbot county, Ga.—Party Spirit; F. S. Johnson, Jr., Clinton, Ga.—Superstition; W. F. Glenn, (first honor) Floyd county, Ga.—Valedictory. While we can but speak in terms of high commendation of each of the speakers, yet we cannot refrain from particularizing the last as greatly meritorious. Its conception, spirit and delivery, made it peculiarly entertaining to the audience. May those noble five young men, who have together launched their barks upon life's uncertain sea, though storm-tossed and scattered asunder it may be, arrived safely at last in the haven of the Holy Jerusalem, and receive the "well done" of their Lord and Master!

Next in order was the address of the Hon. J. F. Dowdell before the two literary societies, the Wirt and Webster. This effort won for the distinguished gentleman increased distinction as an orator. Intelligent men bestowed upon it the highest praise. His remarks upon the praise of men, the vanity of the world, as contrasted with the praise and glory of God, were powerfully impressive. His positions were based upon and proven by the word of God. This is his standard of morality, to be planted as a controlling power and sanctifying principle in every system of education. Then followed the Baccalaureate address of the President Sassnett. It may be said of that address, that it needed nothing to add to its completeness. It contained the wholesome counsel of one who has thoughtfully studied the great ends of life. Every thing connected with the address indicated his deep sympathy with those young persons who were about to leave his daily instructions to go into the world to assume the responsibilities of manhood, and to become the arbiters of their own future destiny. He urged them, as a security against the loss of mental excellence, to avoid idleness and hanging, to go to some kind of honorable labor. The words so fitly spoken were highly appreciated by the young men, for they manifested a desire to have the address published, that they might take it home with them to be a manual and a guide amid the perils of their earthly career.

At night, there was a Commencement party; at which were assembled, in cheerful and smiling intercourse, persons of all ages, ranging from the sexagenarian down to budding childhood. It is estimated that about a thousand persons attended on this festal occasion. All appeared to have dismissed dull care, and to have come up to receive and to contribute a large share of entertainment. Thus ended the first Commencement of the East Alabama College. The next morning found a crowd of students assembled at the depot, taking friendly leave of each other, and the kind families with whom they have been associated. We profoundly hope they have returned to their anxious parents, not only improved in mind, but in morals.

This Institution has been highly prosperous. The catalogue just published shows a list of 241 pupils in the Preparatory School and College. Prof. Slaton, the deservedly popular and successful teacher, still remains the principal of the Preparatory Department. The trustees are gratified at being able to add to the faculty the Hon. J. F. Dowdell, ex-member of Congress. He is a graduate of Randolph Macon College, and a devoted Christian, ready to consecrate his powers to the service of God and the Church. He fills the chair of English literature. East Alabama Male College is prepared to co-operate with her sister Institutions of the Church, to advance Christian education, and to bless mankind. It was very gratifying to see several ministers of the Alabama Conference present on this occasion: Revs. J. T. Heard, F. G. Ferguson, J. W. Lancy, and others. Some, too, from Georgia.

COMMENCEMENT OF TUSCALOOSA FEMALE COLLEGE.

Mr. Editor: A visit to Tuscaloosa during the annual Commencement of Tuscaloosa Female College, under the charge of the Rev. F. M. Grace, invites the first attempt on the part of your correspondent to note out, through the columns of your valuable paper, a merited favorable notice. His special attention had been directed to this institution on account of the unusually elevated position assigned it by its able corps of instructors, as also the high grade of scholarship necessary to graduation—the latter not inferior to many of the male colleges in this country. This was my third visit to the institution within the scholastic term, thus enabling me to form the acquaintance of all the Faculty, and investigate, as far as my abilities permitted, its claims as an institution worthy that high position. I had longed to find, for a special purpose, a female college at which young ladies might derive equal advantages with their brothers. The education of some within my knowledge had received such direction, and gladly embraced the opportunity of continuing in like direction at this institution.

Amongst the many attractive features brought to view during the commencement, none were more prominent than the quarter in ovalo on the part of the worthy President, which cast a serenity over the whole exercises, and the general tenor of which had won the esteem and confidence of the pupils. Combined with the care and oversight of the whole was no amount of special instruction in several of the most important studies, that brought him prominently before the audience in conducting the examination. Impartial and candid, the bona fide character of the examination was apparent to all. I beg leave to state in this connection, one, to my mind, most excellent plan that has been inaugurated by President Grace, and which will serve the young ladies in future years as a cause of gratitude. I refer to the extraordinary efforts to engraft upon their memories historical data. To this end there had been a very judicious selection of prize paintings, executed by a master hand, elegantly framed, and ready to be awarded by committees, in attendance. This had a tendency to excite zeal, not, however, to an undue degree, and the final award created no ostensible dissatisfaction on the part of the competitors who failed to obtain them, thus evincing an elevated standard of moral training, both at home and in college. It was very difficult for the committee to decide amongst a number who seemed to be equally entitled, and in fact a very trivial circumstance gave the casting vote.

The classes in Latin, under Prof. Engler, exhibited a thorough acquaintance with the multifarious character of that important study, but especially to three most essential, viz., Mythology, Scanning, and Synonyms. The initiated seemed perfectly satisfied that Prof. Engler fully sustained his reputation as a thorough scholar and able instructor, not only in this but equally in other branches—Chemistry, Natural Philosophy, etc.

The examination in the primary department was equally satisfactory. The lady who has charge of this department, Miss Marlow, had been selected for this most important post, in view of her amiable character, ability, and happy talent in the art of teaching; tending to the formation of early character, habits of study, gentility of manners, and wholesome discipline.

The Musical department, so ably conducted by Prof. Gruber, has for several years given evidence of a skill rarely equalled. The perfect time, tasteful and difficult selections (appropriate to a denominational college), and the absence of other extraneous instruments, so frequently calculated to drown the music, held enraptured a very large audience until a late hour on Wednesday night, the 4th of July.

Thus closed one of the most satisfactory examinations it has been my lot to witness, for a period of twenty-five years, during which time the writer has been almost constantly engaged in the business of teaching.

WHO WILL GO TO CENTRAL AND SOUTH AMERICA?

Mr. Editor:—I have been intending all along to furnish some additional numbers for your paper. I wished, especially, to set forth the facts that render Central and South America an inviting missionary field. Before I left for those countries, it was agreed among us, that but little should be published on this subject for the present, as we wished to avoid premature steps; hence I said very little upon this subject in my letters to your paper. I think it is generally agreed now, that the time for such reserve is past, that we ought not only to publish, but to act. I find the substance of my last report to the Board in the Christian Advocate, and forward it to you for republication. I will only add, that the revolutionary movements now in progress in New Granada need not deter us from sending forward missionaries a day. They can pass through the country in safety at almost all times—as foreigners, who do not intermeddle with their strifes are always respected. Those people have a certain respect for "Brother Jonathon." Peace, I doubt not, will soon be restored.

J. Hamilton.

"As missionaries, we mean. The field promises a large and comparatively ready yield to Christian labor. The way into it seems to be open. The hearts of our people are favorable to missionary enterprise in that direction. The distance is not great, and is continually lessening. The language is not difficult. The cost of living is not high. The climate is not insalubrious. There are multitudes of people accessible—a people in many respects prepared of the Lord. They are our neighbors. The Popish system, erroneous in doctrine, intolerant in government, is now effete, broken, powerless, and holds them no longer under its dominion. What wait we for?

"Besides what is generally known as to the moral and social condition of those countries, our Missionary Board has within the last four months been put in possession of valuable information, through Rev. Dr. Hamilton, of the Alabama Conference, who went out in December last and returned in June from a pleasant trip and successful exploration, which extended from San Jose, the capital of Costa Rica, down into New Granada.

"At Panama a situation was found and conditionally secured for a gospel minister to be sent out by our Church, which offers great opportunities for present and and prospective usefulness. The salary, made up and sure, is equal to the support received in the best portions of our home work. There is a considerable population, English-speaking, resident there on shore or in harbor. Among the natives there are many means for unobstructed usefulness. Up and down the coast a faithful preacher could extend his labors and influence, and lay the groundwork for the Church of the future. Self-sacrifice is not the question here. Nothing but lack of energy, of the spirit of Pauline enterprise among us, will leave that station longer unoccupied.

"To the flourishing and wealthy and conservative republic of Costa Rica, there is a more open door for Methodist missionaries in the year of grace 1860, than the apostles had to any part of the Roman Empire.—The religious school-teacher would not be out of place there.

"We stand at Troas; New Granada is on the other side of the stream; and a beckoning figure—a man, a brother for whom Christ died—prays us saying, "Come over into Macedonia and help us." Let us immediately endeavor to go, assuredly gathering from all the indications of Providence and the Spirit that the Lord hath called us "for to preach the gospel unto them." Therefore loosing from Troas," let us make a straight course to the chief city of that part of Macedonia. What if the missionaries who go in our name, supported by our means, and followed by our prayers, should encounter the delays, the rebuffs, the persecutions that befell Paul and Silas, would not the results be a compensation? Ours is the same gospel. The presence with us of Jesus, and the signs following the word, are the same. The commission is the same. The promise is the same. O, how labor and trial and success in that field would stir the heart of the Church at home!

"From the final report of Dr. Hamilton to the Standing Committee on Missions, and dated Mobile, Alabama, June 8th, we make some extracts, on the eligibility of Bogota:"

I embrace the earliest opportunity since my return, to communicate to you some of the facts and impressions which I received during my visit to Bogota, the capital of New Granada. And I will say at once, that I am fully impressed with the belief that this country ought to be occupied in preference to all other places in Central and South America; and that Bogota is the proper point for commencing. Some of the reasons for this opinion I will give briefly.

1. New Granada is much the largest and most influential of the family of Republics embraced in the central and northern and western points of South America. It has always held an important position among them, from the extent of its territory, its resources, and from the cultivation and ability of many of its citizens. It furnished the great leader to their struggle for their independence, Guil Bolivar, who was to them what Washington was to us. The establishment of Protestantism, and its embracement by any considerable number of the population of that Republic, will not fail to have its influence upon the surrounding region.

2. This country is farther advanced in ideas, and the true principles of toleration, than any other upon the continent, except our own; and there is a more open adoption and full avowal of these principles and ideas by many of the leading men than in any other.

All religious sustain a different relation to the constitution and laws of the country from that sustained in any other of their States. In other Republics the right of Protestant worship is only secured by treaty stipulation, extorted by diplomacy; here it is a part of the constitution. Catholicism is no longer linked with the Government, but is entirely separated from it and thrown upon its own resources. Thus there is a fair field for competition and effort, and no hindrance to the promulgation of truth.

The people are divided into two parties—the "Liberal" and the "Conservative;" the latter is the Church party, and, of course, opposed to Protestantism. The "Liberal" party is not only liberal in politics, but in religion also. They are not only willing, but desirous, that Protestantism should be introduced into the country. They see in its principles and teachings the only hope of progress and the enlightenment of the masses. This party, as you would infer from this statement alone, embraces generally the more thoughtful and intelligent portion of the community. * * * Of course, educated and situated as they have been, they have little just appreciation of Protestantism as a spiritual religion, but regard it more in the light of a means of social and and intellectual advancement. They see, also, that it improves public morals.

The Church party are now in power, but the Liberals confidently claim a majority of the nation, and they doubtless have much of its intelligence.

* * * * * * *

To show how far liberalism in politics carries its influence into matters of religion, I will mention a single fact: A priest, of high responsibility—a senator in Congress—having charge of a parish of 13,000 souls, came to see me, and spent the evening with me in the most friendly manner, and, upon leaving, pledged me his friendship, and cordially invited me to his parish and house. And during the rage of opposition to the Presbyterian missionaries by the priests' party, he enfranchised them whenever he met them, whether in public or private. Quite a number of priests were inclined to liberal principles—belonged to the liberal party—while the connection of the State with the Church continued; but when the former separated itself from the latter, and threw it into the arms of Rome, which holds the appointing power, their circumstances were so changed that they now keep silent, for fear of losing their places. Some liberals doubt the wisdom of the course pursued by the State in this matter, in it surrendered a controlling hold upon the Church; but the subject was beset with embarrassments.

3. New Granada, and especially Bogota, has a free and independent press, which dares to speak out upon all questions, not excepting religion, and opens its columns for others to discuss them. A leading paper of the Republic, the organ of the liberal party, took the Archbishop and priests to task in a plain, pointed manner, for the Bible-burning scene of last December, and denounced their bigotry. When the press is free, religion has little to fear from opposition, but error every thing, and especially such gross errors as are many of those of Romanism.

4. As you are probably aware, the Presbyterian Church has a mission at Bogota, and two men on the station. At first, when they commenced preaching in Spanish, and some of the natives attended, they met with much opposition from the priests and their party; but this only increased the number of their hearers, and all open opposition has ceased. The mission meets with much favor and sympathy from the liberals—not in word and profession merely, but in subscriptions to aid in the erection of a church. They are both quite young men, and have not the influence that older and more experienced men would have; but while Mr. Pratt, who has been longest there, and who is most familiar with the Spanish language, remained, (he is now in New York, superintending the publication of some works in Spanish,) they had quite a congregation of natives, and many of them of the cultivated class. They have not, as yet, attempted any organization, though some persons among the foreign population have professed faith in Christ, and some natives manifest a deep concern for salvation.

I was received with the utmost kindness and affection by the missionary and his wife, Rev. Mr. Sharp and lady. We had the fullest and freest communications upon all matters pertaining to the field, the work, etc.—He expressed for himself and for his associate, Mr. Pratt, the strongest hope that our Church would send missionaries into that field, and a determination to co-operate with them in a fraternal and Christian spirit.

There are foreigners enough—Americans, English, Scotch, etc.—to make quite a congregation. I preached to them on the Sabbath, and had a crowded room, including several natives, though they understood English but imperfectly. Good might be done among this class. Much regret and disappointment seemed to be felt that I could not remain among them. * * *

5. Bogota is much more of a city than I expected to find it—having 40,000 inhabitants. The better class—and it is quite large—is cultivated and intelligent, much more generally so than any other community I have visited. They are kind, affable, exceedingly polite. I was struck with the fine appearance of the people as soon as I entered the city, as well as with the life and activity everywhere apparent, which contrasted with all I had seen before.

On the whole, therefore, though some of the liberals do not fully understand Christianity, nor seek it as a spiritual religion, yet, in view of all I saw and learned, I could but feel that here is not only a field, but a people, to a great extent, prepared of the Lord, who invite us to send them the word of life.

Is that not a great and effectual door, to enter which the heart of a Judson, a Martyn, a John Hunt, an Asbury, would have desired with a great desire! Are the young men now being educated in the schools of the Church looking as they ought, and laying themselves out for the field of labor? They ought to be studying the Spanish language. St. Paul was—shall we say it?—ambitious. His ambition was not satisfied with entering into other men's labors—falling into easy routine in another man's line of things made ready to his hand. No: for then the geography and history of the early Church would have been different from what they were. One or two men can be mightily left in such a matter. He was bent on "preaching the gospel in the regions beyond."

These who are inclined to this work—and may the Head of the Church move the hearts of many chosen instruments—are requested to open correspondence with Bishop Andrew, Summerfield, Alabama, who has charge.

JUSTICE IN THE PAPAL DOMINIONS.

THE THREE YOUNG MEN OF FERMO.

This sad story is taken from Rev. Dr. Arthur's forthcoming work, "Italy in Transition," about to be published by Messrs. Harper and Brothers:—

"One evening in February, 1849, while the Republic was still in power, old Canon Corsi fell, mortally stabbed, in the streets of Fermo. He was professor of eloquence, mild in politics, a friend of the young, kind and charitable; the one priest in the town universally respected. The public was filled with horror; the National Guard arose, and seized upon every suspicious man in the place. Appearances were strongly against two, who remained in prison. As an example of the dark hints one hears breathed in the Roman States, it was whispered about Fermo that this deed had been planned to produce a reaction in favor of the priests by striking the public mind with horror at the murder of so good a man.

"After the papal government had been restored, heavy blows were dealt to the people of Fermo. 'There was not a citizen who, during the Republic, had given the least sign of adhesion even by simple silence, who was not annoyed, or placed under surveillance, or imprisoned, or condemned to the galleys or to exile.' But this was not enough for Cardinal d'Angelis. Some lives must be taken. Three men were especially obnoxious to the restored government—Joseph Cassellini, a young man of good family, who had been an officer in the Republican army; Ignatius Rosettani, a tailor; and Henry Venezin, a coffee-house man: all of hotly liberal politics, but with names unstained by crime. These three youths were arrested for the murder of Canon Corsi, as accomplices of the two criminals already in prison. Of those, one, called Testori, was an old galley slave, whose life had been a tissue of crime. His cell, it was observed by the political prisoners, who numbered no less than one hundred and thirty-six, soon became the favorite resort of the police. Presently he had an extra plate of victuals every day; then his bed was provided with a mattress, sheets, and counterpane; and, finally, he was allowed the indulgence of cigars. He was also frequently taken to the police-office, which was near the prison, and, on his return, used privately to show money, which had been given to him by his nephew, he said.

"It proved that this worthy had sworn information against the three young men as accomplices in the murder of the canon. Two of them met the charge with the best evidence they could, but Cassellini had a triumphant answer. He was at the time lying ill of fever, and had the evidence of the doctor who attended him; of the druggist who made up the prescriptions; of the maid who waited upon him; and of a friend who visited him. Notwithstanding this, his relatives prepared a way of escape for him. 'No,' he said, 'there is not a shadow of proof against me, and conclusive evidence in my favor. I must be liberated some time; and, were I to escape, a stain would rest on my character.'

"Every thing that threats and bribes could do was tried upon the witnesses to make them retract. The doctor, Baroncliani, was easily won. He recalled his and of the priest Castiglioni, who formally declared that the three youths were innocent of the death of Corsi; that he had been impelled to say that they were his accomplices by being told that they had been his accusers.

"The old marquis, overwhelmed with this proof of villainy, knew too well in what regard he himself was held by the government, to think that any interference of his would be of advantage to the innocence which he saw, in this awful moment, made, by the hand of Providence, mornily triumphant over the murderous power that was striking it down. He urged the confessor to take a minute of the deposition, and immediately to convey it to the archbishop and the delegate; but the Jesuit replied, 'I am here to take confessions, not depositions.'

"The brothers of the confraternity, who were all noble men, stood weeping like children, for they were every one friends of Cassellini, and all at that moment impotent to help, though with the proof of his innocence in their hands. The police-officer, whose duty it was to take minutes of everything connected with the execution, was called to take down his deposition. He left a space in the page on which he was writing, and asked his superiors if he should write this down. The reply was 'No.'

"When the mournful group arrived at the scaffold, what had taken place in private was unknown in the city. Few had gone to witness the murder; but those few were thrilled with horror when the Jesuit Castiglioni, commencing the ordinary exhortation, uttered the strange words, 'It is not always the guilty who die.' When the heads of the three young men of Fermo fell one after another, the Jesuit went away to fall upon a sick bed, the people to say, 'It is not always the guilty who die.'"

LOUIS NAPOLEON AS A FUGITIVE.

From the early sheets of "Italy in Transition," by Rev. Dr. Arthur, author of "The Tongue of Fire," which Messrs Harper and Brothers will soon publish, we extract the following interesting piece of secret history of him who now rules the French and divides that Italy which then refused him shelter:—

"A few years ago, the authorities on this frontier were much occupied about a gentleman travelling with an English passport as Colonel Crawford, but this was not his name. He had just escaped from a French state prison. He had been in the Pope's dominions before, and the idea had got abroad that he was about to appear there again, with political designs. Instructions were given that he should be 'arrested, and closely confined;' and all manner of vigilance was maintained, still he was not secured, and the authorities grew impatient about the arrest of this 'wight.'* On a certain day the higher power from Bologna writes to an inferior at Poretta, and tells him, 'It has come to our knowledge that on the night of the 21st instant (June, 1846), a young stranger, laden with arms and money, who took up his lodgings at the hotel of Luigi Ferrari, although passing a feigned name, was recognized by an English lady as the son of Jerome Bonaparte.' He goes on to say how the stranger sent a letter into Bologna to the Count Camerata, son of the Princess Baciocchi (a member of the Bonaparte family), who was driven to Poretta by Battista Golinelli, and arrived at eleven o'clock, A. M. on the 22d. The stranger met the count at the mile from his hotel. The count got out of the carriage, and they walked back together. The count applied for a passeporte to Monte Catini, which was refused; but as the stranger had several passports, they set off toward Tuscany, accompanied by Luigi Ferrari, to the frontier, and having a Tuscan subject as guide. And then a severe rebuke is administered to the subordinate official for his remissness, because the report was current that the stranger was Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, lately escaped from the chateau of Ham, the 'wight' of whom the government was in search.

"A second letter tells this official that it is pleasing to find that no bad sufficient evidence that the stranger was not Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, of whom the police were in search, but his cousin, the son of Jerome. However, as the report had got abroad, much harm had been done; and, therefore, the censure for not having given information is repeated.

"From Poretta the authority had written in great anxiety, on the very day of the alleged arrival, to say that, at his part of the frontier, the suspected 'wight' might easily pass; for no one knew him, and they had no account of his personal appearance. In fact all that they could ascertain respecting him was, that he was about forty years of age; that is, if the almanacs were correct. He begs, therefore, at once, that the means of recognizing his person may be forwarded. The reply is to the effect that they do not possess any means of giving a personal description of him, and therefore all vigilance must be used; but that the absence of a description is less material, as it often proves that persons who are described as having a beard turn up well shaved, and vice versa.†

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 15, 1860.

Only $1 00 for the Advocate from the first Number in July till the end of the Year.

PAY TO THE END OF THE YEAR.

We have made out, and sent out, all our accounts, to the end of the present year. Many have responded and paid up, but many have failed to do so. The object we have in writing these lines is, to call upon all who have not paid up to the end of the year, to do so immediately, by remittance to the office, or by payment to our agents. The year is more than half gone, and yet we have much to collect of our accounts, and to clear off books, between this and January next. This work we must accomplish. Come friends, you have received your accounts through the paper or through the preacher; the amount is not large in each case; pay up to the end of the year and let us all begin even again.

MODERN LIFE.

Modern Man is compensated for the shortness of modern Life. The thousand years of ante-deluvian Methuselah were not worth as much as the seventy of the present time. More of the bliss of life can be enjoyed, more of its sorrow suffered, more of its lesson learned, more of its purposes accomplished, in our life-time than in Methuselah's. We are better educated to suffer, to enjoy, and to do, than the ante-delavians were. Every faculty and affection, and nerve and feeling, is now alive, and every avenue of an adapted and responsive world is open. Life with them was a long and listless vegetation. There was nothing grand or inspiring in their life, either in its character or events, its theatre or relations. The only exceptions were the few Abels and Enochs, who, rising on the wings of a strangely grand and uncommon faith, stored above the world which was not worthy of them, into the realms of divine communion, and fitted themselves for the crown of the martyr and the chariot of fire. But, although it was better to die for the truth than to live for nothing, or to be snatched away from a lonely and unsympathetic world than to live a useless life in it, they were not permitted to live the grand human life open to us. The heavenly side of life was all they had, unless, in prophetic vision, they saw coming the glories of the future. A perfect human life, such as God had in view in creating and redeeming the world and man, has both the worldly and unworldly hemispheres. It is a sacrifice to lose our share in the present life, even by being taken to heaven. So Moses doubtless felt it when God took him to heaven in sight of Canaan, but did not permit him to lead the hosts of Israel to its conquest. So David felt it when the building of the temple was denied to him and given to his son. Paul, after having lived much and done much, when on the eve of departure, found the respective attractions of heaven and earth about equally balanced, so that he was in a strait betwixt the two. This present life has its place in the cycles of being, and its value as part of the capital of the soul, and our love of it is a wise provision of our nature. We shall never enjoy another like unto it. For wise purposes it has been shortened, but its real progress and power began with its abbreviation.

It would seem that there is little to be desired for the growth and maturity of the life of the present age that is not to be found in its conditions and circumstances. All truth is not discovered, nor all knowledge attained; but sufficient progress has been made to give encouragement, certainty, and joy to future pursuit. All the rebellious forces of revolted nature have not been conquered, nor the entire wilderness of a lost world subjugated; but the enemy is now reduced to scattered tribes on the frontier of science and art, and the whole world is illuminated by the light of civilization, gleaming through its wilderness tracts from a thousand glowing centres. Enough truth has been discovered to make known the divinity, immortality and power of all truth, and enough facts have been learned to reveal the divine relations and philosophy of all facts. Civilization has so far progressed, from its various seats, in the subjugation of the world, and in the culture of man, that the different sections begin to hear the sound of each other's axes, and to see the light of each other's campfires. Christian and Saracen, Caucasian and Asiatic, European and Hindoo, American and Japanese, hold council together, and make treaties of mutual toleration and amity. Trade and commerce, in the year of grace 1860, for the first time in the history of the race, is about to unite, for mutual comfort and enrichment, all the nations of the earth. Even the hidden Arctic is threatened with the light of discovery. The sails and the banners, the tongues and the manners, the trades and the arts, of every nation will soon be known in the ports of every other one. Nationalities will help nationalities, the strongest helping the weakest most, and the best the worst, not only in trade, but in ideas, institutions, manners, arts, literature, religion, even blood, until each one shall be a partner in the power and value of every other. Steam has made the utmost ends of the earth as easily visited as our childhood homes in the older States half a century since, and the electric telegraph promises, within a few years, to enable every principal point on the earth to hear the news from every other every day. Travellers' books have already made us acquainted with the country, character, and manners of the most obscure nations, even before we are brought in contact with them by steam and telegraph. And even now, World's Exhibitions, and International Statistical Congresses, are bringing together representatives of the peoples, the arts, the lives, the facts, the knowledges, and the laws of progress, of the four quarters of the globe.—And the newspaper press, like a wide-winged herald, is flying through the world, telling all men what it has just heard, of the Esquimeaux and the Chinese, the East Indians and the Western aborigines, the Europeans and the Americans.

Education and literature, christianity and civilization, are growing to the perfection of beauty and power in their ancient seats, and are being distributed all over the world. Every life, in the present age, is surrounded with an increasing number of ministries for its culture, and with an ever-widening horizon, and the Sun of Righteousness, from which the rays of truth and wisdom and beauty and goodness radiate, is approaching nearer and nearer the glory of its noon.

NEXT OPENING OF CENTENARY COLLEGE.

In view of the fact that the Commencement of Centenary College failed, in consequence of a useless panic about small-pox, it is necessary that, in noticing the advertisement in another column, announcing the opening on the first of October, a few things be said for the benefit of the college and of the public. The health of Jackson, La., the village where the college is located, and of the surrounding country, is habitually good, and never better than during the present summer. The occasion for the small-pox panic just alluded to was an insignificant circumstance—a mere accident—and the panic itself was altogether without sufficient ground. There was a case of small-pox several miles in the country, and the attending physician, residing in Jackson, not being as careful as he should have been, two little negro children in his own family contracted it. But these cases were a quarter or a half mile from the college, in no communication with it whatever; nothing but carefulness was needed, to avoid entering the house, or coming in contact with its inmates. With these two cases, the small-pox ended in Jackson, and no fears need be entertained in regard to it. We trust hereafter that in Centenary, and in all our colleges, physicians will be more prudent, in view of the interests and responsibilities involved; but that, should a similar case occur, parents and students will not hastily fall into a panic, but place implicit confidence in the discretion and care of the faculty.

This matter being satisfactorily "ventilated," Centenary has unusually promising prospects for the coming session. The last year was most harmonious, prosperous, and satisfactory. There was an increase of sixty-three students over the previous year—two hundred and sixty-four in all—one hundred and three in the college proper, and one hundred and sixty-one in the preparatory department. This latter department is a necessity, in view of the fact that there is not a sufficiency of male academies and high schools in the surrounding country to prepare boys for college, and hence, they must be prepared, to a considerable extent, under the supervision of the college. The best school that we know of, in a short distance from the college, where boys can be prepared for admission, is that of Prof. W. H. N. Magruder, at Baton Rouge. The preparatory department of Centenary is well organized, under experienced teachers. Centenary is growing every year, with a steady, healthful growth—growing in every way—and becoming a leading educational power in the land. She is growing in patronage—the number of students increases yearly; in financial strength—the endowment is steadily going forward; in the confidence and esteem of the public—there are no dissatisfactions, dissensions nor difficulties. The faculty is harmonious, composed of faithful, hard-working, competent men. The social and religious influences of both the college and the community are decidedly healthful.

Nobody has written us any thing from Centenary, and knowing the facts, we have written for it ourselves.

REVIVALS.

Rev. J. J. Cassady writes us that Clayton circuit, Alabama Conference, is rejoicing in spirit; twenty-four have joined the Church—fifteen converted.

Rev. J. W. Laney writes of his (Eufaula) district that the spirit of revival is abroad. Many are being converted and added to the Church. Many adults and children are being baptized. A glorious revival is believed to have begun. Enon circuit, Rev. James A. Clements, pastor; Chunnacunggee circuit, Rev. Mr. Stanley, pastor; and Lonisville, Rev. L. F. Dowdell, pastor,—all have enjoyed revivals.

Rev. J. D. Cameron writes us of ten whites and fifteen blacks added to the Church on Clarke circuit.

The venerable Rev. Edward Patton writes us that on Coosa mission the presence of the Lord is realized, drops before the shower here and there, about twenty added to the Church recently. Ministerial aid much needed.

From Farmersville, Ala., a correspondent, who does not subscribe his name, writes us of a revival, eighteen conversions, and twenty four added to the Church.

Moscow circuit, Alabama Conference, is likely to become famous. Winter before last, at Macon, Miss., the money reported as raised for missionary purposes was fifty cents! That was enough for the missionary speakers on the occasion—Dr. C. K. Marshall especially. Two changes were rung on the "burning of Moscow," etc.—At last Conference the report was $162—quite an improvement. Rev. J. B. Powers, the pastor tho present year, writes us that at his first (of sixteen,) missionary meetings, he obtained $135. If they all do that way—well, we shall see. The Conference Fund assessment is already raised—$100. Mr. Powers also reports a revival, resulting in fifteen added to the Church. He says the circuit is a fine one—the Church growing—several young men who ought to be educated for the ministry.

We hear from Black Circuit, through Rev. J. W. Holston. At quarterly meeting at Mount Pleasant, two brethren were licensed to preach, seventeen persons admitted to membership on probation, twenty-five baptized. There is a general awakening in that country. All the above is in the Alabama Conference.

Some good reports from Mississippi Conference. Rev. P. E. Green reports a revival meeting at Hopewell, five added to the Church.

Rev. H. F. Johnson reports a revival at Fayette; eight converted, and eight added to the Church.

Rev. J. D. Newsom reports a good meeting at Milldale; fifteen converted, and fifteen added to the Church.

At Warner's Church, Franklinton circuit, Rev. H. P. Lewis writes that they have had a good meeting, at which six joined the Church.

And we have some good news from Louisiana Conference. From Calcasieu circuit, Rev. W. D. Stayton reports a meeting which resulted in twelve accessions to the Church.

From North Rapides circuit, Rev. J. E. Bradly sends us a report. Three new churches have been built. Rev. N. A. Cravens preached the dedication sermon at one, which was listened to by a large and interested audience. A fine collection was "lifted." This Church is fourteen miles east of Alexandria, in Holloway's Prairie. It was named for "Father Nawell," one of the Methodist Pioneers. His daughter was largely instrumental in building it. Another, "Wise Church," is ready for dedication. Over eighty persons have been baptized, and over fifty have joined the Church. Sunday-schools are prosperous. Notwithstanding drouth, the Church finances are in good condition.

COLLEGE COMITY.

In some few cases, in our published college reports,—we rejoice that there are but few—we have imagined that we detected an occasional slight tinge of disparaging allusion to other institutions. Somewhat after the manner in which Gen. Sam. Houston sometimes, in his stump speeches, undertakes, by innuendo, to slaughter an opponent, without making himself responsible for an open assault—pretending to defend himself from imaginary charges—thereby covertly launching them at his foe—saying, for instance, "I never was guilty" of so and so! This is all wrong. It degrades that generous and laudable rivalry which tends to develop the highest excellence, without harm or pain to any, into a selfish partisanship, which does harm to the cause of education, and generates the bitterest and most unhappy feelings. The institutions in whose behalf such things are done are not benefited, but otherwise; the institutions aimed to suffer injustice, if not harm; a bad impression is made upon the public mind; the tone and dignity of the noble vocation of teaching is lowered; and the public taste and temper are vitiated by the very agencies intended to elevate and refine them. Setting forth the superlative superiority of one institution, as compared with others, is also highly objectionable. Good taste, good temper, sincere piety—clearness of eye—will, we trust, smooth out all these wrinkles.

Martha Washington College.—We had intended, before now, to call attention to this institution, but press of matter has heretofore not left us the necessary space. Located in the mountain region of Virginia, and in the town of Abingdon, there is nothing more that could be desired in the way of health, scenery and society. Our friend, President Harris, we say in all good conscience, is a most admirable man for the discipline and culture of young ladies. For further information we refer to the advertisement in another column.

Whitworth College.—We call attention to the advertisement. It is located in the flourishing village of Brookhaven, on the Jackson railroad, and we understand that it also is flourishing. Excellent men are its founders and supporters.

AUTHORS AND BOOKS.

New York, Aug. 7, 1860.

The Rev. John Luckey, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, has just published a volume called "Life in Sing Sing State Prison," and containing some account of the prison, the prisoners, and the experience of the writer during his twelve years Chaplaincy. It is an interesting book as far as it goes; but it does not go far. It seems to me one of the cases where the wrong man has got hold of the right thing. What Mr. Luckey gives:—Stories of Henrietta Robinson, the absurd woman who made herself the butt of vulgar curiosity, some years ago, by insisting on sitting veiled when on her trial for murder; of other prominent prisoners, &c.; and some slight stories of attempted escapes, with unsatisfactory accounts of the management of the prison—these things are not particularly wanted. What is much needed just now, is a report from an intelligent man, of broad views, and just thoughts (and if a gooler or chaplain, so much the better); a carefully drawn up account of the Penitentiary system in this country, giving us satisfactory views of their management, their laws and bye-laws; the lives of the prisoners, the effect upon them of the various modes of confinement and coercion practised; their improvement or retrogression under the various systems, every one of which, while it is in part designed as punishment to the offender, is also, thanks to Christianity and humanity, designed to correct bad habits, and to restore the convict to society in time, purified and regenerated; and finally to let us know under what circumstances the unfortunates are released, and what becomes of them afterwards. Such a book would not be dull—even Dr. Luckey's is not exactly dull. In competent hands it should be very readable; and if at all ably done, it would move the public to abolish the present system of prison management, which is in most of our States nothing short of abominable, and would substitute in its place something which shall be, not a mere political engine as now, but a wholesome, humane, and, to the prisoners, elevating system, administered by men trained to the work, and responsible, not to political parties, but to the general public, and to the public authorities, of whatever parties. Is it not slanderous that in New York and some other States the office of Warden of the State Prison is conferred for political service? That any, the least competent man, may get it, if only he wants it, and has done that kind of low service which makes it incumbent on a party to "provide for him," as it is called.

Some years ago it happened that one of the chief officers in one of our chief prisons had been, not three years before, confined in that prison for a low offence, either theft or burglary, I forget which. Such cases do not often occur. But ought they to occur at all? Is it not a burning disgrace to a christian country? Of course the chief officer appoints his subordinates. His political friends have rewarded him by putting him in authority over several hundred desperate or fallen men and women, whom it is no light matter to train, take care of, and if possible, reform; to assist him in his arduous task, he chooses—whom? The long tried and well-trained men who know the tricks, the ways of the convicts, who have been drilled in patience and long-suffering, and whose long and honorable service warrants that at any rate they are not ignorant of their duties? By no means. He turns these out, if there should be any, and puts in their place his political friends, those humble but efficient servitors in coffee-houses and dram shops who have helped him by their energetic management to his place, and who are certainly as deserving of their places as he of his.

If any man would thoroughly search out the mystery of this iniquity, he would surely do the state some service. Then, what becomes of the man who was this morning brought from his cell, inducted into the clothes he put off seven—or seventeen—years ago, when he exchanged them for the prisoner's grey, and sent out into the world to shift for himself? Mr. Luckey lets us have a little light on this question. We learn that a good many of them have before their eyes, immediately, the dreadful alternative of starvation or crime; that, weakened in mind and body, by many years' confinement, some do fall back into old courses; that some struggle painfully along for years in stubborn honesty, but with their prison-life ever hanging over them like a dark shadow; that a few, by kind friends, or by very unusual energy, work out for themselves a new life.

A collection of facts on this sad point of the question of "Crime," would surely prove to the people of a state that their duty to the criminal does not cease when he ceases to be a prisoner; and that, having punished him, they become next bound to see that he who has expiated his crime is not, by his necessities, pushed back again into fresh crime.

I think Dr. Luckey deserves thanks for opening the mine; but I hope some abler man and better writer will follow him with a work which will force the attention of thinking men to this whole question, which, in the majority of our States, seems to have been given over to the hands of the politicians, of whom some, it may be supposed, serve an apprenticeship at both ends of the prison—first as prisoner, and then as wardens.

Almost everybody in this country has read Tom Brown's School-days; at least I hope so. Those who have not should get it. Those who have will not soon lose interest in Rugby School, the scene of Tom's studies and good Dr. Arnold's christian discipline. To such the following notice of a meeting of Rugbeians will be heartily welcome:

"A numerous party of old Rugbeians met together on the evening of Thursday, the 28th of June last, at London, to congratulate themselves on the honors which had been obtained by the Rugbeians during the past year. Dr. Temple was in the chair, supported by Mr. T. Hughes the author of "Tom Brown," and others. After the queen's health had been drunk; the chairman proposed the toast of Floreat Rugbea." He mentioned that the university honors had been so numerous during the past year as to be really inconvenient, from the number of extra half-holidays claimed in consequence. At Cambridge, for two years running, a Rugbyman had been senior classic and a third gave promise of equal success, as he had gained the Bell scholarship in this his first year. The great prize of the Eldon scholarship had also fallen to a Rugby man; while at Oxford they had, if possible, been more successful. Out of doors, in cricket, he had just heard they had beaten the far-famed Marylebone club, the highest scores on their side having been made by old Rugby men. But the honors conferred by the sovereign on Sir F. Halliday, on Mr. Wake, the defender of Arrah, and on Mr. Forsyth, for their services in India, were still greater subjects for congratulation. (Even in boating, another speaker supplied, though an unusual pursuit for Rugbeians, the same energy had won success as the stroke and how oars of the champion boat of England, the first Trinity were Rugby men.) But far above all those, Dr. Temple said he valued the high tone of the school, the love of truth and honesty which he had found, even beyond what he had been led to expect from the high names of his predecessors. The school could not be fuller: he had even had a name put down for 1873, in order, as the father said, to insure a vacancy, and was proud to say they never had better grounds for the toast of "Floreat Rugbea."

Messrs. Harper and Brothers have in progress a "Cyclopedia of Sacred Literature," by Rev. Drs. M'Clintock and Strong. This work, which its authors intend shall be the most thorough and exhaustive that has ever been presented to the world, in its range of subjects, has employed their hands and minds for many years. To it Dr M'Clintock brings the result not only of much critical study, but also of extensive travel over many of the scenes and countries treated of. Dr. Strong is known in this country and in Europe as one of the most finished Greek and Hebrew scholars now living. They have had in their labors the assistance of able American and German scholars; and have spared neither time nor labor to make the work, in its various departments of geography, ethnography, history, biography, and theology, as complete as possible, making full use of the many recent and important advances made in the various departments treated of. It will be accurate in its definition of terms, and in tone thoroughly catholic. In completeness and variety of contents, it is intended to be in decided advance of the dictionary of Dr. William Smith, very recently published, and of which they will, of course, avail themselves, wherever it is best, so far as to make use of the best material which is there, and in other recently published works, collected. The work will be particularly complete in the department of maps and illustrative engravings, where Messrs. Harper and Brothers will spare no expense to attain completeness.

Rev. W. H. Watkins, of Cambridge, Ohio, has now in course of preparation a work entitled "A Cyclopædia of Methodism," which, when finished, will be a complete repertory of all the educational and literary institutions of Methodism; a biographical dictionary of all the eminent men the Methodist Episcopal Church has produced, both living and dead; and an accurate vocabulary of all the terms peculiar to Methodistic doctrine, history, and polity.

In Humboldt's foolish correspondence with Varnhagen Von Ense he tells us the following story of the Grand Duke of Saxe-Weimar: "Once, after a gentleman not belonging to the nobility, had left the company, he (the Grand Duke) expressed with great satisfaction the comfortable feeling, 'Now, we are amongst ourselves.' Another time, when it was noticed that there were thirteen at dinner table, he replied consolingly, that 'there were two commoners amongst them, who did not count for anything.' This he told Humboldt in French, because, as he said, these two would not understand it.'"

Of course every body thought the Duke a vulgar snob. But when the book arrived at Weimar the Grand Duke bought a copy, wrote on the margin opposite the passage, "This is a lie.—Karl August," and then deposited the volume in the town library.

I suppose the moral of this story to be, that if you want to slander people you should do it privately; or else do it, as Humboldt did, after you are dead, when the lie that is returned does not affect the—story-teller. The old philosopher seems to have been an outrageous gossip. His court suit chased him, and he scattered the consequent ill-nature on every body.

The announcements of books "in press" in England, for a week, make a formidable list: Messrs. Longman & Co.'s new list includes "A Historical and Chronological Cyclopædia," by B. H. Woodward; "Political Ballads of the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries," annotated, by W. W. Wilkins; "The Philosophy of Nature," by Dr. Boase; "Lectures on the History of the Fine and Ornamental Arts," by W. B. Scott; Facts and Figures relating to Vancouver's Island and British Columbia," by J. D. Pemberton; "Air and Water," by Dr. Argus Smith; "A Manual of Chemistry," by Dr. William Odling; "A Handbook of Farm Labor," by Mr. J. C. Morton; and "The Art of Precise Writing," a little manual by the Rev. John Hunter, worthy of note as a novelty in educational literature. Messrs. Walton & Maberly, and Mr. Murray will publish another of Dr. Smith's useful school histories, entitled, "A Smaller History of Rome and Greece;" Messrs. Simpkin & Co. Virgil's whole works, with English notes, by Mr. Morgan, of Trinity college, Dublin; Mr. Churchill of New Burlington street, "Elements of Natural Philosophy," by Dr. Golding Bird and Charles Brooke; Mr. James Gordon, of Edinburgh, "A Guide to English Poetry," by Dr. Morell. These are all school books. The following are the announcements in general literature: "The Claim of Leibnitz to the Invention of the Differential Calculus," by Dr. H. Sloman; "The Seaboard and the Down, or my Country Parish in the South," by the Rev. J. W. Warter; "The Flora of Suffolk" (a catalogue of the wild plants of that county,) by the Rev. J. S. Henslow and E. Skepper; "The Pig," by W. Youatt, enlarged and re-written by Samuel Sidney; "Tallis's Topographical Dictionary of England and Wales," two volumes; "History of the Forest and Chase of Sutton-Colefield;" "Critical Annotations, Additional and Supplementary, on the New Testament," by the Rev. G. T. Bloomfield; "The Words and Works of Our Blessed Lord," by the author of "Brampton Rectory;" "The Work of Christ," sermons by the Rev. J. Llewellyn Davies; "A History of Education for the English Bar," by Philip A. Smith; "Foot-prints on the Sands of Time, Biographies for Young People;" The Children's Picture Book of Birds," with sixty-one engravings by W. Harvey.

Mr. Bentley announces "A History of English Literature, Critical and Anecdotical;" and "The English Satirists, from Hall to Byron."

Mr. Hotten is preparing to publish a curious little work, said to be edited by Martin Luther, entitled, "The Book of Vagabonds and Beggars," with a vocabulary of their language. Mr. Hotten, who is himself the translator, will furnish explanatory notes. The book is not mentioned by Luther's biographers, and its existence, in this country at least, is scarcely known. Mr. Hotten says of the book: "The origin of this very curious work is comparatively unknown. From its pages the singular hooks on vagabonds and their tricks published in this country in Shakespeare's time were in a great measure derived. Many will be surprised to learn that 'card-sharpers,' 'wise men,' 'begging letter writers,' 'shabby genteels,' 'travelling tinkers,' 'shivering-jemmies,' and other descriptions of rogues to be met with in our streets, are not excrescences of modern civilization, and that more than three centuries ago the great Reformer edited a little book about them, setting forth their manœuvres and the vulgar language which they had adopted."

Ticknor & Fields have just out a new volume of poems by Gerald Massey, who dedicates it to Mr. Fields of Boston. It is rumored that among other noted writers who will shortly print new papers in the Atlantic Monthly are the following: Mrs. H. B. Stowe, Longfellow, Hawthorne, Emerson, and Charles Reade.

The Young Men's Christian Association of Washington, D.C., have just published "The Union Pulpit," a collection of sermons by ministers of different denominations. First edition. Of the thirty-four sermons contained in the book seven are by ministers of the Protestant Episcopal Church, five from the M. E. Church, South, four from the M. E. Church, North, two from the Methodist Protestant Church, six from the Baptist, six from the Presbyterian; Congregationol one, Lutheran one, Dutch Reformed one, and one unknown to us. Of the six by the Episcopalians three are from Bishops, to wit: Bishops Mellvane, Otey, and Clark. Bishop Andrew, of the Methodist Church, South, also furnishes a sermon.

The Sunday-school society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, North, has recently published (by Carlton and Porter) the following juvenile volumes: "Happy Mike; or, How Sam Jones became a Good Boy," and "The Little Gardener; or, The Way to be Happy." By Catherine D. Bell; "Little Mabel and her Sunlit Home;" "Jane Atherton's Year at School," with illustrations; "Clara, the Motherless Young Housekeeper," by Mrs. Locke; "Pleasant Talks with the Little Folks," by Rollin Ranger, with ten illustrations.

An old Field Opening.—The foreign news shows that old Bohemia, famous for its "Reformers before the Reformation," is reawakening. A great religious movement is going on in Prague and other cities. It is stated that conversions to the Gospel have been numerous. Roman Catholic parish priests preach the pure Gospel. The Bible is extensively circulated. The people demand with earnestness the celebration of worship in the vulgar tongue. Huss and Jerome, the old Bohemian martyrs, are yet alive in the hearts of the people. The Moravians sprung from the defeated Bohemian Reformation, if indeed it can be said to have been defeated. What a spectacle it would be to see the old battle-field again opened, and the host of the Lord in victorious motion upon its desolated plains.—N. Y. Methodist.

THE SOUTHERN UNIVERSITY.

If those who first suggested the establishment of this institution were asked to define the compass of the plan they projected, doubtless their answer would be, we intended it to be something of which not only Methodism might be proud, but which should command the admiration of the whole country. Mediocrity, something passable, a respectable institution—these, we confidently assert, were not the ideas upon which they proposed to proceed. On the contrary, a broad, high scale, reaching what we mean to convey by the term "first-rate," was the goal at which they aimed. If not, wherefore those twelve, and twenty-five thousand dollar subscriptions? Does not this sufficiently index their minds as to the magnitude of the plan upon which they proposed to act? And, going to Conference—we mean the one which voted the enterprise a "local habitation and a name"—what was the idea there? We need not say, perhaps, that it was precisely like that which the noble projectors had entertained. For, notwithstanding the preachers had been accustomed to much smaller things, yet they had not grown fast to them, and soon expanded their heads and hearts to take in this new and grander conception. Truth is, the preachers were panting for something of this sort, had been for a long time. Usually ahead of the laity in devising liberal things, they hailed the movement with joy and thanksgiving. But the idea, has it been realized? Has it been translated from the region of speculation, and become a fact, palpable and articulate? Confidently we affirm it has. Excepting certain appendages and finishings, the idea is now incarnate,—has descended from the imaginations of those who conceived it, and now stands a patent reality on the stage of action. There stands the magnificent structure, capacious and well arranged, with towers tasteful and well proportioned, in the center of grounds which culture will soon embower, and render a fit haunt for the student who shall repair thither, to equip mind and heart for the battle of life. You say, Mr. Editor, you love Methodism, and you undertake to say this of thousands; then, we say, turn your eyes to the spot where stands this monument of Methodist liberality, and learn to love it more. But the Faculty, does this reach the first-rate mark at which the projectors of the enterprise aimed? Certain things, you know, are necessary to command the best talent, and among these it may be said that money is the most potent. The friends of the Southern University knew this perfectly well, and, therefore, provided a fund large enough to realize their aspirations in reference to the Faculty. When, therefore, the trustees met to elect the officers of the institution, they were not cramped by the consideration, what can we give? Not so. Planting themselves upon the rich endowments which had been donated, they scanned the whole South, and confidently invited the best ability within the Methodist Church. They are picked men. "They are picked men," said a gentleman, not a great while ago, who knows some of them personally, and so they are. Doubtless, the claims and qualifications of many were discussed, not, of course, in a disparaging spirit, but with the view honestly to ascertain who were best qualified, that the institution might at once command the confidence of the entire public. And it is the opinion of all who have taken the pains to inform themselves, that they did find out who were best qualified, and succeeded in securing their services. We challenge any one to mingle with the officers of the Southern University, without being made to confess the superiority of their qualifications for the positions they occupy. So patent and outstanding is this fact, that a gentleman belonging to another denomination, who attended the late Commencement there, and who had been a Professor in the University of a neighboring State, remarked that they were equal, if not superior to any in the land. "Surely," said he, "when they are known, they must command a large patronage," especially from the denomination under whose auspices the institution has been erected." Now, Mr Editor, do our people prize something really excellent? Long have we endured the stigma, that, as a denomination, we do not appreciate education. With what justice this has been done we shall not pause here to inquire. Waiving this, let our people realize that the impulse to effect something great and noble in the cause of education has been given, that the way is open to wipe out our disgrace, and even to lead the van in the march of intellectual culture. Will our people appreciate this, and loyally second the efforts which have been made, and are being made by the friends of the Southern University? But, Mr. Editor, the place for the peroration you know is at the end, and as the end of what I propose to say on this subject is not yet, I forbear for the present, promising, in as rapid succession as possible, a few brief articles touching the great Methodist educational movement at Greensboro.

COMMENCEMENT AT TUSKEGEE.

Mr. Editor: In the last week's issue we observed a remark of yours, that you had not yet heard from the Tuskegee Methodist Commencement. Knowing, as we do, what concern you feel in the success of this college, yourself having been the first person to make an effort for its establishment, we determined not to let the occasion pass without saying a word in its behalf.

The examination of the classes was conducted privately, before a committee elected for the purpose, and such of the patrons as desired to attend. These gentlemen expressed great delight at the success of the various classes, and especially were they pleased with the examination of the seniors in Intellectual and Moral Philosophy, and Butler's Analogy.

When the latter study was introduced in the college course two years ago, some of our leading trustees expressed serious doubts about the propriety of putting girls into "so hard a book;"—but we are now happy to say that their fears on this point have entirely vanished.

Prof. Harrison (author of Theophilus Walton) preached the sermon. His manner was graceful, and his thoughts were the result of a very profoundly thoughtful mind; we have never listened to a more appropriate discourse on any similar occasion.

On Monday morning a public presentation of a very handsome Turkey Morocco writing-desk to Miss. Thompson took place. Miss. T. has left the institution. There was also a handsome rosewood desk, all furnished, presented to Mr. Anderson, the accomplished vocalist, by the junior class. Dr. Lipscomb made the speech in behalf of the girls, and Mr. Anderson's remarks in return were truly eloquent. Judging from the frequency with which all present exhibited their handkerchiefs, we concluded that Mr. A. had "thrown a stone into the wells of their hearts, which splashed the water into their eyes." Monday night a juvenile vocal concert took place, which no less surprised than delighted the audience with the wonderful accuracy and sweetness of the children's voices. In this class, little girls eight and nine years old sing by note as correctly as the grown girls of the college.

Tuesday night was the annual exhibition of the Art department. The exercises were opened by the reading of an original poem by Mr. Price. Those who sat near enough to hear, said it was really sublime, but as few were so fortunate, we advise you, Mr. Editor, to get your friend to let his poem be published in your columns. In the term art we do no not mean to include gew-gaws, wax-work, embroidery, Grecian painting, etc. The latter has a grand name, but means nothing but taking engravings and embellishing them with color. No, indeed, there was nothing exhibited but what had a right to the term art. Oil, water-color, colored pencils, crayon, and pastell paintings. A very large gallery was filled with the pictures, and a very imposing scene it made. Of course in comparison with Hunt, Turner, Church, etc., these paintings are only in a state of infancy, but it is a real, true babyhood—no sham—just the same that these great artists once occupied themselves. However, we know that the original designs can compare with any in the Schools of Design in New York, Philadelphia, or Baltimore. These consisted of patterns for carpets, rugs, wall paper, dress patterns, and lace potteries. But the most interesting work on exhibition this year was, a complete illustration of "Thompson's Seasons," in six or eight large and handsome drawings. Though the Art department has been in existence nearly five years, Miss Spear has never before thought that she could conscientiously give any of the pupils "art diplomas," and then only three out of a class of fifty were so favored. Any of these ladies, Miss Robertson, Miss Biddle, or Miss Sinclare, are fully competent to take charge of such a department in any school or college. Miss Spear, the accomplished head of the department, founded the schools of design both in Philadelphia and Baltimore, both of which still continue in a very flourishing condition. Miss Spear never would have left the latter place, but for the state of her health, which required a more genial climate. This college is the only educational school in America which has a regular school of design in connection with it.

On Wednesday morning six young ladies were graduated, and their essays gave evidence of the great care bestowed on this exercise in the institution. Just as the audience were about to be dispersed, a servant stepped on the stage with a rich silver tea-set, which was presented, through Dr. Lipscomb, by the senior class to their honored President, Mr. G. W. Price. Mr. P. responded in a manner as none but he could have done under similar circumstances. We had all wiped tears out of our eyes before, but now we cried in good earnest, in sympathy with him, who with deep emotion expressed his thanks. He alluded very touchingly to his former connection with Dr. L. in the institution, and remarked on the appropriateness of Dr. Lipscomb presenting him with this set, as he had, just one year before, presented, in the name of the senior class, a handsome chair to Dr. L., on his retiring from the college.

On Wednesday night the grand finale came off, in the way of a brilliant concert under the supervision of Prof. Corban. Mr. C. is one of the most perfect masters of the art of sweet sounds that we have ever known. We have attended several concerts this summer, and we can honestly say, that none we heard compared with this.

Our friend and brother, Rev. Mr. Rush, will continue in the Steward's department another year. If he be as successful in the future as he has been in the past, we can ask nothing more.

MR. JONESS HISTORICAL SKETCHES.

We publish this week the last of the interesting series of historical and biographical sketches of the introduction and progress of Protestantism in Mississippi and the South-West, furnished to our columns by Rev. J. G. Jones. We regret to have them close. We have read them with delight, and our readers have doubtless been as much pleased with them as we have been. The information furnished is a valuable contribution to the history of the Church and country, and much of it could not have been obtained from any other source. The style is admirable—one of the best narrative styles we have met with; condensed, and yet full of minute details; never hesitating, nor using circumlocution, but presenting broad and well-defined pictures in few words, and moving right onward, as the sunlight follows the cloud-shadow; simple, graceful, genial, and ever-flowing with natural and spiritual pathos. The sketches ought to be revised and reproduced in a more permanent form.

QUESTIONS NOT OFTEN ASKED, BUT STILL IMPORTANT.

Mr. Editor:—I should like to see an intelligent and calm elucidation of the points embraced in the following questions:

1. Can adulterers and adultresses, divinely declared to be such, enter heaven with the imputed sin upon them?

2. Are not persons who have been divorced for any cause, save that set forth in Matt. 5. 32, and 19. 9, authorized to be married again, guilty of this sin?

3. Is not the moral law of these passages binding equally upon both sexes?

4. Should the Church tolerate as members, persons who have been guilty of the above crime?

DEATH OF REV. R. PIERCE.

He was an elder brother of Dr. Lovick Pierce, and in some of his mental characteristics resembled him. The logical faculty held a high place in his intellect. There were few more cogent reasoners. For several years the infirmities of age had consigned him to quiet and retirement. He died in great peace, at the residence of Captain Jacob Stroman, in Orangeburg District, South Carolina, July 24th, 1860, aged 78 years. "He entered the South Carolina Conference in the year 1805, and was the oldest member of that body at the time of his death. He had been afflicted about three months, and gradually sunk, as under the weight of years, until exhausted nature gave up her hold, and released the spirit for a purer clime."

Advertising for Schools.—We have had so much trouble in collecting the money for such advertisements that our publishing committee, at its last session, adopted a rule requiring all such advertisements, as well as others from a distance, to be paid for in advance. Schools of the Conferences patronizing the paper are half price.

Daguerreotypes and Photographs.—The handsomest specimens in this line that we have seen for many a day are at Jacobs's Gallery, on Camp st., just below our office, on the opposite side. Those who wish an excellent picture would do well to have it taken there.

Wesleyan University, located at Florence, Ala., R. H. Rivers, D.D., President, has, steadily prospered from the beginning. We are glad to know that Dr. Rivers is able to resume his official duties. The advertisement is in another column.

State Female College, near Memphis, Tenn., formerly presided over by the lamented Starkes, has been fortunate enough to secure, as his successor, Rev. Chas. Collins, D.D., formerly President Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pennsylvania. We refer to the advertisement in another column.

East Alabama Male College.—It will be seen from the advertisement in another column, that the second session of this prosperous and promising young college opens on the fifth of September. It is, without doubt, a striking success. But, from the report in last week's paper, and from the communication in this, our readers will become better acquainted with it than through our remarks.

Baton Rouge Collegiate Institute.—In another column, in the article on Centenary College, we have set forth the merits of this excellent school for boys. We call attention to the advertisement on our third page. Prof. Magruder is no transient or temporary teacher, but one of our standard educators.

That Generous Friend, who sends us fifty dollars for the Bible House, shall have his wishes gratified. The other fifty will be faithfully applied, as soon as a worthy object presents itself.

Adams's Express is a valuable "institution," as we experience every week. We are constantly indebted for important favors.

EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTE.

Atlanta, July 20th, 1860.

Mr. Editor:—Yourself and readers would doubtless feel thankful for some information relative to the annual session of the Educational Institute of our Church, which has just adjourned in this city.

One delegate from Mobile was the only one representing your section of the country. Rev. M. M. Henkle, D.D., of Nashville, was the President of the Institute, and Mr. W. H. C. Pierce, of Auburn, Alabama, the Secretary. The minutes of this session of the Institute ought to be published in every paper throughout the South. The reviews of Text-books for schools that were read, should be circulated freely through every Southern State. Every review was written with great care, discrimination, and after a thorough examination of the work submitted to the reviewer; and consequently, many Northern publications were exposed and condemned, among them Cutler's series on Physiology and Natural Philosophy, on the ground that Cutler was a notorious abolitionist, and went to Kansas during the excitement with a large number of Sharpe's rifles. When he arrived at St. Paul's, he was intercepted, imprisoned, and his rifles taken from him; upon being released by his party, he proceeded to Kansas, and there contributed his share to prolong the disturbance.

This Cutler has become rich from the sale of his books at the South, and they should immediately be thrown out of the schools, and the productions of more worthy and eminent authors, such as Hitchcock and Sanford, be used in their places.

Many important matters relative to schools, Colleges and education in the South, were ably and thoroughly discussed.—The Institute sustains an organ, called the Educational Repository and Family Monthly, published in this city at two dollars per annum.

Its design is to promote the interests of education, connected with our Church. It contains contributions of varied character, from the philosophical discussion of the principles of the science of education, to the most minute description of practical details, and pointing out the direction for future progress.—It furnishes a medium for the mutual interchange of views and practical results among teachers, and also contains much important and miscellaneous matter of general interest. This monthly is not sustained as it should be, for it is a periodical of great literary merit, and among its contributors are writers of the highest distinction in the South. It should be in every Southern Methodist family, and in every teacher's hands, as the most valuable of our Southern publications.

There were many interesting and eloquent addresses delivered during the session of the Institute, among them that of Dr. A. Means can scarcely be excelled for profound erudition, and graceful rhetoric.

As a faithful, Dr. Means is amiable, pure, gifted, zealous and useful; as a speaker or preacher of the gospel, he is fervid, instructive, and eloquent to an eminent degree; as a physician, he stands at the head of his profession; as a lecturer, he cannot be excelled. He fills the chair of Chemistry in the Atlanta Medical College, of which he is also President. Upon the floor of the Institute, his remarkably fluent speech, glowing imagination, gushing pathos and fervid zeal, were irresistible, and thrilled the audience as by the power of magic.

It is said that in the Lecture Room his extended range of information, and the rich drapery which, upon occasion, he would hang about even the dryest themes, added to his amiable spirit and winning manners, furnish the most natural accent of his great popularity as an officer. Dr. Means is indeed a remarkable man, and if the Y. M. C. As. desire a course of lectures on some scientific subjects, they cannot procure a more eloquent or popular lecturer in the whole country, North or South.

The Institute adjourned on the evening of the 26th, to meet in this place again, on the fourth Tuesday in July, 1861.

The attendance this session was not as large as usual; many of our most distinguished men were absent. How can our Church feel so indifferent to such an important body? Why does she not rally to its support, and use every exertion to extend the usefulness and influence of this Institution? A strong effort will be made next year to bring together delegates from every section of the South, and there is a great desire to see the South-west fully represented. Will she respond?

WEEKLY SUMMARY OF NEWS.

DOMESTIC.

Mobile continues healthy. There were only twenty-five interments during the week ending on the 28th ult.

THE JAPANESE RECEPTION SWINDLE IN NEW YORK.—In the Superior Court, New York, on the 30th ult., Levi S. Chatfield and others applied for an injunction to restrain them from paying any of the bills for the Japanese reception. The plaintiff alleges that the Committee on Reception and members of the Common Council sold tickets for the ball at from one to ten dollars, the proceeds of which they pocketed; that it was agreed before the bill of the Messrs. Lelands was allowed, that they should pay to the members of the Common Council 33½ per cent., and that the Common Council have no right to expend large sums to entertain guests, or to make any arrangement to carry out the agreement above set forth.

The Boston Courier learns that the Prince of Wales has accepted an invitation to visit Harvard university.

THE TREATY WITH JAPAN.—The treaty of amity and commerce with Japan, the ratifications of which were exchanged when the Embassy were in Washington, is officially published. One of the articles provides that the President, at the request of the Japanese Government, will act as friendly mediator in such matters of difference as may arise between the Government of Japan and any European power.

MONUMENT TO GENERAL PUTNAM.—The Putnam Phalanx of Hartford have sent out a stirring appeal for contributions to secure a suitable monument over the grave of General Putnam. Connecticut has appropriated three thousand dollars on condition that an equal sum be raised by private subscription. The members of the Phalanx have made generous donations themselves, and now ask that means may at once be given to secure an early completion of this too long neglected work.

CANADIAN EXCURSIONISTS.—A party of seventy excursionists, composed of Members of Parliament, various public officers, members of the press, prominent agriculturists and others, from the Canadas, arrived at St. Louis on the 27th ult., and visited some of the principal objects of interests. The party left Iowa on a special train the same evening.

GAS IN HOUSTON, TEXAS.—Col. Gentry, who holds the charter of the Gas Company in Houston, has closed a contract with responsible parties in New Orleans, to erect and put in operation the gas works for the city at an early day, say by the first of January, provided the season will permit of the streets being disturbed for the purpose of laying down the mains.

INCENDIARIES IN AUSTIN, TEXAS.—Several attempts at incendiarism have recently been made in Austin, and, in consequence, there is great excitement, and the citizens are patrolling every night.

TERRIBLE CASUALTY—LOSS OF LIFE.—The factory of Potts, & Klett, at Cooper's Point, near Camden, N.J., was demolished during a thunder storm on the afternoon of the 26th ult. Eight men took shelter from the rain therein, of whom three were killed and three seriously injured.

OVERSEER MURDERED BY NEGROES.—Mr. Powers, overseer on the plantation of Mr. James Rogers, in Walnut Bend, below Memphis, was murdered on the night of the 26th ult., by some of the negroes belonging to the plantation, who were arrested and committed to the Helena (Ark.) jail.

REFUSED.—The Supreme Court of Wisconsin has refused to issue a writ of habeas corpus for the liberation of S. M. Booth, who is in jail at Milwaukie for violation of the Fugitive Slave Act.

BALTIMORE PARK.—The Baltimore Park commission have selected a site for the new park, and have made purchase of 130 acres, at an average of $1000 per acre. The commission come into possession on the 1st of September, and in the meantime make plans for the improvement of the property will be digested.

A few days since a lady died in Philadelphia, 107 years of age, and on the day of her funeral there were present five brothers and sister, the youngest being over 90 years of age, and the oldest 111 years.

AGGRAVATED CASE OF OUTRAGE AND VIOLENCE.—The Memphis Avalanche, of the 30th ult., "During the last two months we have been called upon to record instances of riots, homicides and murders, but we know not of a more aggravated case of outrage and violence than one which took place between the hours of 11 and 12 o'clock last Saturday night, upon the premises of the Rev. Sam't Watson, editor of the Memphis Christian Advocate, who resides in the vicinity of the State Female College, near the Hernando road, and in hearing of the church bells of Memphis. A party of some twenty-five or thirty scoundrels, from this city, marched into that vicinity at the hour named above, whooping and yelling like so many fiends, carrying terror to the heart of every one that heard them. They attacked the garden premises of Mr. Watson, tore down the fences there, as they did at many other places, and destroyed everything they could lay hold of. Not content with this they fired several pistols at an old negro man, who was the only protector of the place—for Mr. Watson had gone to Mississippi—because he attempted to remonstrate with them, and told them his mistress was alone and frightened to death. They then chased him, yelling and cursing, to the house, when they fired a shot, as stating Mrs. Watson standing in the porch, and attacked her, discharging several pistols at her as she retreated into the house—the bullets and shots rattling around her in the boarding of the building. After having waste all they could, and setting the women and children in a fright not soon to be forgotten, they turned back towards the city, howling, dancing and cursing.

GREAT MORTALITY FROM SUNSTROKE.—The Augusta True Democrat learns from a private letter that a gentleman, living near the Madison Springs, in Georgia, lost fifteen negroes from sunstroke a few days since. They were engaged in ditching.

PARK AT ST. LOUIS.—A grand horticultural park, containing one thousand acres, is being laid out on the uplands back of St. Louis for the cultivation of grapes and fruit.

LEAHEY AGAIN.—Leahey, the celebrated Monk of La Trappe who was sentenced to the Penitentiary for life, some seven or eight years since, for having killed the seducer of his wife, has been pardoned by Gov. Randall of Wisconsin, and was in Milwaukie at last accounts.

THE WASHINGTON STATES.—John Savage, who, it will be remembered, quarrelled with Heiss of the Washington States, some time ago, now that Heiss no longer controls the paper, has been restored to the editorship.

THE PEMBERTON MILLS.—The reconstruction of the famous Pemberton Mills, at Lawrence, Mass., will soon be completed—It is to be one story higher than heretofore. It will manufacture cotton and woollen goods, and employ 1000 hands.

YALE COLLEGE.—The Yale College commencement exercises closed on the 26th ult., with the usual conferring of degrees. One hundred and eight members of the graduating class were made Bachelors of Arts, forty-six Masters of Arts, one Civil Engineer, and eight Bachelors of Law.

CONSUBIAL TROUBLE IN NEW YORK.—The Supreme Court of New York, by way of keeping up the train of excitement, has declared that all marriages which have been performed by notaries public, have been illegal. As this destroys the validity of an immense number of matrimonial engagements among the German and foreign population, a lively time is anticipated.

YALE COLLEGE SCIENTIFIC SCHOOL.—A noble building for the Yale College Scientific School is on the point of completion at New Haven, Conn., at a cost of $240,000—the entire property being a gift from Joseph E. Sheffield, Esq.

FIRE AND LOSS OF LIFE.—On the afternoon of the 25th ult., the house of Mr. G. Scanlon, about a half mile from Victoria, Texas, was destroyed by fire, and three children were consumed in the flames. Mr. Scanlon and his wife were in the field some distance from the house, when they discovered the conflagration. One of the children burned was aged six years, the second four years, and the third nine months.

FIRE AT AUSTIN, TEXAS.—The steam mill of Mr. George Glasscock at Austin, was burnt down on the night of the 26th ultimo. The mill obtained machinery worth about $30,000, and there was no insurance upon it.

MARRIAGE OF A RICH HEIRESS.—On the 26th ult., Miss Stevens, heiress to the princely estates of the Hoboken (N. J.) Land and Improvement Company, was married to the Hon. Mr. Garnet, M. C. from Virginia.

STRANGERS IN NEW YORK.—The N. Y. Express of the 27th ult., says: "Our city never was so full of strangers as it is just now. There are, we presume, 15,000 or 20,000 in the hotels, and probably 50,000, or more, staying with their friends, or at the innumerable boarding-houses. The Carpet-bag people seem to be as numerous as the residents."

MONUMENT TO THE LATE GOV. JONES, OF TENN.—A number of the friends and admirers of the late Gov. Jones intend erecting a beautiful monument over the remains of the departed statesman, which repose in Elmwood Cemetery, in the vicinity of Memphis. The cost of this appropriate testimonial will be about $2500.

REPORT CONTRADICTED.—The Lancaster (Penn.) Union learns from a reliable source that the report that President Buchanan had sold his residence near Lancaster, known as Wheatland, has no foundation in truth. The property is not for sale.

THE PRINCE OF WALES TO VISIT PITTSBURG.—The Pittsburg Post is informed that during his sojourn in the United States, the Prince of Wales will visit that city. The Post says: "In coming from Canada, he will cross the Lakes and proceed through Ohio to Cincinnati. He will thence return by way of Pittsburg, where he will also remain over night; hence he will go to Harrisburg, where he will also remain over night; thence he will proceed, via Baltimore, to Washington City. A new car will be arranged for his especial accommodation, which will proceed over the various railroads between Cincinnati and Washington.

CHURCH STRUCK BY LIGHTNING.—The St. Luke's Methodist church in Columbus, Ga., was struck by lightning on the afternoon of the 27th ult. The Sun says: "It seems from what we learn, that one of the glass pendants was broken or had become disarranged in some way, and the fluid entered the building, tore up the floors, benches, gas fixtures, and did other similar damage, but the exact extent of which we have not ascertained."

MINNESOTA WHEAT CROP.—The Minnesota papers estimate the wheat crop of that State, the present season, at over six million bushels.

EMBEZZLEMENT.—John F. McAvoys, late Postmaster at Rodney, Miss., and Jos. McAvoys, his deputy, have been committed for trial in the United States Circuit Court at Jackson, in November next, on the charge of embezzlement.

CHARLESTON CUSTOM HOUSE.—The order for a suspension of the work on the new Custom House, in Charleston, has been rescinded, and the work will be continued until the funds on hand are exhausted.

The Hon. Isaac A. Blue, Republican candidate for Congress in the Eighth District of Indiana, died at Delphi, on the 1st inst., after a brief illness.

INCENDIARISM IN AUSTIN, TEXAS.—A letter dated Austin, July the 30th, says: "The torch of the incendiary is actively at work in this city. I understand that a Committee of Safety is to be organized, and several suspicious persons examined. Our citizens still continue patroling. The excitement is unabated.

The Hon. John S. Wells, a distinguished citizen of New Hampshire, died at his residence in Exeter, on the 1st instant. He was once Governor of the State, and also U. S. Senator.

JOHN MITCHEL.—The Richmond Examiner states that John Mitchel has gone to France at the invitation of the Emperor Napoleon, who has conferred upon him some governmental appointment.

OAKLAND COLLEGE.—We learn from the Natchez Courier that a meeting of the Board of Trustees and directors of this institution was held at the college on the 1st inst., at which a number of important measures were adopted. Amongst others, the educational equipment was completed by the election of three new Professors—the Rev. J. H. Calvin of Austin College, Texas, to the chair of the Greek languages and literature; Prof. W. G. Richardson, recently of the University of Mississippi, to that of the Latin language and literature, together with the modern languages; and the Rev. R. Price of Rodney, to that of Belles Lettres and history. The various reports made to the Board indicate a gratifying degree of prosperity in the institution. With its corps of six professors (including the Principal of the preparatory school) and its able President, Dr. Wm. L. Breckenridge, it promises to offer to the student every advantage for obtaining an education which can be desired. A large accession to the classes is expected in the fall.

FIRE IN TALLAHASSEE.—A fire broke out in the office of the Tallahassee Floridian on the morning of the 30th ult., by which that establishment, with its books, notes, accounts, etc., was entirely destroyed. Three stores also shared the disaster.

THE OUTRAGE NEAR MEMPHIS.—We learn from the Memphis Bulletin that three young men—John Reja, C. H. N. Smith, and Nathan Nesbitt—have been arrested on suspicion of having been concerned in the outrage committed on the premises of the Rev. Mr. Watson, near that city, on the night of the 28th ult.

AN INTERESTING QUESTION.—The query has been started, in the New York papers as to what right the Great Eastern has (she being a foreign vessel) to make coasting trips; and, also, what right the steward has to sell liquor on board that vessel, not having paid import duties, as required by the United States laws.

SUIT AGAINST THE GREAT EASTERN.—A suit has been commenced in New York against the Great Eastern for an infringement on an American patent in the use of the paddle and screw, combined as motive power. The damage is laid at $50,000.

SUPREME COURT OF GEORGIA.—Governor Brown has appointed the Hon Charles J. Jenkins to fill the vacancy on the Bench of the Supreme Court of Georgia, caused by the resignation of the Hon. Linton Stephens.

BUILDING IN BOSTON.—No season in Boston (says the Transcript) has witnessed so many expensive buildings begun, or for which contracts have been made, as the present. The addition in value to the real estate in Boston, from the erection or commencement of costly structures, either for trading purposes or private residences during the present season, can not be less than $5,000,000.

FRESHET IN THE HURON RIVER.—A few days ago, there was a freshet in the Huron river—the greatest and most destructive that has occurred for many years. The Detroit Tribune learns that the water, at its highest, was four feet above the extensive flats in Huron and Wayne-town. The growing crops in these places have been very much damaged and large quantities of hay destroyed. The flood rose so suddenly that cattle could scarcely be rescued from destruction.

UNIVERSITY OF GEORGIA.—The Board of Trustees have elected Hon. Joseph Henry Lumpkin Chancellor, and Rev. P. H. Mell Vice Chancellor.

Suits have been commenced against four citizens of Richmond, Va., for refusing to answer the census takers.

ALABAMA.—The Mobile Tribune says that Monday, the 5th inst., the first Monday in August, was the first time since Alabama became a State, that there was no election for State officers of any kind on that day.

ARREST OF AN ACTOR IN MOUNTAIN MEADOW MASSACRE.—A man who had committed a larceny, near Elwood, Nebraska Territory recently, was caught by the Vigilance Committee of that place, who, to alarm and punish the criminal, hung him by the neck until he was nearly strangled, when they lowered him.—Fancying that his end was near, the terrified rogue, upon recovering his powers of speech, confessed that several murders had been committed by him, and that he was engaged in the Mountain Meadow massacre, about two years since. He was handed over to the authorities.

THE DROUTH IN KANSAS.—The Butler (Mo.) Herald says that, almost daily, wagons are passing through that place, carrying families and their effects from Kansas Territory. They say the Southern part of Kansas is literally parched up. They have had no rain during the summer, and can not possibly raise anything. People, in consequence, are abandoning their claims, and moving away to avoid starvation.

THE N. Y. SUN.—Mr. Moses S. Beach has retired from the proprietorship of the New York Sun, and Mr. Wm. C. Church will conduct it in future.

AN INCENTIVE.—The New York correspondent of the Philadelphia Press says that among the recent graduates from West Point was the son of Commodore Vanderbilt, and that the father promised the youth $100,000 if he would bring himself among the first ten, or $50,000 if he completed the course at all. The son was not the winner of the former prize, but received a check for the latter.

THE PRESS AND THE TELEGRAPH.—The New York World newspaper had to pay $2500 for the simple privilege of joining the New York Associated Press, and of course pays for its telegraphic despatches besides. It costs something to start a paper now-a-days.

THE CHICAGO ZOUAVES.—So elated are the citizens of Chicago with the plaudits showered on the Zouaves, that they are going to give them a grand public reception on their return home.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The following is a summary of the most important news from Europe since our last issue:

GREAT BRITAIN.—Parliament was not expected to be prorogued until the third week in this month. Lord Palmerston had made a speech in the House of Commons, urging the necessity and policy of increasing the national defences against invasion, not only in Great Britain, but throughout Europe, and especially in France. It is reported that the Emperor has written "an important and powerful letter" to the French Ambassador in London, in reference to Palmerston's speech.

AUSTRIA AND RUSSIA.—The Prince Regent of Prussia arrived at Teplitz on the 25th of July, and was met by the Emperor of Austria. La Presse, a French journal published in Paris, reports a treaty between Austria and Prussia.

RUSSIA.—A German newspaper says the Czar of Russia has issued a ukase placing native and foreign merchants on the same footing.

ITALY.—A letter from Rome says the Pope had refused to adopt any of the measures recommended by the French ambassador, and declares if the changes are forced on him he will abandon the State. It appears by the last accounts from Sicily that the Neapolitans were still in possession of Messina, they having only evacuated the outskirts of the city. Garibaldi, it is said, during the combat at Milazzo, was wounded in the foot, and narrowly escaped being killed. Naples, at last accounts, was tranquil, but great agitation prevailed in the provinces.

SYRIA.—There is nothing new from Syria. It is understood that a Convention has been signed to which Great Britain, France, Russia, Austria and Prussia, are parties, with a view to intervention in Syria; that Turkey has accepted the proposals for intervention, and that military and naval forces are on their way to Syria.

"NEW DAILY PAPER IN LONDON.—The prospectus of a new daily penny paper, of liberal conservative politics, has just been issued in London. The paper is to be published at noon every day, so as to be enabled to give the news of the morning mails, and its title is to be The Day.

TRANSMISSION OF PARCELS BETWEEN ENGLAND AND FRANCE.—The London Star is informed that Dr. W. H. Brown (formerly one of the lecturers at the Panopticon and Polytechnic) has devised a method of transmitting parcels under water across the channel with great celerity; so that deliveries of goods and letters can be effected, on both sides, several times in twenty four hours, and that a company is being formed to carry it into effect.

THE FRENCH FLAG ON MONT BLANC.—A party of guides of Chamonnix planted the French flag on the summit of Mont Blanc on the 5th of July, with cries of Vive l' Empereur.

A marriage is about to take place between Mademoiselle Trochu, the descendant of Racine, and a young Captain of Infantry in the French army.

REVOLUTION IN AFRICA.—Several of the principal kingdoms of Africa are in full revolution. Theodore I., Emperor of Abyssinia, who but a short time ago was all-powerful, has met with great reverses, and has lost various of the provinces he lately acquired. Negousie-Nilkas, his adversary, has regained the upper hand. The King of Darfour has been ousted by a band of Mangrabins, and is now a wanderer on the confines of his former territories, making every possible effort to escape the pursuit of his enemies.

AID TO GARIBALDI.—A letter dated London, July 20, says: "General Garibaldi continues to receive large additions to his army, not only from Piedmont, whence no less than four thousand volunteers sailed during the week which ended on the 14th inst., but also from all parts of the Levant, from whence Italians and others are continually flocking to his standard; among others are three distinguished officers who have been some time in the service of the Shah of Persia. Guapowder, muskets, arms and ammunition of every kind are daily shipped for him by small trading vessels which clear out for Leghorn or Cagliari. The municipality of Paris has forwarded 14,000 francs to Garibaldi, with an announcement that they would soon send more.

ENGLISH RIBBON-WEAVERS IN DISTRESS.—There are now 40,000 ribbon-weavers out of work in Coventry, England, in consequence of the inability of the manufacturers to adhere to the list of "prices" drawn up in 1814. Great destitution prevails among the unemployed operatives.

AUSTRIAN NATIONAL DEBT.—According to the Austrian National Debt Committee, the entire national debt amounted at the beginning of 1860 to 2268 million florins, Austrian currency. The annual interest required amounted to 59½ millions of florins.

MONUMENT TO GOETHE.—The Prince Regent of Prussia has allotted a sum of 10,000 crowns for the erection of a monument to Goethe, which is to be similar to that now being raised to Schiller.

STATUE OF MARSHAL NEY.—From the chisel of M. Ch. Petre, author of the Joan of Arc of Neufchâteau, is to be inaugurated at Metz on the 15th inst.

The University of Oxford has conferred the honorary title of "D. C. L." upon Rt. Rev. the Provisional Bishop (Horatio Potter) of New York.

BRITISH TELEGRAPHS.—A report recently made by a committee of the British House of Commons, states that grants or guarantees by Government have been given to six companies, with intent to form lines of submarine communication across the Atlantic, along the Mediterranean, down the Red Sea, and across the Indian Ocean. When in operation, this system will connect the land telegraphs in Europe, the United States, British America, India and Austria. It will extend, when completed, from England westward to New Orleans, and eastward to Calcutta, Canton and Melbourne. It is intended ultimately to connect the East Coast of South America with the River Plate, and proceed in one direction along the West Coast to Lima and Valparaiso, and in another to San Francisco, Victoria and Vancouver's Island.

PRINCE JEROME BONAPARTE'S WILL.—It is stated that Prince Jerome Bonaparte, after leaving a fourth of his property to his daughter, the Princess Mathilde, has given the entire remainder to Prince Napoleon. This bequest is a very considerable one, for Jerome, having become economical in his old age, spent only five or six hundred thousand francs of an income amounting to fifteen hundred thousand, comprising his civil list. Consequently, Prince Napoleon will inherit many millions, beside enjoying the chief of his father's official emoluments. To his son and grandson in Baltimore, it is said that nothing has been left by Jerome's testament. The grandson, desiring to be present in the last moments of his relative, was unable to accomplish the wish, but by an order of the Emperor, a place was reserved for him in the family pew at the Invalides.

RETURNED.—Lord Clyde—Sir Colin Campbell—has returned to England from the conquest of India, in good health. The opinion is prevalent among the English people that he has not been honored in proportion to the glory and grandeur of his services.

LETTER OF MARY STUART.—Gallignani states that at a sale of autographs in Paris on the 4th of July, a letter written, dated, and signed by the hand of Mary Stuart, and addressed to her good and dear mother, Catherine de Medicis, was knocked down at 222 francs.

JENNY LIND.—Madame Jenny Lind Goldschmidt is in Stockholm. A great number of her admirers met on the occasion of her arrival and gave her an enthusiastic reception.

RUSSIAN AID TO SCIENCE.—The Emperor of Russia has empowered the Academy of Sciences of St. Petersburg to contribute 1000 silver roubles toward the "Humboldt fund for defraying the traveling expenses of naturalists."

HARVEST PROSPECTS IN IRELAND.—The Dublin Freeman's Journal says that the harvest prospects in Ireland are very bad.

THE TWO SICILIES.—The last census of the kingdom of the Two Sicilies gives 8,616,922 souls to 2949 square miles, or 4223 to one square mile.

HONORS TO AMERICANS.—At the Annual Meeting of the Royal Society of Northern Antiquarians, held at Copenhagen in May, the King of Denmark presiding, Messrs. Jared Sparks and R. C. Winthrop, of Boston, with several distinguished men of Europe and South America, were enrolled as foundation fellows of the Society.

JUNE IN ENGLAND.—The English journals report that last June was the coldest, with three exceptions, that has occurred in the past century. The cold seasons were in 1771, 1821 and 1852. It was eighteen degrees colder on the average than the same month in 1858. Rain fell in England on twenty six of the thirty days of June, and the absence of thunder and lightning is one of the many remarkable features of the month.

THE TURKISH EMPIRE.—The populations now under the nominal rule of the Sultan are: Christians, 18,220,000; Mahomedans, 11,129,000; and Jews 800,000; making a grand total of 33,149,000 in Europe, Asia, and Africa.

HONORS TO VICTOR EMMANUEL AND GARIBALDI.—The Senate of Palermo has decided that the gate of the city and the street by which the soldiers of Garibaldi entered shall take the name of Victor Emmanuel. It also has made overtures to the civic council for a monument as a testimony of gratitude to Garibaldi and those who with him went to fight for Italy; their names to be inscribed on it in bronze.

COAST DEFENCES OF FRANCE.—General Frossard, of the engineers, one of the Emperor's aides-de-camp, and Admiral Bouet Willaumez, have been sent to Nice to make surveys with a view to new defences of the place by sea and land.

THE LATE PRINCE JEROME.—Prince Jerome's estate promises to breed trouble among his heirs. M. Guillemot, in his last letter to the Courier des Etats Unis, writes: "On dit that the Emperor will bestow on the Prince Imperial, and not on the Prince Napoleon, the annual revenue of a million francs, which became vacant in the civil list by the death of Prince Jerome, and to indemnify the Princess Mathilde for the unequal portion which her father left her in his will, he (the Emperor) will allow her the rentals of the stores in Palais Royal, which brought to Prince Jerome a supplementary revenue of two hundred thousand francs yearly. The Independent Belge confirms what I have already informed you, of the intention of the Bonaparte-Patterson family of Baltimore to contest at law their claims as heirs of Prince Jerome. The Privy Council will decide this case."

THE RAVAGED SYRIAN TOWNS.—Damascus has a population of 120,000 inhabitants. Zalileh, before it was sacked, contained 11,000 souls, Deir el Kamer 7000, (of whom 2000 are said to have been slain,) Hasbeya 6000, and Rasheya 2500.

ALLIANCE BY FRANCE AND ENGLAND.—It is stated that a remarkable pamphlet on English politics has appeared at Paris, is supposed to be semi-official, and advocates the alliance of France and England, and warns the latter nation to beware of Germany. It rebukes the English notion that an invasion of the Isle is contemplated by France, and concludes, as follows: "In fact, a sincere peace between the two nations (France and England) would be the continuation of England's maritime grandeur. It would be the West driving back Islamism to Asia. Justice for France would be France on the Rhine, but the Rhine free. If the contrary takes place—that is, the German instead of the French alliance—it would mean France aggrandized and the Czar at Constantinople; the route would be closed against England, and her maritime royalty would be suppressed forever."

MOVEMENT OF ROYAL PERSONAGES.—Queen Victoria and Prince Albert, the German papers say, are going on a visit to Germany, and will pass a week or two at the Palace Rheinhartsbrunn, the summer residence of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, a place celebrated for the beauty of its architecture and the peculiarities of its gardens. Here prince Albert passed his earlier youth. The Emperor and Empress of France were to leave Paris on the 18th ult., for a tour of twenty-five days through Nice, Savoy, Corsica and Algeria, and on their return would proceed to their favorite watering place, Biarritz, to spend the autumn months. The Royal individuals assembled at the Congress of Baden had not all left that place at latest accounts, and the Grand Duke of Baden, the Crown Prince of Saxony, the Prince Regent of Prussia, the King of Bavaria, and a score of petty German potentates, were still at that popular place of resort.

Since our last issue we have received the following intelligence from British North America, Mexico, etc.

Canada.—It is currently reported in Canada that the Governor-General, Sir Edmund Walker Head, is soon to give way to a successor. The opposition papers are joyful at the announcement. Great preparations are making for the reception of the Prince of Wales.

New Brunswick.—The papers are filled with accounts of the festivities on the occasion of the visit of the Prince of Wales to the Province. It really seems that the people are very loyal and the Prince is very popular. We shall next hear of his progress through Canada.

Mexico.—We have late accounts from this distracted country, but they are conflicting and unreliable. Among the rumors is one that Miramon has sustained another and severe defeat near Lagos, but that he escaped capture.

Central America.—The interior of Salvador has been visited with severe earthquakes, and there is a report that the city of San Vincente was destroyed. In Nicaragua, the arrival of General Walker and his men was daily expected.

Peru.—From Peru we have a renewal of the old story that that the question between the United States and that Government is still unsettled, and apparently no nearer a settlement than at first.

POLITICAL.

At a Convention held in Columbus, Ohio, on the 7th, a full Breckinridge and Lane State Election was nominated.

MISSISSIPPI.—Colonel D. C. Glenn, of Harrison, has been nominated Breckinridge and Lane Elector for the State at large, in place of Hon. Henry T. Ellett, resigned.

SENATOR DOUGLAS.—It is stated that Senator Douglas is about to visit the Southern States, and will be in New Orleans in a few weeks.

NEW JERSEY HOUSTON CONVENTION.—The Houston and Stockton Convention, that met at Trenton, New Jersey, on the 25th ultimo, nominated a straight-out Houston electoral ticket.

The Port Gibson (Miss.) Reveille announces that the Hon. H. T. Ellett, of Claiborne county, who was nominated on the Breckenridge ticket for Presidential Elector for the State at large, has resigned his position on the ticket, in consequence of serious sickness in his family, which will prevent his taking an active part in the pending canvass.

CONNECTICUT BELL AND EVERETT CONVENTION.—The Connecticut Bell and Everett Convention met at New Haven on the 1st inst., and nominated an electoral ticket, etc.

A call has been issued in North Carolina for a State Convention of the friends of Douglas to nominate an Electoral ticket.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT BY THE HOUSE.—A singular calculation has been made showing that in case of the election of President by the House of Representatives, the seventeen smallest States can elect a President. Three of these small States have only a single representative, six have only two, three have three, three have four, one has five, and another six, so that thirty-seven members of Congress, being a majority of the delegation from a majority of the States, can elect a President, if no election is made by the electors chosen by the popular vote.

SOUTH CAROLINA.—The canvass for the general election in October has opened in many districts in South Carolina.

The Georgia Douglas Convention has been postponed till the 13th inst., on which day it will meet in Milledgeville.

PENNSYLVANIA BOTELER CONVENTION.—The State Convention of the Forney Douglasites of Pennsylvania met at Harrisburg on the 25th ult. The tone of the Convention and of the resolutions was deadly hostile to the action of the State Committee recommending a union ticket, and it was resolved that a straight Douglas ticket should be put in the field.

The New York Breckenridge Convention to nominate Electoral and State tickets is to be held at Syracuse on the 7th inst.

The Massachusetts Democratic State Convention is to be held at Springfield on the 6th of September.

VERMONT DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION.—This Convention met at Montpelier on the 27th ult. John G. Saxe, of Burlington, was nominated for Governor; Stephen Thomas, of West Fairly, for Lieut. Governor; James S. Thurston, of Montpelier, for Treasurer. Electors at large, Isaac Bawlitch and D. Billingham, of Waterbury. The Convention was unanimous for Douglas and Johnson.

The Douglas Convention, in Mississippi, to select an electoral ticket, is to meet at Grenada, on the 15th inst.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

The Rev. William D. Jones, D.D., died at his residence at Holston Springs, Scott county, Va., on the 22d ult. He was a native of Pittsylvania county, Va., but removed to Kentucky in early life. He was at one time President of Centre College, Danville, Ky., and for 11 years pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Hopkinsville, in that State. For several years he was President of the Rogersville Female College, and at the time of his death, Principal of the High School at Holston Springs.

The Rev. Courtlandt Van Blissplaer, an honored and beloved clergyman of the Presbyterian Church, died at his residence in Burlington, N. J., on the 25th ult.

THE DOMINICANS RE-ESTABLISHED IN ENGLAND.—After an absence of three hundred years, the celebrated order of Dominican Friars is about to return to Newcastle, to assume for a lengthened period the St. Andrew's Mission, and to found a church and monastery in that parish.

On Sunday, 29th ult., the Rev. Dr. Spring, of New York, preached a sermon on the fiftieth anniversary of his ministry, and of his services in the church of which he is pastor.

It is proposed to erect a monument at Exeter, in England, to the "learned and judicious" Hooker, who was a native of that city. Hooker was a distinguished clergyman of the Church of England, and is as well known in this country as in England, by his great work on Ecclesiastical Polity. He died in the year 1600.

CITY NEWS.

On Sunday morning, 5th inst., a fire broke out in the Reading Cotton Press, belonging to Messrs. Reading and Church, in the neighborhood of Front Levee and Erato-streets, and about 250 bales of cotton were destroyed. Loss about $5000, covered by insurance. The fire was evidently the act of an incendiary.

Measures are in progress with a view to the erection of a Monument to the memory of Robert Fulton, in Canal-street, at the intersection of Fulton-street.

Antoine Cambre, who was in the Parish prison, under sentence of death, for the murder of George Frey, a German lamplighter, in the third District, died on the 7th inst., in the condemned cell of the prison, after an illness of a few days.

The notorious Andrew Fludley (Kissane's partner in the burning of the "Martha Washington," and one of those concerned in the extensive forgeries on the Chemical Bank in New York, some years ago) has been arrested in this city as a fugitive from justice.

Ex-Chancellor Stephen Cocke, a well known citizen of Mississippi, died at the City Hotel, on the 7th inst., of cholera morbus. He had been unwell for several days.

About half-past six o'clock on the morning of the 8th inst., a fire was discovered near the engine-room of Messrs. Waterman & Co's. large steam-sash and blind manufactory, at the corner of Howard and Gravier-streets. The buildings being of wood, and the stock being of the same inflammable material, a fierce fire was raging very shortly after the alarm was given. The neighborhood was the worst one possible for a fire to start in, as the buildings around were generally old, and most of them shingle roofed. Before the flames were extinguished, the establishment of Waterman and Co. was entirely destroyed, also three shanties and a two story kitchen on Howard street. On the north side of Gravier-street a two story and a one story frame house, one of the former occupied as a small grocery store. On the south side of Gravier-street, two two story, a double one story, and a one story building—all dwellings—and two coffee-houses, kept by John Hollander and George Reiffel, partially burned. And on Liberty-street, one shanty, two one story frame houses, and a two story dwelling. The loss by this fire is estimated at $60,000. Waterman & Co's loss is estimated at $10,000 upon which they had only $15,000 insurance. The other loss falls upon the owners of the property above enumerated.

On Thursday night, 9th instant, a fire broke out in C. Boye's large furniture store, 51 Royal street, and could not be stopped until property estimated at fully half a million of dollars was destroyed. The whole front of the block on Royal street, between Bienville and Customhouse, was destroyed, together with the dependent workshops fronting on Bienville street. On the opposite side of Royal street, Mr. Alfred Hennen's property, occupied in the upper part by Mr. Pinche, and in the basement by Erard's piano store, was badly damaged, and the roof destroyed; the adjoining property, belonging to Mr. Harris, and unoccupied, was destroyed; the house at the corner of Customhouse and Royal, occupied above by the Irving Club and below by a cigar store, was damaged in its upper part. Almost all the stores and offices on that side of Royal street suffered damage by water. On Customhouse street, towards Bourbon, the fire destroyed two one-story houses, owned by Mrs. Lowell and occupied by Levi Bushell, C. Bright and Dr. James. It damaged considerably the house occupied by Wineon's, restaurant, and destroyed the kitchen and dependencies of Mr. J. W. Zacharie's house. The kitchen of some of the houses fronting on Bienville street were also damaged. On the block where the fire originated, the stores were occupied as follows: Corner of Bienville and Royal, Grasjean and Benedum, dealers in furniture; G. Dupuy, French looking-glasses, engravings, &c; G. S. Simmway, D. Kelman, C. Boye, all furniture dealers; V. Gautte, looking-glasses, &c.; W. McCracken, furniture; Neagle & Carpenter, furniture; Fames & Norman, groceries and liquor store, at the corner of Royal and Customhouse. The owners of the burnt property on the block were R. W. Montgomery, widow Waggaman, R. N. Siebrecht, Dr. A. P. Lambert, and F. C. Rey. It is understood that there was large insurance on the property destroyed. Many of the buildings were not adequate to the exigencies of trade at the present time. They may be advantageously replaced. Montgomery's Row was one of the finest rows of buildings in Royal street. The houses on the other side of the street were also fine buildings. This block was almost entirely occupied by the furniture trade, and the dealers will find with difficulty a suitable location, for never were vacant stores more scarce than this year. Happily there was no loss of life at this extensive conflagration. Some accidents; however, happened, but none very serious.

The city was visited with a heavy rain-storm, accompanied by a high wind, which increased to a violent gale, on Saturday, 11th inst. The river rose three to four feet

ALLINE HOWE: A TALE OF ALABAMA.

BY FANNY SHELDON.

Chapter XVI.

"Clouds pass the moon, nor leave their trace upon her silvery brow,
And stars that have been veiled in storms shine on as brightly now;
The ocean leaves no shade of wrath upon its peaceful shore,
But the fragile reed of human joy, once broken, blooms no more."

It was evening. Alice was seated at an open window of a splendidly furnished parlor, richly attired in a dress of pearl-colored brocade, which fell in graceful folds around her fine dignified form; bracelets of rare value decorated her exquisite arms; her dark wealth of hair was braided around her queenly brow, ornamented by a diadem of sparkling beauty on one side, and on the other by a single white camelia gathered from her own garden. Her whole appearance was one of regal beauty as she sat there amidst splendor and luxury. She was dressed for Ellen Carlton's party. Weary, and wishing for a few moments's solitude before she entered upon the evening's gaities, she had sought this retreat for meditation and for a calm examination of her heart, its thoughts, hopes and disappointments. The shades of evening were deepening around her, the odor of sweet flowers came with every gentle breeze that fanned her cheek. The moon, pale empress of the starry night, was slowly rising in the east, casting her mellow light upon surrounding objects, and falling upon her head as it rested so still, so unconscious of all outward objects upon the window sill, her jewelled arms folded so gracefully beneath it. Ah, Alice! never before has your head been bowed in silent thought, never before has your pure, glad face been darkened by a single cloud, or your bosom heaved with one moment of dissatisfaction or unrest! But though so light, so buoyant, and delicate in outward seeming, her nature is strong to endure, her heart capable of suffering, and her pride fully consistent to sustain her through every disappointment in life. What think you are her thoughts, as she thus reclines in rich attire and princely hall? They are of one whom she deems far away. A man, of whom truly it might be said, "he is the noblest work of God." In whom there was combined all high, noble, and intellectual qualities. Percy Maitland had been the pride, the hope; yea the life of Alice May's existence for many months.

"But joy's bright sun had shed his evening ray,
And hope's delusive meteors ceased to play."

For could she be his under existing circumstances—would she burden one so proud, so noble, with a wife without a single claim to society, without a home, or without a name, but those which charity had vouchsafed.

"No, no, Maitland," she exclaimed, "I am strong to endure, and alone I will bear my shame, if shame there be, and never, while there remains a doubt respecting my birth, will I be more to you than I now am. Oh, God! may my great love for him render me strong and firm in this resolve! May it elevate and purify my heart, and may no selfish wish or desire ever for a moment blend with my affection for him."

A servant entered with lights, and rising, she stood before a mirror which reflected back her faultless form and features, together with the splendor of the apartment in which she stood. She saw that she was beautiful, she knew the value of the costly ornaments with which she was decked, and the richness of everything by which she was surrounded. "Yet," she inwardly exclaimed, "all this and far more would I give in exchange for a name.—Oh! how bright has been my past, how joyous was my present, how hopefully glowed my future, a few short days ago!" As she thus stood absorbed in thought her carriage was announced; she was handed in, and the horses fled rapidly away, bearing her with all her hidden grief and vain yearnings to a scene of gaiety and pleasure.

"Oft aching hearts in rich brocade are drest,
And diamonds glitter on an anxious breast."

How indeed was the scene which now beamed upon Alice, and in which she must act her part. All that wealth could afford or art supply had been freely bestowed by Mr. Carlton on this evening's amusement. A flood of light streamed from the windows of the splendid mansion; sounds of sweet music fell upon the ear, mingled with the tones laugh of the merry youthful beings that crowded the luxurious apartments. As she entered the room many eyes turned towards her in admiration; yea, almost wondringly; so brilliantly beautiful was her appearance.

"Her eyes upon your sight,
Broke with the lambent purity of planetary light.
And an intellectual beauty like a light within a vase

She danced, sang, and played; many pressed around her. Looks, tones, and even words spoke the admiration and devotion of many. But still the same calm, placid exterior told that upon her heart no impression was to be made. Weary and flushed, she sought quiet and fresh air upon the balcony that overlooked the garden. As she stepped forth into the open air the beauties of a clear July night were around her. All was quiet and tranquil; the moon and stars shone with a brilliancy almost equal to that of noon-day, and though flowers the fairest and freshest bloomed around her, and breezes pure and gentle fanned her flushed cheek, it was not these had power to chain her there. So wrapt in thought, so silent to outward things was her soul's solitude that the sky might have darkened, the flowers might have lost their fragrance, and the cool breeze might have lulled to a sudden calm, and not have broken the spell that bound her.

Ah, Percy, I have suffered; must yet suffer alone; for to you I must appear calm as if this olond had not darkened my hitherto peaceful life. Oh, Father in Heaven, may this trial purify my heart, and may I not falter in my resolution to do my duty."

As she thus stood unmindful of the music and dancing, and of the hum of glad voices that fell in indistinct murmurs upon her ear, she started suddenly; but instantly growing calm, she bent far over the alight railing, her breath suspended, and her whole attitude one expressive of deep earnest attention. For, tones strangely familiar had reached her ear. It might be fancy; but, no, no other tones, no other voice would have attracted her attention. None other possessed the power to have interrupted her deep waking-trance of absorbing thought in which she had been for the last few moments so lost. As she thus stood flooded by the mild glory of that gorgeous summer night, her costly ornaments reflecting back and sparkling in the moonbeams, she seemed all too fair, too bright for sorrow's touch, too lovely for the mantle of grief ever to enshroud. Again there fell upon her ear those same deep tones. This time there was no mistake, for below her stood Percy Maitland. How or from whence he had come so suddenly she knew not. But there he was, only a few steps from her whowas to him all that life possessed worth living for. He had ambition; yea, he possessed power! He had wealth and influence. But what were these if not cheered by Alice! Frank led the way and they passed in to join those who were so buoyant and heppy in that room of mirth. There Maitland expected to find her whom he sought. But after looking in vain for a few moments, Frank passed out to the balcony followed by Percy. Frank, after gaily introducing them as though they were strangers, and rallying Alice upon her love of moonlight and flowers, left them. Alice stood endeavoring to calm her excessive agitation, and to gain firmness and command of her own feelings to perform the painful task of crushing the hopes of the faithful, noble heart which had loved her so truly and so long.

"Alice, dear Alice!" passionately exclaimed Maitland, "with what eagerness and impatience have I looked forward to this meeting with you! All is now arranged for our immediate union; and soon, very soon, my beloved, shall I claim this heart and hand in marriage. All too long have I waited, and you know not the agony of suspense; for, sometimes, when I have been sad and lonely, there has come over my dream of happiness with you, a shadow, or a presentiment, that so much of earthly joy was not for me. And in anguish and desolation, has, with this fancied loss of you, fled every other earthly hope. Speak, Alice. What, no word of welcome for me! But I will not chide thee, my bright one; for this strange agitation, this visible excitement speaks more than words, and is very flattering. I have thought of thee, dreamed of thee, and of thy loving tones and happy smile."

"I, too, have dreamed, Percy," began Alice, in sad but distinct tones, which were calm even to despair. "Dear one have been; very dear you still are; and oh, if I alone could suffer, I would gladly bear your portion as well as my own. For I have that to say which will bring sorrow to your kind, generous heart, and deeply grieve your noble nature. But be true to yourself and your position in society, and waste not a life of so much value to others in vain repinings after one who, however cultivated in mind and fair in person, has no legitimate claim on any one; has no home or even name but those which charity has bestowed. Had I known this sooner we both might have been spared this hour's anguish. But not for myself alone do I suffer, and oh Percy, strengthen and aid me in doing what my heart feels to be right. I must never be more to you than I am now, while around my birth there remains the shadow of a doubt."

"Alice, what of your birth? Why disturb my peace and ruin my happiness after years of such unequivocal proof of affection? What am I to understand by all this? Tell me, for this suspense is intolerable!"

"Percy, you cannot think for a moment that I wish to trifle with you. No, no, you should know me too well to think this for a single moment. But this is what I would say: I am not what I have seemed; am not the child of Mr. and Mrs. May, or of any one else of whom anything is known. I was found, a cast-off infant, at the door of those who have indeed been parents to me. They have supplied my wants and bountifully lavished upon me not only their wealth of affection but every luxury which wealth could bestow. And now, Maitland, let other scenes attract you, and let some more worthy, but not more loving heart share thy noble affection and the home which Providence has, perhaps in mercy, denied me. For I doubt not that God will turn this disappointment into a blessing."

And thus she spoke on calmly and even hopefully. "For oh, thought she,

"I would not have thee know
The stream that seems to thee so still Has such a tide below."

Percy Maitland was very pale and his strong nature was strongly agitated as he listened to the blighting of all his hopes of happiness. His head was bowed on his bosom and his quivering breath came slow and uneven. It was a fearful struggle between love and pride. For he was jealous of that which the world calls honor. This was his weakness, if, indeed he possessed any. For a few moments he remained silent. But love, all-conquering love triumphed; for who could know Alice May, or even look upon her without a thrill of unalloyed pleasure. And how could he give her up knowing that he possessed her young heart's purest, gentlest affection.

"Alice, mine—you are I mine, you shall be!" he began, in tones of deep and passionate earnestness; "through shame or through glory, I love thee. I will give thee n stain on society; I will bestow a home, yea, a name, and none shall dare to question your right to everything noble and elevated, when, as the wife of Percy Maitland, I present you to the world. Yes, I feel as I have never felt before the value of worldly possessions, and the mental gifts which it has been my pleasure to cultivate. Yes, I possess wealth, I have honor; yea, eloquence, which is power; it has quelled the riot, it has subdued excitement, it has swayed the multitude. These shall avail us now, my Alice. Mine, mine, you must be, independent of circumstances or even of fate itself!" he exclaimed, as he folded her to his heart. Alice yielded for a moment only to this fond proof of his affection. She gently withdrew from his embrace, and though she said not anything to dim the bright, hopeful prospect of which her lover had spoken, yet her heart remained unchanged in its purpose, and her mind true to its own perception of right.

The night was waning fast; but so absorbed had they been that they were unconscious of the flight of time or of the change in the appearance of all without and around them. The sky that had been so bright was now darkened; masses of rolling clouds had been gradually rising in angry violence, till now every ray of light was obscured. But a sudden vivid flash of lurid lightning which illumined the whole heavens, and even earth, with a momentary brightness, followed by a crash of deafening thunder, fully aroused Percy from this trance of joy. And, drawing Alice again within the brilliant apartment, which they had left an hour or two before a scene of gaiety and mirth, they were surprised to find the music and dancing suspended, and many of those who seemed so gay a few hours before now seated in quiet groups, awed by the raging of the elements without. The storm had arisen suddenly, and was becoming every moment fierce and more awfully violent. Flash after flash of lightning followed each other in quick succession, while crash after crash of deafening thunder caused all to shrink with momentary fear.—Faster and more fearfully descended the rain, intermingled with violent gusts of wind which seemed at every moment to shake the splendid mansion of Mr. Carlton to its very foundation.

Conversation was impossible, for they could with difficulty hear each other speak; thus they sat impatiently awaiting the storm to lull or cease. The night was far advanced before this wished for calm came; and then it was fearfully dark, so much so that it was with difficulty that the conveyances were to be gained. The streets were overflowing, and darkness profound reigned, unbroken by a single ray of light. Naught but the murmur of the swollen streams, the rumbling of distant thunder, together with the fierce whistling of the angry winds, greeted their ears as they groped their way home.

"Do let me carry you, Alice," said Percy, as he carefully arranged the folds of her mantle around her delicate form. "Your thin slippers are no protectors from this deluge," he continued, as he was about to raise her in his arms. But Alice refused his proffered kindness, and hurried on unheeding his kind words and anxious fears for her health.

She was soon seated by him within her carriage and belag borne to her home of luxury and wealth. Ah, Alice! is there no apprehension, no vague undefined fear that this exposure may prove fatal to your health, that your life will be the forfeit of this night's imprudence and exposure? Already you feel a chill which you endeavor in vain to hide. Percy had not failed to notice the weary look and the expression of utter exhaustion with which she sank back into the soft cushion, and though her face was now shaded from the rays of the carriage lamp, he fully realized that she was suffering. They were not long in reaching her home; and there bidding her a gentle good night, with many expressions of love and many fears for her health, he turned away.

Alice passed in and sought her pillow, there to toss in restlessness and disturbed slumber all night. Her vision of happiness had fled. The disappointing realities of life had been for some time fast impairing her health, and from this night there was a seal set upon her brow, and the links which bound her unto life were frail indeed.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

REV. SAMUEL HAWS.

It has been the fortune of but few men to leave behind them, and to transmit to future generations, a reputation more honorable than the subject of this memoir, Rev. Samuel Haws, who departed this life on the morning of the 2d of July, 1860, after an illness of twenty-two days, of typhoid fever. He seemed to be conscious or sensible from the first that his sickness would end in death, though to him death had no sting; it was to him a vanquished foe, and he felt to his last moments that heaven was his by title and by promise. He was perfectly resigned to the will of his Heavenly Master. Being frequently interrogated upon the subject of religion, his answer always was in the language of willingness and submission, leaving to his numerous weeping friends, and to his bereaved companion, the hope that he is not dead, but calmly sleeps in Jesus. Those who knew Bro. H. knew him but to love him; he lived truly in the spirit of his religion, giving himself up to his Heavenly Father's work; as he lived so did he die. He leaves behind him a companion and two children, with whom we deeply sympathize, and beg of them not to weep as those who have no hope; but may it remind them and all who read this, that they too must die; to say, by actions as well as words, "Thy will be done," which was the text of his last sermon, and which is still fresh in the hearts and memory of all his flock. We need no sermon to remind us of death; the noble, the beautiful, and the gifted have bowed alike before the pale power which rules our being and dooms our flesh to dust. Memory has many proofs in store to demonstrate mortality. One universal certainty pervades and chills our race; it is, that we must die; it is, that the green earth we tread upon now shall cease to be pressed by our footsteps, and this places which now know us shall become strangely forgetful that we ever lived and moved within their precincts.

Yet, oh, how pleasant is it to remember the dead! Imagination has its enchanting hopes and delights, but in memory exists all that is most dear and precious to the heart. Yes, frequently have I in memory been conveyed back to the pleasant hours I spent in company with our departed pastor, or to the times of sitting in the house of God while he was, in his able manner, pointing sinners to the Lamb of God, etc. With what an omnipotence of power does the frail mortal, who perhaps stands on the brink of the grave, and within the hour of his own dissolution, call up from the dead the lovely spiritual forms of those once dear to him! They come breathing the fragrance of the gentle South; the chill of death is not with them; their features are expressive of tenderness—a solemn heart-moving tenderness; they are more lovely to the mind's eye than they were even when they stood in the pride and beauty of life. Our beloved pastor's last text or prayer, will remain fresh in the memory of all, I hope, throughout the endless ages of eternity. May these words of our departed brother be written in the minds and hearts of all, in characters that but deepen with maturity. I thank God that they linger about my heart a blessing and a safeguard. Oh, may these words, when the heedlessness of the day would lead any of us into error, may that sweet voice, now hushed forever, intermingle with our thoughts, and, like the rosy link of a fairy, draw us from our purposes. May he, though dead, yet speak. May all who know him imitate his noble example, and may God give us and his bereaved relatives the hope, the blissful hope of meeting in heaven, where sickness, sorrow and pain and death are felt and feared no more.

REV. ISAAC TABOR.

A father in Israel has fallen! Rev. Isaac Tabor, long a faithful soldier of the Cross and a watchman upon the walls of Zion, is no more! Father Tabor, as he was familiarly known, was born in Claiborne county, Miss., on the 6th April, 1787, and died in Caldwell county, Texas, July 8th, 1860. He was first convicted of sin under the ministry of Rev. Tobias Gibson, one of the pioneers of Methodism to the Mississippi Territory, and received into the Methodist Episcopal Church by Rev. Thomas Leslie about the year 1807, and was licensed to preach by Rev. Lsuner Blackman in 1809. He was never a member of the Conference in Mississippi, but preached extensively in different portions of the State, and a part of the time under the Presiding Elder, extending his labors to the State of Louisiana. He moved to Texas in 1837, and soon after settled in Montgomery county. He joined the Texas Conference about the year 1839, and travelled three or four years, when he located; but as long as he was able he labored in the cause of Christ, and only ceased to preach from physical disability some two or three years before his death. He left his aged companion to follow him to the tomb, with whom he lived happily for more than half a century. They had nine children, five of whom still live.

Father Tabor did not have the advantages of a finished education, but was deeply versed in the Bible and our standard theological works. Watson's, Wesley's, and Fletcher's were his text books, and with these he was very familiar; his style of preaching was of such a character as to embody a great deal of divinity, and yet was pointed and practical. He was a man of great faith and prayer, and frequently, and sometimes apparently, marvellously realised direct answers to his prayers. He was insensible at his death, but was remarkably happy while he retained his faculties; but from his exemplary walk, there can be no doubt that the old veteran has found rest from his labors, and the old soldier received an honorable discharge, and has gone to his reward on high.

ORGAN GRINDERS' PRAYER MEETING.—The New York Times states that there has been recently held in that city, a prayer meeting of the Organ Grinders. "The services were conducted in the Italian language, and the leadership by one of the number. Though numerically small, the meeting was earnestly carried on, and all seemed eager to take part in the exercises."

AMERICAN MISSIONARIES IN INDIA.—It is stated that the British Government proposes to indemnify the families of the missionaries in India who were among the victims of the mutiny for the losses of property suffered at that time. Inquiries with a view to this object have been made of the families of the American missionaries in this country.

During the last fifty years 3833 student were graduated at Yale College. Of those 608 have died.

LADIES GARIBALDI BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.—There is in London a Ladies' Garibaldi Benevolent Association, for the sick and wounded, widows and orphans of Garibaldi's followers. The list is headed by Florence Nightingale. The prospectus says: "This Association has been formed for the purpose of collecting money in sums from 1d. upwards, to provide for the sick and wounded of Garibaldi's followers, and in some degree to relieve the sufferers at Palermo and other places. None of the money will be applied to warlike purposes, but solely to those of charity and benevolence, and it is therefore hoped that many will join in this labor of love. The subscriptions, when collected, will be at once transmitted to General Garibaldi, who will find the proper agents for the distribution of the same."

VOLCANIC ERUPTION IN ICELAND.—Captain Neilson, of the Kron Princess Caroline from Cienfuegos, arrived in Liverpool, reported as follows: "A volcanic eruption of the mountain Myrdis Gakel, in Iceland, took place on the 11th of May last, continuing with uninterrupted violence for nearly a month, and could be seen at a distance of one hundred and twenty miles at night; and, what is most remarkable, an eruption occured 105 years ago on precisely the same date, destroying everything for miles round."

A POOR PRINCE.—The Elector of Hesse has compelled one of his sons, who like all the others, bears the title of Prince of Hanau, to live separated from his wife, whom he married against his father's will, and whose unaspiring maiden name was Miss Hirshaum. This son, who has now got two bachelor's apartments in the palace, receives from his father an allowance of only 220l. yearly, of which he has to pay 100l. for the maintenance of his wife, while of the remainder, one half has, far a series of years, been legally secured for the benefit of his creditors, so that the Prince has now to make both ends meet with free lodgings and 60l. a year. So, at least, reports the Cologne Gazette.

GARIBALDI AND THE NEW YORK GERMANS.—At a recent meeting of the members of the New Yorker Turnverein, it was resolved to give a grand exhibition of Gymnastic feats after their grand annual picnic, which is to take place on the 13th inst. There is also a movement going on among the Germans throughout the State to transmit the money collected some time ago for the benefit of the Steuben Monument Associations and the Kinkle fund, to Garibaldi, to aid him in his struggles against the Bourbon government at Naples.

THE GREAT U. S. AGRICULTURAL FAIR AT CINCINNATI.—The officers of the United States Agricultural Society are industriously employed in sending to all parts of the Union the premium lists and circulars of the Great National Exhibition which is to be held at Cincinnati in September. It is expected that the Cincinnati fair will eclipse any yet held in this country. The premium list amounts to $30,000, of which a large share in sums of $500, $300, $200 and $100, is offered for horses.

THE MORTARA CASE.—Father Feletti, who took part in the abduction of the child Mortara, has been made Grand Prior of the Dominican convent of La Minerva at Rome, in recompense for his nine months' imprisonment by Dictator Farini.

Fitz Edward Hall, a native of Troy, N. Y., and a graduate of Harvard College in 1816, since which he has resided in India and become a distinguished Oriental scholar, has received, as well as Mr. Motley, the historian, the honorary degree of Doctor of Civil Law from the University of Oxford, England.

Lady Franklin, the devoted widow of the Artic navigator, has, by voluntarily registering herself as an annual subscriber to the funds of the corps, become an honorary member of the North Middlesex (English) Rifles. Miss Burdett Coutts is also a volunteer of this class.

AFRICAN ARRIVALS.—The Charleston Courier, of the 31st ult., says: "A cargo of ebony strangers landed on the coast, not two hundred miles from this city, on Wednesday morning. Many of them have gone to the interior to study the growth of cotton, corn and rice."

UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH.—The next meeting of the Board of Trustees of the University of the South is appointed to be held at University Place, Franklin county, Tennessee, on the 9th day of October.

POPULATION OF SAN FRANCISCO.—The new directory of San Francisco is just published, containing the names of 26,000 men. This, allowing the ratio of men to population to be one to eight, would give a total population of over 200,000.

MOUNT VERNON.—John A. Washington, Esq., the former proprietor of Mount Vernon, has formally transferred the home and grounds to the Ladies' Mount Vernon Association. Mr. Washington will reside on his farm, Waherly, in Fauquier county. He is still the proprietor of a large portion of the Mount Vernon estate.

SOUTH AFRICA.—The Dutch Reformed Church at the Cape of Good Hope have appointed the Rev. Dr. Robertson to visit Holland, Scotland, and America, to select clergymen and teachers for many of the vacant parishes in South Africa.

DEATH OF AN OLD SOLDIER.—Isaac Chambers, who fought in the battle of New Orleans, died in Jefferson county, Ind., on the 28th ult., aged sixty-six years. He formerly lived in Bardstown, Ky., and volunteered there for the war of '15.

Miss Dix, the eminent philantropist, was in Chicago a few days ago, visiting the asylums and prisons.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MARY HENSON, wife of John C. Henson, and daughter of Henry Thomson, died on the 19th July, 1860, at her residence in Randolph county, Ala., aged 32 years. Sister Henson was married to Mr. Henson in early life, and consequently had a large family of small children to mourn the loss of their beloved mother. She gently closed her earthly pilgrimage. Much might be said of her many virtues, her uniform and consistent piety. She delighted in the services of the sanctuary and of the closet. She bore constant testimony that her life was hid with Christ, and her loved voice still lingers in our ears while singing the sweet songs of Zion, when in the discharge of her domestic duties. She was extremely poor in this world's goods, but rich in faith, for she would frequently cry out, in the language of a true believer, "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and maketh intercession for me with the Father." Our much loved sister is one of those who has entered in through great tribulation, her husband being a very wicked and drinking man opposed her in all her religious exercises. In her last moments she bequeathed an infant daughter of a few hours of age to a beloved sister in Christ. For several years she has been a consistent member of the M. E. Church, though much afflicted; attended her class punctually, going on foot three or four miles to do so. But now, my sister, thy sufferings are ended, and we strive to meet thee in that happy land where partiog is no more.

MISS JULIANN SARAH ARLEDGE was born March 23d, 1841, and died June 22d, 1860, after a protracted illness of about eleven months, most of which time she was confined to her bed. The writer of this sketch was often with her during her last sickness, and was frequently called upon to pray with and sing with her, in which she would join with feelings of devotion; and although her suffering was intense, yet she bore her afflictions with calm and christian resignation, and was never heard to murmur or complain, except when suffering the most acute paroxysm of pain. She died in great peace, after having been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church since 1854. In her death is fully presented the triumph of Christianity. A short time before her happy soul was released from its tenement of clay, she called her brother to her bedside, exhorted him to get religion, take charge of her orphan sisters, and meet her in heaven. Then invoking the blessing of heaven on her father, and all the rest of her friends, she folded her arms on her breast, closed her eyes, and breathed her last; her unfettered spirit winged its way to the climes of immortal glory. Let me live the life of the righteous, that my last end may be like theirs.

MRS. GEORGIANA HUBBELL, wife of E. V. Hubbell, Esq., and daughter of J. W. Duby, Esq., all of this city, died July 31, 1860, after a brief illness, leaving an infant daughter ten days old. She was one of Capt. R. L. Robertson's Sunday-school children in the Morean-street Methodist Church, where she afterwards became a zealous and useful teacher, was converted, and lived a faithful Christian and member of the Church until her death. Though young, and married only about a year, she regularly held fervently prayer with her husband. To an afflicted mother, and to her father, she was a most dutiful, patient, and sympathizing daughter. She was faithful to her class-meetings and all the means of grace. She was a woman of great strength of character, and great fortitude and perseverance in all the trials of life. In her death, her parents, her husband, and the Morean-street church and Sunday-school, have suffered a severe loss. The writer was her early friend, her Sunday-school superintendent, and her last class leader. He knew her well, loved her much, and deeply mourns her posthumely death.

MRS. NANCY HOVIE died on the 28th June last, at the residence of her son-in-law, Wm. J. W. Mooney, of this place.—She was aged about seventy-five years, thirty-six of which she had been connected with the Church. She was a faithful and zealous Methodist and Christian, and departed in the full triumph of Christian faith, saying at the hour of her departure, "Jesus is with me, and I am ready."

MARTHA WASHINGTON COLLEGE, ABINGDON, Virginia: The next Annual Session of this Institution will begin on the first Monday in August, 1860, under the Presidency of Rev. Wm. A. Harris, A.M., who will be assisted by a full corps of able and accomplished instructors in the various departments of the College.

This Institution presents to the public the most remarkable and superior claims as one of the best and highest seats of learning within the limits of the Union. The beauty, elegance and comfort of the buildings, are probably unsurpassed by any similar Institution. The location of the College is healthy, beautiful and attractive.—From its classic and lovely campus of Forests and Flowers, it looks out upon a broad expanse of natural scenery, remarkable for its grandeur and beauty.

It is in the suburbs of the refined and healthy town of Abingdon, within two hundred yards of the Va. and Tenn. Railroad, within twenty minutes' ride of Emory and Henry College, and accessible from all parts of the Union.

The Boarding Department is conducted under the superintendence of the President and his kind family, in the most superior, refined, and comfortable style.

This College will aim to secure the one grand end of combining, within its sphere of action all the blessings which may be enjoyed in the hallowed precincts of the most refined and elegant home, with the highest and most substantial advancement. To secure to the pupil the loftiest and truest standard of Intelligence, Refinement and Religion, will constitute the great aim of Martha Washington College.

The sessions of the College are coincident in opening and closing with those of Emory and Henry College, so that pupils from both institutions from a distance can, as relatives, return to and from their homes together.

THE GOVERNESS.

BY LUTHA FONTELLE.

Miss Harper grew every day more deeply into our affections. The graces of her mind and heart unfolded hourly in the genial atmosphere, the protecting care of Terre d'Amour, even as a flower, that chilling winds had long confined, in its green calyx, spreads out its bright fair leaves and diffuses its delicate fragrance in the bland air that woos it forth. A faint rose tinge appeared and gradually deepened in the white cheeks; health gave them back their fulness; and the soft brown hair took a richer lustre. The full gray eyes were no longer introverted, as if the heart was feeding on memories alone, or turned yearningly to the scenes of nature, or to the varying sky, as if there only she could look for present companionship. They had forgotten those touching habits. They read a kindly interest in all other eyes that daily met their mild radiance, and they seemed to delight in seeking it, while themselves were shedding love constantly. It was as if she breathed once more her native air, the air of thoughtful kindness for which she had languished. This was the habitual atmosphere of our home. In it nothing drooped but evil, from it nothing fled but cruelty.

The Truehearts of Terre d'Amour were worthy of the name. Miss Harper came to them an orphan and a stranger. That was sufficient to awaken their warmest sympathy, and call forth all the brightness of christian courtesy. She was to aid them in developing the minds and forming the characters of their children, and therefore to be received as a daughter and sister, and honored as a co-worker with them in the glorious labor of educating immortal souls.

A large pleasant room opposite that of Aunt Grace was the counterpart of the latter, in the quiet elegance and completeness of the arrangements. On her arrival, Aunt Margaret conducted her to it, saying, "This is your room, Miss Harper. Should you desire any change, you will confer a favor by informing me. We all wish you to be very happy with us." And, she kissed with sisterly affection the pale cheeks, and looked tenderly into the sad eyes that appealed to her womanly sympathies.

Miss Harper pressed the hand that kindly held hers, but gathering emotions prevented a reply. The unexpected warmth of her reception, the contrast of this home-like room, and the thoughtful interest in her comfort lt evinced, with the stifling, unfurnished attic to which she had been rudely conducted by a servant in the situation she had recently left, made her tremble with a weakness long unfamiliar, and kindness unlocked with a sudden impulse the tears that had been sealed in their hidden fountain by coldness and silent, unheeded suffering. Aunt Margaret pressed more warmly the trembling hand and remained silent beside her. After a moment, Miss Harper regained her self-control, and said in a voice of touching sweetness, "You must excuse my tears, Mrs. Truehcart. It seemed to me for a moment that I had returned to my lost home after a painful absence."

"May it seem like home to you always," replied Aunt Margaret; with that inexpressible charm of voice and manner that has its root in a noble heart.

When left alone, it was sometime before she was able to examine her surroundings. The room was spacious, the ceiling high. Once more she could breathe freely.—Her feet pressed a soft carpet, where lilies of the valley and blue violets looked sweetly up from beds of green and brown mosses, and a delicate vine here and there interlaced them. On the walls were several choice engravings, an exquisite landscape in oil, and several fine heads. A small antique vase was filled with flowers, whose fresh and mingled perfume came to her like the fragrance of kindly deeds. A large book-case of rosewood was partly filled with a choice selection of works. "It is so like my own dear room," she sighed. "And then she thought of the stately pillars, and the sweet flowers blooming around them, all laid in the dust. She alone was left to dwell on the memory of that bright home. But she looked up to them in the brighter Home of the All-Father, and kneeling, thanked him for the treasures lent and resumed, for the blessings daily given, and pleaded earnestly for the continued light of His guiding presence.

She accompanied Edith to the parlor, the peace that flows from the Living Fountain filled her soul, and gave such spiritual beauty to her pale face, that she seemed to Aunt Margaret no longer a stranger, but a sister beloved in the Lord. Miss Harper had earlier recognized this relation by the same higher sense, the heart-sense of the true earnest believer. John, the beloved disciple, possessed this power in an eminent degree.—When Christ, after his resurrection, stood on the shore of Lake Gennesaret, and called to Peter and others in the ship, "Children, have ye any meat?" John first recognized him by his heart-sense, and said, "It is the Lord." And those who live in Christ reflect His image, and discern it in each other long before the outward life can be proved a true exponent of the inner. Miss Harper was presented to the other members of the family, and soon perceived that the graceful dignity, the delicate tact that places one immediately at ease among strangers, the thoughtful, but unobtrusive attentions that were habitual to Aunt Margaret, were not confined to her, but pervaded the circle like a household charm. And this charm was the spirit of active love, of true courtesy.

It is painful to reflect that there are cold and selfish homes; no, not homes, they are unworthy of the name, families merely, where the talented and refined governess, delicately reared, and accustomed to affectionate consideration, finds herself suddenly among a strange people, who receive her with proud indifference, and treat her with cruel neglect, sometimes with even vulgar rudeness. They can appear kind, and more or less attractive in their intercourse with those that promise them additional pleasure, or influence, or social standing, but are coldly repulsive to the teacher, the stranger, and consider that she is amply provided for if she has a place to lay her head, and a seat at their table. What is it to them that she has genius, a noble heart, and refined tastes!—"Do they not pay for the performance of her daily duties?" And do not they, also, receive payment for their cotton, cane, or rice, or fees for their medical skill, or legal knowledge? Where lies the weighty difference? "But she is a lady, unprotected, and far from her friends." She has then the higher claim on their protection. And very likely has the balance in her favor, as the nobler in soul and intellect. For there must ever be an absence of justice, of native kindness, a deficiency in common sense, and true refinement, where there is neglect or selfish indifference to the comfort and happiness of any inmate of the family, and particularly of a governess. If she is fitted for her duties, no amount of salary can ever repay her for the sacrifice of friends and home, for her patience and skill in instilling into young, careless, wayward minds, the varied knowledge which she has gained by costly years of arduous application, or for the valuable days, the earnest energies, devoted to the work. And those who being able to give justly, dole out pitiful salaries, are the most inclined to economize their affections, to withhold the thousand little kindnesses, and the essential comforts that render a residence among strangers endurable. They are, too, strangely ignorant, or weakly regardless of the best interests of their children. For the teacher who is surrounded by home comforts, who is made a welcome participant of their joys and luxuries, brings to her noble work a buoyancy of feeling, a confidence of appreciation, and a grateful esteem that deepens her interest, and quickens all her energies. But where she involuntarily shrinks from contact with coarser natures, where their cold, cruel, selfish hearts are barred against her, and while she suffers for common comforts, is inwardly thankful that she is thus saved from such companionship, how her spirit must droop in the withering influences of this bleakness, how greatly her efforts be weakened!

Miss Harper had left such a blighting atmosphere, unable longer to breathe it, for the genial warmth of Terre d'Amour. There her heart seemed ever overflowing in its fulness of quiet joy and loving gratitude. It said to her one day, "Dear Miss Harper, you give too much thought to the children. Were we not all combined to secure for you relief and needful leisure, I believe you would devote yourself entirely to their interests."

"Ah, Rose!" she answered, as the tears gathered in her expressive eyes, "you can not realize the contrast of my life here with that of the past year. My whole being was starving in a wide desert where no sweet flowers clustered me with loving fragrance, no tree sheltered me from the cruel storm or the withering wind. And here the considerate kindness that varies only to find a nobler or a more delicate expression, is ever reproducing my own lost home. Again I feel that peace folds her white wings over a true home, and joy and affection dwelling within, pour treasures from heart to heart. Do not wonder then, sweet Rose, that my mind is quickened by this precious sympathy and generous appreciation to nobler efforts, that my heart responds to all this goodness, and is unable to resist the impulses of grateful affection."

"We are no less grateful to you, Miss Harper, and feel unable to repay the debt we all owe to you, and which is ever increasing. But I can not understand the lonely position to which you alluded. I should have died there. It seems impossible that any one could know without loving you."

"Ah, gentle heart, that colors what it loves with its own brightness!" she said, playfully. Some student of human nature has said that to know one, we must love him. And their hearts could not open to a governess! Meagre hearts! Is it not Wordsworth that says,

> 'And you must love him, ere to you
> He will seem worthy of your love.'

I believe it.

She opened a portfolio, and taking out a paper said, "Here is a stray leaf that will give you one passage in the first month of that isolated life. Not wholly sad, even then, as you might suppose. And afterwards I became almost happy, although my weak human nature loves dearly to lean on some loving heart."

O, how I pitied the narrow souls that could not understand the treasure lent them vainly! How my heart throbbed painfully as I thought of the daily torture of her warm true heart! She must have drawn very near to the ever-present Friend, for she came forth from that trial "like gold seven times purified."

REMARKABLE CONVERSIONS.

In the year 1832 a most extensive and powerful revival of religion pervaded the country in the vicinity of Columbus, Mississippi; in the various meetings there were about four hundred conversions; all the denominations shared in the revival, and labored together in great harmony. Many remarkable instances of conversion took place, among which the following were prominent:—

Capt. N. and Capt. R. were residing in Lowndes county, Miss. They had spent several years in the United States army, had seen much active service, and were both distinguished for their bravery; the latter was brevetted for his bravery at the sanguinary battle of Lundy's Lane, in the war of 1812, and the former was a remarkably bold and efficient officer. They were devoted friends, and after their retirement from the army they married and purchased land near each other, and engaged in the peaceful pursuit of agriculture. They were both men of the world, and as far from spiritual religion as most men, and they were especially prejudiced against the Methodists. Capt. R. had been raised in the Episcopal Church, and regarded the Methodists as enthusiasts or ignorant lunatics. Capt. N.'s relations were Catholics, but he had very little affinity for any kind of religion; he had a noble and generous nature, but had fallen into many of the wicked habits of the army, and was strongly prejudiced against all who manifested zeal for the cause of Christ. Being very bold and fearless in the expression of his sentiments, he was rather dreaded by the Christians as a persecutor, yet his honorable deportment and integrity of character in other respects, secured him the warm personal friendship of his neighbors. A protracted meeting was held at a small log meeting house in their neighborhood during the summer. Rev. Isaac Spook, of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, was the principal instrument in the pulpit, although the church was Methodist. On Saturday Capt. N. attended the meeting; there was considerable excitement, and he returned home quite disgusted, and almost enraged; when his wife expressed a desire to attend the meeting on Sabbath, he remarked to her that he thought it was not a suitable place for any decent woman, and refused to accompany her. She however went to the meeting and there was a powerful impression made upon the congregation. Capt. R. was present, and was struck under pungent conviction; he arose from his seat and came to the altar, calling upon all to pray for him, and agitated from head to foot. When Mrs. N. returned home she discovered that the Captain had been reading his Bible, and when she informed him that his friend Capt. R. had been to the altar, he exclaimed "if Ned has gone to the altar there is a reality in it;" and there being night meetings he went out, and during the exercises he requested one of his religious neighbors to go with him to the grove, and pray for him also. From that time he was a changed man. I went home with him to spend the night, and found him quite subdued; he requested me to join prayers with his family in the morning, with the pledge that he would keep it up himself thereafter. He called all his negroes into the parlor and made an address to them, and told them it was his intention to keep up family prayer, and that he would require them to treat the subject with respect, and urged them also to be religious; after breakfast he went to the church, and when the preaching was over he went forward publicly to the mourners' bench, and there meekly bowed himself, and remained on his knees until he received the evidence of pardon, which was but a short time; he then rose from his knees, his whole countenance lighted up with the joy of salvation, and commenced shaking hands with his religious neighbors, who were overjoyed at his conversion; he passed from one to another till he came to Judge S., with whom he had had a serious misunderstanding and had been at dagger's point; he looked at the judge, who was himself a penitent, and remarked, "S—, I have been your enemy, but it is all gone now, give me your hand." They shook hands, and became devoted friends ever after. Capt. R. professed religion at the same meeting, and the three joined the same church and became from that time zealous and active members, serving the Church as class-leaders and stewards. Capt. R. died about fifteen years afterwards, in Columbus; having lived an eminent example of Christian zeal and devotedness, and demonstrating in death the power of Christianity to sustain and comfort in the trying hour. Judge S. died also "the death of the righteous," and Capt. N. still lives a Christian man, a man of prayer and looking forward to the time when he will meet his friends where parting shall be no more. The change in these instances was entirely unlooked for by the parties, and astonished the whole community. It was a marked demonstration of the power of God, for its thoroughness and permanence. It accomplished a complete transformation of character, which was perpetuated through their lives, and should be chronicled as a monument of the power and goodness of God.

A remarkable case of conversion took place on the Prairie Hill circuit, in the year 1847, which is a striking instance of the direct agency and power of the Holy Spirit in the awakening and conversion of sinners. A camp meeting was held at Prairie Hill, in Lowndes Co., Miss., in the month of August. It commenced on Monday evening, and closed the ensuing Monday morning, and was much blessed; upwards of forty persons were converted. A certain individual resided near the meeting ground who was quite wicked; he was the head of a family, about forty years of age, and had never manifested any interest in the subject of religion; he was very profane, and a regular drinker of ardent spirits—though not a drunkard. His associations were almost entirely wicked, and he was one of the most unlikely subjects for conversion in the neighborhood. So much so, that a young man remarked to some of his friends who were urging the subject of religion, when A. T. gets converted I shall think there is some chance for me. This man did not come to the meeting until Friday morning. He arrived about the close of the eight o'clock service, and walked immediately up to the altar. When I first discovered him he was standing upright, near the stand; he told me he wished to go to the mourners bench, and I accompanied him to a seat in the altar. He then said, "I came to this place to get religion, and I never intend to leave until I get it." He remained in the altar all day, earnestly engaged in prayer and religious conversation; about ten o'clock at night he embraced Christ by faith as his atoning sacrifice, and was unspeakably blessed.—He literally leaped for joy, and seemed filled with astonishment that God could convert such a sinner as he was in one day. He afterwards informed me that he was convicted at home, and there resolved to go to the camp meeting and embrace religion. This God convicted him without any direct agency of the Holy Spirit, or human instrumentality; producing such a powerful conviction of sin, and such a clear perception of the importance and necessity of salvation as led him to a determination to secure it at all hazards.

The change wrought in him was thorough, he was truly a new creature. He never had a relish for ardent spirits after his conversion, and he became eminently a man of faith and prayer; religion was his theme; he made a useful class leader, and has been a pattern of piety ever since.

In the year 1839, I traveled the Macon Circuit, which then included Prairie Hill, at which place we had a gracious revival, and about fifty conversions in all. One day during the progress of the meeting, two men who had not attended the meeting before, came to the church. They were both quite wicked, and on their way had been ridiculing the Christians and scoffing at religion. During the preaching they were both powerfully convicted, and came to the altar when the penitents were invited forward. After an earnest struggle in prayer, they were both converted, and went home rejoicing. Nothing was farther from their thoughts than the idea of embracing religion at that time, when they came to the house of God; but the power of God arrested them, and they were completely changed from scoffers in religion to men of prayer and faith.

MODERN MAGIC.

Not the magic of Herr Wiljalba Frikell or the Wizard of the North; nothing to do with Invisible Ladies or Robert-Houdin's mighty mysteries; but magic of the true black and white sort—witchcraft, demonology, possession, and the like, revived in the modest phrase of Spiritualism. This is the great drawing-room excitement of the day; the phase of spiritual development, which has already turned more than one unstable head, and which threatens to turn a few more before it dies quietly out in its present form, and leaves only the due residuum of scientific truth.

Spiritualism is nothing new: it is as old as the Egyptian caves and temples and initiatory trials; as old as the time when a certain Hebrew contended with Jannes and Jambres before Pharaoh that he should let the children of Israel go; as old as Saul and the Witch of Endor (the Jews, indeed, were always fond of dabbling in the art, and in Leviticus are expressly forbidden that indulgence); as old as the Delphic Oracles, and the Eleusinian Mysteries; as old as the exact sciences, as old as nervous diseases, as superstition and ignorance, and the habit of jumping to conclusions before the foundations are laid, which we find everywhere, in proportion to the want of scientific knowledge existing in a community. What is called spiritualism is not all false in its results, however false in its theory; but what there is of truth in it has been so overlaid with trick and deception that it is a hard task to distinguish one from the other, or to draw up a distinct account to which one would sign one's name. No one denies that there is an abnormal condition of the brain and nervous system, which enables people to say and do things quite foreign to their natural power. We see it constantly in persons afflicted with hysteria, epilepsy, catalepsy, and other congenital diseases; and it does not seem impossible that the state may be artificially induced, and that the brain may be acted on other than through the senses. So far, then, certain of the phenomena of spiritualism may be true; but no farther, as evidencing, some of the subtle harmonies between man and universal nature, not yet catalogued and labelled.

It is almost as presumptuous to say what is absolutely impossible (relatively, we have few stumbling places) as it is rash to believe without examination. I should not like to say that this Brompton house in which I write could not be moved by a Superior Power, and transported bodily to Bethnal-green; but I should be very positive in asserting that it would not be so dealt with. And certainly if a medium, charged with my conversion, took me in the night from my library, and carried me in a cab to another library, furnished in exactly the same manner, then bade me believe that he and his spirits had transported my house, and that this was my own library, and none other, I think I should believe, instead, that he had brought me about and about back to my own natural house, or that he had furnished another room according to the pattern of mine—I think I should believe in any talk possible to human ingenuity rather than in the assertion of even the most respectable medium that my house at Brompton had been borne by spirits through the air and placed in Bethnal-green. I know that the usual spirit manifestations are less impossible than this; that table tapping and tipping; spirit hands made visible to the eye and palpable to the touch; spirit communications (for the most part sad rubbish) lying on tombstones, or pinned to curtains; that mediums writing on drawing-room ceilings in the dark; that spirits, tying knots under the table, and turning down the leaves of the Bible, also under the table; that guitars played by invisible hands, and accordions held straight out, as never accordeons were held before; I know that all these things are less absolutely impossible, because more susceptible of trick, than taking a brick house off its foundations, and carrying it, like Solomon's carpet, between the clouds and the water. But I have seen nothing yet which cannot be referred to the abnormal, not supernatural, power of high nervous excitement, and to clever conjuring. Of the last I have seen infinitely more than of the first, it being easier to learn a trick than to elaborate brain-power.

We must remember, too, as I said before, that nothing of all this is new; the same facts and circumstances having been produced in an endless round for ages and ages past, without ever getting any nearer to usefulness or universality. Take the first and cleverest spiritualists of the middle ages, Dr. John Dee and his assistant, Edward Kelly; why, not Mr. Home, the present high-priest of the mysteries, himself surpasses them in what they said they saw and heard, or in the engaging familiarity of their spirits. They had a practical object, too, in their mediumship, of which we can see the use and direction; but spiritual communications in general have no more rationality, sequence, or practical good in them, than the muttered utterance of a dreamer. Edward Kelly and Dr. John Dee were wiser in their generation, and took care to assume a distinct and positive purpose in their mediumship. Kelly was very "developed." He used to look into the crystal, which the doctor said had been brought to him by spirits, and see more than even any of the Baron Dupotet's extatiques have ventured to declare. As for spirits in the body—spirits visible, audible, palpable—they came as thick as morning callers; and not a bit more terrifying. But the odd thing about them was, they were all spirits of the period; spirits speaking the language then in use, knowing no more than the world knew then, and not advancing a hair's breadth beyond that was considered orthodox and final by living men. There is the same peculiarity in the modern spirit. One day a pretty little maiden of from four to seven appeared to the two astrologers. Her hair was rolled up in front, but hung down long behind; her gown was of "changeable sey," red and green, and her name was Madimi. Madimi said she was one of six sisters; but would not give much information about herself. "She would be beaten," said the little spirit maiden frankly: not very pleasant contigency for youthful spirits in the better world! When she disappeared from the table "beside the silk cloth where the show-stone stood," there came a man dressed in red, like one of the cruel men in the Babes of the Wood. He had red close hose, red buttoned-up cap, red jacket, red shoes; and, like the little maiden Madimi, he spoke in an audible voice, and with a certain amount of method and sequence. After the man, came a woman in a red kirtle and a white garment above, with a green coronet about her head under the mantle; on her breast was a precious white stone and on her back another; she was called Ath, was sharp of tongue, and somewhat shrewish of temper, but a good spirit enough, like a well-conditioned earthly scold; also a character of the period; another and a well-defined instance of the mere local and human transcript of all these appearances. We should not have such a spirit now; neither would our little Madimi say that she would be beaten. Earthly times and manners have changed; consequently the spiritual and the heavenly times and manners have changed with them. All these spirits foretold and prophesied of the next prominent person in this solemn farce; the Lord Albert Lasky, a Polish nobleman, who was to be made into something more than a nobleman, if Dr. Dee and his spiritual plotters had had full swing. When Lasky comes he has a globe of white smoke on his head, and is great as a medium, but foolish as a plotter. The spirits are not always well-behaved. Once a "great black nasty hound" came when he had no business; rebuked as a "hell-hound," he obediently retired; and once a false likeness of our Madimi put on a very naughty appearance, and talked such wicked things,—that we do not translate them in the vulgar tongue, but keep them wrapped up in Latin, for the perversion of the learned only. Wicked little Madimi! she argued like a philosopher; but her philosophy was of the laxest. Sometimes the spirits held up their hands, with letters and words springing from their fingers; sometimes they showed hands alone, as at present by Mr. Home and others.

"Cui est habet,

said one hand—the letters written all along the back.—Once, a piece of white paper was put on to the mesa-table; when mass was said, the paper was found written over by spirit hands. As soon as copied, the writing vanished. For six months, there were no apparitions, and the show-stone was dull and clouded. The young son Arthur was put to see and hear: but he only saw, and that but imperfectly; he could hear nothing; and then his power came back to Kelly, and he saw, and heard, and translated as before. Once the stone was taken away, and brought back again by invisible hands "in the sight of all," such as bells and bracelets, rings and chaplets are taken now: and we all know of John Beaumont's spirit, who brought a little bell which they rang in his ear. Spirits have always been fond of bells; they are light, and easily managed, and produce grand effects with little expenditure of force.

All this early time, Dee and his companions were made much of by the Emperor of Russia (not France), and talked often with the spirits on Russian (not French) affairs. They got plenty of money, and little Madimi prepared the way for Lasky to be King of Moldavia; which was the meaning of the whole matter. When that scheme was knocked on the head, Prince Rosinberg came on the scene, and he entertained the spirits and their mediums handsomely; but nothing peculiar resulting, poor Dr. Dee was ultimately left to poverty and distress, with only the planet angel, Raphel for his comforter. Kelly died, having broken his leg in escaping out of prison, and Dee lingered on in a wretched state, mixing himself up in plots both domestic and political, between-whiles talking to Raphael, who came to him in the show-stone, but whose coming brought neither meal nor money to the miserable conjuror.

What order and state of mind was in Edward Kelly may be gathered from the following extract made from Dee's memoranda:

"Edward Kelly yesterday had a show of a little thing as big as a pease, of life as it were, in the stone, going about by the brinks. And because it was not in shape humane, he of purpose would not declare it to me, and so I have noted (as appeareth) of no show. This he told me up Tuesday night (that was yesternight), upon occasion of a great stir and moving in his brains very sensible and distinct, as of a creature of humane shape and lineaments going up and down, to and fro in his brains, and within his skull, sometimes seeming to sit down, sometimes to put his head out of his ear."

We need not wonder at anything reported to be seen or heard by a gentleman who went about with something of humane shape in his skull, given to putting his head out of his ear! The New Book which was to be written by the spirits for Dr. Dee, and which book was to supersede the Bible, the partitioning of states on spiritual principles, the suspension or contravention of the laws of nature by spiritual powers—all become quite easy to us when we know that the medium was afflicted with the sensation of something alive moving about in his head, and when we remember that state plots and intrigues offered the sole active career then open to an enterprising man.

Dee and Kelly strangely prefigured the doings of the present phase. They had a magic crystal wherein they saw all their spirits; the Baron Dupotet has a magic mirror (I think it is Cahagnet who gives the receipt for its proper making), Raphael, the weather-prophet, also had his, and sensitives say they can see in it spirits and appearances by the score. Dee and Kelly had spiritual friends and companions perpetually with them; so have Mademoiselle Adele, Mademoiselle Blanche, Mrs. Hayden, Miss Marshall, Mr. Home, and many others; even down to a poor lady with a spiritual husband, who wrote a book the other day announcing her approaching maternity as the result of her union. Dee and Kelly were to be the propagators of a new faith, the writers of a new book or Bible; what says the Seer of Poughkeepsie, what says the authoress of Light in the Valley, what says all who have adopted spiritualism as a new revelation, and regarded it as the gateway of further dispensation? Dee and Kelly got "direct writing;" so do the Baron Guldenstubbe, and many others; and they got unconscious writing, like the author of that little volume of Spirit Rhymes, which we take leave to say are about the most wretched verse ever printed, like the effusions of all the self-deluding users of the planchette, and like all writing mediums generally. They saw hands, isolated and endued with motion and intelligence; so does Mr. Home, so does Mrs. Marshall, so does Mr. Squire, so do their respective "circles;" but of what substance it would be, perhaps, rash to say: certainly not of spiritual. Later in the way of time, Richard Jones caused Jane Brooks to be condemned and executed, because she had epileptic fits, rose up in the air, hung by his hands from the ceiling, was carried over the garden wall to the haystack, with many other things like those which people report of Mr. Home, as his ordinary manner of manifestation. Then there was the Demon of Tedworth sent by the angry drummer, who made every article of furniture in Mr. Mompesson's house dance about like mad, but who got wounded one day when knocking about under a pile of wood in the chimney. Some one fired a pistol into the pile, and blood was found afterwards on the hearth and down the stairs. But it seemed quite natural to the Mompessons that a demon should bleed; so that proof of humanity and earthly circumstances went for nothing. This demon was in the habit of lifting tables and chairs into the air, flinging blocks of wood, warming-pans, pitchers, and the like, into the children's beds; of thrusting the old lady's Bible into the ashes face downwards; and making the floor of the room, strewn with ashes for the purpose, with claws large and small, crosses, triangles, and mystical rubbish past comprehension. The same tricks were played at Woodstock, when the commissioners took possession, and a royalist spirit resolved to dislodge them. The same things are done now, when tables are made to rear up in the air, paw the ground like horses, and rub themselves against you like dogs; when sofas and chairs run of themselves about the room, and cushions and footstools are flung about by unseen hands. It is exactly the same thing now as formerly, the name alone changed to suit the intellectual tendencies of the age.

In the Annual Register for 1802 there is a curious Spectre Story, as it is called, useful in showing how long a time these things have lasted publicly in England, under the exact form of paid mediumship, as at present.—A Mr. D., a gentlemen of fortune, living in Baker street, was summoned by a foreigner before the Commissioners of Requests for a debt of one guinea, said to be owing to him for an evening's entertainment "in the spectrological art." The man had good letters of recommendation to the nobility, and among others was engaged by Mr. D., of Baker street, to "amuse a select party" with his spectres and apparitions. He had no sooner begun than Mr. D. came up to him, put a stop to the proceedings on the plea of their being disagreeable to the company, tendered him half a guinea for his trouble, and sent him off. The foreigner of distinction sued him for breach of contract, and Mr. D. was, of course, compelled to pay the sum agreed on. So that this evening's entertainment in the spectrological art resulted in the outlay of a guinea to cause several young ladies to go all into fits, and in a very sensible lecture from the Chairman of the Commissioners of Requests on the folly of encouraging these equivocal representations. I wonder what the chairman would say now if he saw the marvels of the fashionable world of spirits! I, the writer of this article, have seen something of these spirit doings, and I will state candidly what I have seen, and what I have thought. I do not affect infallibility; but I believe that I am unprejudiced, and I know that I love truth.

In a small street off one of the west-central squares live two women, one old, the other young, and both mediums. To them went I and a party of friends; some believing, others wholly sceptical, others, like myself, of no fixed opinion, but anxious to know the truth. When we entered, a clergyman was interrogating the spirits, and seemingly much edified by their answers.—After a time he took up the Bible from the floor, and turned the leaves till he came to some which the spirits had doubled, while under the table; but which he scarcely found applicable to his present questions. However, he helped the spirits and the medium handsomely out of the difficulty, by saying that they bore on the subject of his last week's lectures; but as it would be rather hard to find a series of texts that did not bear on any theological subject whatsoever, or that could not be twisted so as to seem to bear on it, I confess I did not think that experiment very satisfactory. The company arriving irregularly, the circle was perpetually disturbed; and as the spirits was trying to those who came in good faith, to have to submit to the total cessation every time the medium, and the spirits, and the candle streamed down stairs to answer the door. In their absence, the clergyman making some question very urgently, I tried the table; and with a slight and wholly imperceptible movement of my wrists, I tipped it quite easily and made it answer exactly in the same way as the medium had done. This I did twice; no one suspecting, no one seeing, not even the friend who was sitting next me, and who did not believe in spirits. And if I could so easily move the table, and on a first trial, what could not one who had studied its capabilities effect? That table was as easily manipulated as if it had been made of paper, and almost as light; and the slightest movement of the wrists sufficed to trip it. When the medium returned, and the circle closed again, we had a few more "experiences." A spirit announced itself. For whom? Single raps (negative) came; no, no, no, for one and the other; until three affirmative tippings pointed to my friend. Who was the spirit? father? mother? child? Yes: brother. The name? The alphabet was called for, and a name spelt. "Edward." Now, my friend never had a brother who died, and never one at all, living or dead, of the name of Edward. So much for even the common phenomenon of this medium's thought-reading.

The spirits now promised to do a great deal more. The medium, myself, and two others held an oblong piece of paper by the four corners. Immediately there was a scratching and a tapping on the underside of the paper, close to the medium's hand. It was not impossible for her to have produced those sounds, and I, intently watching her face and movements—having been rendered suspicious by my own easy performances with the table—can distinctly affirm that she did produce those sounds; she and no other. A tray was manipulated in the same way. It was placed upside down on the table, and the medium and ourselves laid our fingers upon it. This tray was of extreme flexibility; it was a lively tray, and somewhat eccentric in its movements. Suddenly, as if tired of being shaken and tapped on, it started up and rapped the knuckles of one of the party—I think of the clergyman, but I am not sure. And here again I distinctly saw the younger medium lift the tray by a sudden pressure of her thumbs, and I saw her rapidly strike the edge against the hand in question. Then the table reared itself up, and sustained itself in the air for some seconds; but again the medium's thumbs were underneath, and her knee was against the top. This I also most distinctly saw—for she is not very accomplished yet in sleight of hand, and a very little careful observation can detect the manner of her tricks.—I was then touched underneath the table. My ankle was suddenly grasped by something flexible and springy, but not muscular. Others were grasped too, all but my friend, whose feet were tucked away under the chair, and so were out of the line of the medium's foot. And all the while this was going on I felt the young lady's knee work up and down against mine, as each person cried out he was touched, and she pulled the strings of her puppets at her will. Then an old badly-tuned guitar was held by the clergyman, and played under the table. The clergyman sang the Old Hundredth in a low and tremulous voice, and while he sang a few simple chords were struck out, such as would have suited anything; but I deny that there was any attempt at known melody in the music, or that it was anything more than could have been produced by sweeping the hand or foot over the strings at certain intervals. But some of the believers were quite overpowered with this "manifestation," and one or two were deeply affected. To my ears, not perhaps capable of appreciating what to them seemed such heavenly harmony, it was a simple string sound, such as could have been easily effected by drawing the toes over the strings.

The light was now put out and the spirits rapped us all to another and more commodious part of the room, where they had promised to show the hands. A double circle was formed, and when we were fairly placed, which was not until we had gone through a great deal of trouble and annoyance—for the spirits were suspicious and full of fancies and caprices, and would not have any one too near, but drove one over-anxious gentleman clean away from the place where they were to show—after many such shiftings and turnings, the medium got settled, and the spirits seemed to be content. But they would not show the hands, though adjured to do so in the name of God, and also familiarly scolded and rated for their breach of faith. A small bell was then set running about the room—they said it was running through the air—and ringing as it went. We could not see it, but we heard it ringing in different paths, or places about the room, but always close at hand. Suddenly it seemed to fall over on its side, and then the spirits rapped out their dismissal, and the seance was at an end. One thing I have forgotten: two gentlemen were asked to agree between themselves on a certain moment by the clock, when the spirits would rap as soon as the minute hand reached the spot. They did so, and the raps did come at the very instant. This was the only clever thing in the performance, and, excepting this, the whole affair was a somewhat dull and most barefaced imposition. As I sat and looked at it all, I scarcely knew which filled me with most surprise, the unblushing impudence of the actors, or the marvellous credulity of the spectators. There was not one single thing performed that was not an open and palpable deception; yet here were sane, well-educated English men and women, grouped, full of faith and belief, round two illiterate conjurors, whose tricks would have been utterly contemptible but for the painful amount of human trust and reverence given to them. It was something inexpressibly sad to see how these two wretched women were able to play on the holiest and deepest feelings of their audience; how, for the paltry sum which they gained from each as the price of their deceptions, they mocked the most sacred truths, and cheated the most earnest faith. It was a degrading exhibition, and all the more so because men of cultivated understandings and women of ordinary perceptions gave into it without question or examination, and set aside the precious mental power of critical reason, in favor of blind, headlong, unreasoning credulity.

I know that I shall be met by believers with the argument that all the greatest scientific truths were, when first propounded, scouted and disbelieved: witness Galileo, Harvey, Jenner, and others. But although truth in all such cases has not prevailed at once, and although the beliefs in them have languished, yet, even when weakest, such beliefs have always been strong enough to leave broad marks behind them—broad enough for the wise to stand upon, whence to assert, and eventually to sustain, them beyond dispute. Truth never dies away without leaving some mark. "Spiritualism," on the contrary, has burnt its feeble light from the earliest times of the Old Testament; it has flickered, then gone out from sheer exhaustion. It has been forgotten, then "discovered" again, then it has flourished amongst a certain class of weak people, and has made a noise—for your hysterical subjects are always very demonstrative. Then belief has been exhausted, and the sickly flame has been extinguished, to peep out again at some future time, and, in the same way, to die out. This seems to be the difference between the reception and destiny of truth, and imposture.

One of the most provoking peculiarities of the spiritualists is the definite manner in which they speak of indefinite things and indefinite sensations. A publication called the Spiritual Magazine is especially full of this sort of unblushing assertion. Things, which in the seances some people say they see, and others only think they see, and others don't see at all, are set down as positive, actual, undeniable facts; as undeniable as this paper on which I write. If, at the distant end of a large room, and in the dark, a medium says he is floated up to the ceiling, it is stoutly asserted that he is so floated up, and that the people present are witnesses of the fact. Not so; the people present are only witnesses of the fact that the medium asserts this, and that he marks the ceiling; they are not witnesses how he got up so high to make his mark. With ottomans, chairs, and darkness, he may have been able to climb, unperceived, so near, as to mark the ceiling otherwise than by being taken up to it by spiritual hands.

Again, is an audience necessarily a collection of converts? If I go merely to see these things, have the exhibitors a right to parade me as a voucher for their truth? A certain nobleman, who took especial pains to guard against such an assumption, is ranked as a convert; and the unbelieving son of the conductor of this journal figures (when he is well on his way to China) in two numbers of the Spiritual Magazine as a believer, for no worse indiscretion than the dangerous one of having gone to see what some experimente were like. Seeing that it is almost impossible to make examinations during the experiments; that if you are troublesome or avowedly sceptical, the spirits will rap you out of the circle, and, not content with that, rap you out of the room—it is not very easy to detect the manner of the trick: it is less easy, indeed, than with the ordinary conjuror, who stands confessed to all the world before him as simply an ingenious mechanist, with marvellous quickness of hand, and whom every one is trying to find out. No critical tests are allowed; no scientific investigation. Indeed, it would be utterly impossible, at the table of a friend, or even in the house of a person of condition, to take satisfactory measures for the detection and exposure of any such imposture as might be seen or suspected. If you go, you must go prepared to be convinced; and, if you desire to remain to the end, you must be careful not to express doubt or dissatisfaction of anything that you may see. The spirits have a very summary way of getting rid of any one they have reason to fear may prove too inquisitive; and, when the mediums express their grief at the arrangement which expels you, and ask you, piteously, "what can they do? and, how can they help it?" you have no resource but to accept your fate. Thus they enforce the acquiescence of silence while you remain, and then write you down a convert the moment you retire.—All the Year Round.

DR. LIVINGSTONE'S EXPLORATIONS.

At a recent meeting of the geographical section of the British Association, an interesting paper was read from Dr. Livingstone, giving an account of his discoveries in Africa, from which the following is extracted:

"In the upper part of the Lower Shire, in the Highlands and in the valleys of the Lower Shire, there is a somewhat numerous population. The people generally live in villages and in hamlets near them. Each village has its own chief, and the chiefs in a given territory have a head chief, to whom they owe some sort of allegiance. The paramount chief of one portion of the Upper Shire is a woman. The sites of their villages are selected, for the most part, with judgment and good taste. A stream or spring is near, and pleasant shade-trees grow in and around the place. Nearly every village is surrounded by a thick high hedge of the poisonous euphorbia.—During the greater part of the year the inhabitants could see an enemy through the hedge, while he would find it a difficult matter to see them. By shooting their already poisoned arrows through the tender branches, they get smeared with the poisonous milky juice, and inflict most painful if not fatal wounds. The constant dripping of the juice of the bruised branches prevents the enemy from attempting to force his way through the hedge, as it destroys the eyesight. The huts are larger, stronger built, with higher and more graceful roofs than any we have seen on the Zambesi. Many of the men are very intelligent-looking, with high foreheads and well-shaped heads. They show singular taste in the astonishingly varied style in which their hair is arranged. Their head-necklaces are really pretty specimens of work.—Many have the upper and the middle as well as the lower part of the ear bored, and have from three to five rings in each ear. The hole in the lobe of the ear is large enough to admit one's finger, and some wear a piece of bamboo about an inch long in it. Brass and iron bracelets, elaborately figured, are seen; and some of the men sport from two to eight brass rings on each finger, and even the thumbs are not spared. They wear copper, brass, and iron rings on their legs and arms; many have their front teeth notched, and some file them till they resemble the teeth of a saw. The upper-lip ring of the women gives them a revolting appearance; it is universally worn in the highlands. A puncture is made high up in the lip, and is gradually enlarged until the pelele can

PAY TO THE END OF THE YEAR.

We have made out, and sent out, all our accounts, to the end of the present year. Many have responded and paid up, but many have failed to do so. The object we have in writing these lines is, to call upon all who have not paid up to the end of the year, to do so immediately, by remittance to the office, or by payment to our agents. The year is more than half gone, and yet we have much to collect of our accounts, and to clear off books, between this and January next. This work we must accomplish. Come friends, you have received your accounts through the paper or through the preacher; the amount is not large in each case; pay up to the end of the year and let us all begin even again.

GOD'S THOUGHTS TOWARD US.

It is related of a man, that being unable to sleep, from nervousness of body, and anxiety of mind, he was advised, upon retiring for the night, to dismiss all worldly cares, and fix his mind upon something at once vast and simple. Though not then pious, he selected the thought of God as grandest and simplest of all. Thus meditating, he not only went to sweet sleep in God, but, generally, he found his meditation of Him to be sweet, and ultimately found peace of soul, as well as repose of body.

This seems to have been the process by which David was led to the conception and utterance of this happy and beautiful thought: "How precious are thy thoughts unto me, O God!" In his contemplation of the majesty and mercy of God, all bad and unhappy thoughts passed away, like unhealthy vapors before the rising sun, and the thought of God became the parent, in his mind, of all good and blessed thoughts.

What a glorious gift is the gift of thought! And to what a world of good is it the key, when sincerely and wisely used! Thought is the most excellent product of the most excellent power. It is the best fruit of the best branch of our nature. Intellectuality is the crown of our nature, and thought is the richest jewel in that crown.

It is the seed of all good things. All traits of character, and all facts of life, exist first as thoughts. All good convictions are simply good thoughts which have become quickened, and have germinated. All good sentiments and purposes, are good convictions which have grown into leaf and bloom. All good principles, and good traits of character, are good sentiments and purposes which have lived through the frosts and heats of early discouragement and temptation, and attained a substantial life. All good life is the fruitage of good principles and character. And all good affections are simply the sweet, healthful, life-blood of good character and life.

Thought is the life and soul of all history and all civilization—all institutions and all government—all literature and all art. In all books, whatever may be the secondary and subordinate value of style—the test of merit is the amount and value of the thought that is in them. All art—sculpture, painting, music, poetry, architecture, oratory—is simply thought in beautiful forms. Indeed, all that man has done upon the earth, is simply the body which he has given his thoughts.

But we are speaking of higher thoughts—thoughts of God. He is the giver of the power of thought. His mind is the parent of all minds, and he is the Parent Thinker of the Universe. Though our eyes have never looked into his countenance, nor our ears heard his voice, yet, through his works, and word, and providence, we know his thoughts. They are the body of his thoughts, at least of all that we know. And all his thoughts that we know, are "thoughts unto us"—his thoughts unto us-ward—for our instruction and our comfort. What his thoughts are for the benefit of other races and orders of being, we know not, but his thoughts embodied in the creation that we do know, in the providence that governs our realm, and the word that we read, are thoughts of God to us.

The world is a thought of God, for us. It was made for our home—all its laws and adaptations—its varieties and capacities—its beauties and blessings—are thoughts of God, for us. The adaptations of soil and seed—of moisture and sunshine—of day and night—of spring and summer, and autumn and winter—are thoughts of God, for us. And, so, likewise, of the benefit and comfort of water and food—of the fragrance and beauty of flowers, and the music of the songs of birds—of the beautiful blue sky, and the singing stars, and the beauteous moon, and the glorious sun. And so of the blessed relations and sympathies of friend, and father and mother, and brother and sister, and husband and wife, and son and daughter. All these, and the innumerable others, are precious thoughts of God to us. Indeed, the universe was made for us—for our sphere—for our inspiration. Every truth of philosophy—every law of science—every ray of wisdom—every vision of beauty—every principle and sentiment of virtue—every hope of excellence and happiness—is a thought of God to us.

General Providence is a thought of God, and all special providences are special thoughts of God to us. The providence that is the law of history—that governs the philosophies of the civilizations—that guides the instincts of the animalcule—that brings good out of evil, and salvation out of suffering—that makes all things work together for good to them that love God—that numbers the hairs of our heads—that watches the sleeping dust of our dead, till he shall bid it rise—and that provides for the final and full recompense of all the wrongs of this world—providence is a precious thought of God—made of millions of precious thoughts to us.

The Bible is God's thought for us—his thoughts in words, in our own vernacular. It is God's thoughts in speech—God talking to us, and telling us his mind concerning us. It is God's literature, and poetry, and oratory. Every Bible fact and doctrine, and precept and promise, is God's thought for us. The lamp to our feet, the light to our path, to guide and comfort us on the way to heaven.

Redemption is his greatest and most precious thought toward us. Could we ask that he should think more of us than to "give his only begotten son to die for us?"

How precious it is to know that God thinks of us at all! We can never be forgotten, dead or alive, while God's memory lasts. How precious to remember that he always thinks of us correctly and justly! In this world we misunderstand, misrepresent, wrong, hurt, and make each other unhappy. In God's thoughts it is all understood, and will ultimately be explained and corrected. God thinks of us when no body else does. In obscurity the lowest, we have place in the thoughts of the highest. He thinks of us even when do not think of him. The sunshine of his merciful memory of us penetrates, over, the midnight of our unbelief, when without God and without hope. He thinks of us when we do not think of ourselves. When we are lost to a sense of duty to God, and of the worth of our awe souls, he often thinks kindly of us—of approvingly of our sins, but mercifully of our souls. He often thinks better of us than we think of ourselves. When we are despairing of mercy, and giving up hope, he is crying, "come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." He will in no wise cast out, but save, unto the uttermost, all that come unto him.

THE GOOD CAUSE IN ITALY.

Garibaldi still marches on, "conquering, and to conquer." He is now partly in possession of Messina, and it is said that a convention between him and the Neapolitans stipulates that they are to evacuate Sicily altogether. His army, exclusive of the troops stationary in the Sicilian districts, is over 20,000 men. Volunteers, by the thousand, are coming to his aid every day. Neapolitan regiments and war vessels are deserting and going over to him. Both at Naples and at Rome he is anxiously looked for, and his approach will be the signal of revolution. Some of his troops are already on the main land. The time approaches which will develop the intentions of Napoleon and the other powers toward him. If they let him alone, Naples and Rome are both doomed. God grant that human selfishness may not be allowed to prevent the uprooting of these ulcers upon the body of Christendom.

As one specimen of the evils of these despotisms, the Florence correspondent of the Picayune says, that no one but the high police knew until new that there existed in Naples living tombs, excavated for the purpose of burying honest men, without fear of betrayal. No one knew that in the dungeons of St. Francesco there has lived for four years a man created in the image of God, known best as "l'Americano" (the American), but whose name is Francesco Casanova; deprived of his parents, he knows not to what country he belongs, and is about thirty years of age. He was arrested in 1854 at Viterbo, imprisoned at Rome for three months in a most filthy hole and subjected to barbarous torture.—From this dungeon he was conducted to another slightly better. Antonelli's love of torment becoming satiated, the man was made a present to the Neapolitan police, and was forwarded to their fatherly care; but a serious illness detained him at Lequl, in the Legations, for three months. Placed in custody for six months in the Vicaria, he was finally removed to a horrible cell in the St. Francesco, and during four long years poor Casanova has lived on bread and water, sleeping on fetid straw and deprived of the sun's heat and light. A few days ago the cell doors opened, and the spectre issued from his sepulchre. He is cared for by a humane Neapolitan, and has already been visited by the French, English and Sardinian Ambassadors. A certain Signor Verna, arrested last June by Commissary Campagna, was also put to the torture by that bravo functionary, for the purpose of confessing to what he never knew.—The torture consisted in suspending the poor man by the hands attached to ropes; underneath him a small fire was kindled, into which was thrown all manner of pestilential drugs easy of ignition.

POPERY AND THE ARTS.

A sensible writer in the World has been wandering through the art-galleries of Rome, and criticising, after a somewhat novel style, the attention of the Church to art. He denies that artists owe as much to the papacy as is usually supposed. He says that it has often been contended that we owe to the care of the Church the preservation of many master-pieces. This he admits is undoubtedly true in one sense, and to a certain extent. During many years of fierce civil war and unsparing devastation of all that is beautiful in nature, and that art holds sacred, the churches alone were unmolested. But did the clergy and the monks appreciate the treasures committed to their keeping? Did they cherish and carefully protect from injury those paintings which are today the admiration of mankind? The Last Supper of Leonardo da Vinci was suffered to molder into almost "indistinct decay;" and as if the moisture of the walls and the smoke from the adjoining kitchen were not enough to insure its speedy destruction, the monks made a door through the wall on which this fresco was painted, not only cutting away the feet of Christ and those of some of the apostles, but so jarring the masonry in the operation as to shake off, in many places, the surface of the picture. He says of "the Communion of St. Jerome," the undoubted masterpiece of Domenichino, commonly considered the second picture in the world, and inferior only to "The Transfiguration," that it narrowly escaped a worse fate. The monks for whom it was painted had a silly quarrel with the artist, and commissioned Poussin to prepare an altar-piece for their church. They sent him the St. Jerome to be painted over. But he was not sufficiently priest-ridden to have lost his manhood. He threw up his engagement, and made known to the world the existence of the picture, declaring that he knew only two painters—Raphael and Domenichino. To Poussin, therefore, and not to those meddling monks, are we indebted for the preservation of this masterpiece of the Bolognese school.

These examples will suffice to illustrate the manner in which the fine arts have been cherished and protected by the priesthood.

The paintings ascribed to St. Luke, miserable daubs, and similar legendary works, have been the chief care of the priests.

NAPOLEON'S LETTER.

Napoleon's letter to the French Embassador to London, dated the 25th of July, is published. He says:

"Since the peace of Villa Franca I have had but one thought, one object—to inaugurate a new era of peace and to live on the best terms with my neighbors, and especially with England. I have annexed Savoy and Nice. The extraordinary additions to Piedmont alone caused me to assume the desire to see reunited to France provinces essentially French. But it will be objected—'You wish for peace and you increase immoderately the military forces of France.' I deny the fact in every sense that my army and fleet had in them anything of a threatening character. My steam navy is even far from being equal to our requirements, and the number of steamers does not equal that of sailing ships thought necessary in the time of Louis Philippe. I have 400,000 men under arms, but deduct from this amount 60,000 in Algeria, 5000 at Rome, 8000 in China, 20,000 gendarmes, the sick and the new conscripts, and you will see my regiments are of smaller effective strength than during the preceding reign. The only addition to the army list has been by the creation of the Imperial Guards; moreover, while wishing peace I desire also to organize the forces of the country on the best possible footing, for if foreigners have only seen the bright side of the last war, I, close at hand, have witnessed the defects and wish to remedy them; having said thus much, I have, since the battle of Villa Franca, neither done, nor even thought, anything which could alarm any one. When Laveletto started for Constantinople the instructions which I gave him were confined to the use of every effort to maintain the statu quo. The interests of France is that Turkey should live as long as possible. Napoleon then touches on Syrian affairs, saying his first thought in the matter was to come to an understanding with England, and ask what other interest than that of humanity could induce me to send troops to that country? He also says that the interior organization of France, and the increase of her resources are fields vast enough for his ambition, and sufficient to satisfy it; it was difficult for me to come to an understanding with England on the subject of Central Italy, because I was bound by the peace of Villa Franca. As to Southern Italy I am free from engagements, and ask nothing better than concert with England. On this point, as on others, in heaven's name, let the eminent men at the head of the English Government lay aside petty jealousies and unjust mistrusts; let us understand one another in good faith, like honest men as we are, and not like thieves, who desire to cheat each other.

"To sum up, this is my innermost thought. I desire that Italy should obtain peace, no matter how; but without foreign intervention, and that my troops should be able to quit Rome without compromising the security of the Pope. I much wish not to be obliged to undertake this Syrian expedition, and in any case not to undertake it alone; first, because it will be a great expense; secondly, because I fear this intervention may involve the Eastern question. But on the other hand, I do not see how to resist public opinion in my country, who will never understand how we can leave unpunished, not only the massacre of Christians, but the burning of our Consulates, the insult to our flag, and pillaged monasteries, which were under our protection."

The London Times, while evidently distrusting the Emperor, is glad of any occasion which has elicited a profusion of such friendly sentiments, and trust they foreshadow a policy under which we may enjoy peace, without being compelled longer to support all the burdens of war.

EUROPEAN CORRESPONDENCE.

London, August 4, 1860.

Mr. Editor: Once more, after a lapse of fifteen years, I have the unexpected pleasure of paying a visit to this famous residence of a long and illustrious line of commons, lords, and kings, of warriors, sages, poets, and divines, many of whom have written their names and their deeds on the highest pinnacles of the temple of fame. My own heart beats quicker, and all my feelings are enlisted, when I draw near to this big heart of the Anglo-Saxon body—this mighty emporium of commerce and trade, this vast receptacle of all that is good and bad in the civilization of modern times.—Since I have been here, I have been told that the population of London and its suburban towns and villages is fast approaching to three millions! Only think of it! In one metropolis as many people as were in the "old thirteen," when they threw off the British yoke; and more than are contained in the two great States of Virginia and Kentucky combined. Enriched with gains, lawful and unlawful, from all parts of the world, the proud city sits like a queen upon the waters, and with a giant arm makes her influence felt among all the nations of the earth.

I have been here once before, and my reading has made me familiar with its principal points of interest. I have seen other cities which I would greatly prefer as a permanent place of abode, but still London is to me, with the exception of the holy city Jerusalem, the most interesting on the face of the globe. It cannot boast, it is true, of such splendid architecture as is found in some parts of the continent of Europe and of Asia, but where shall we find a city richer in historical associations, that have been thrown around it during an existence of two thousand years? Where shall we find more interesting literary and scientific associations, or a greater variety of natural and artificial curiosities, to engage the attention of an inquiring mind? Some foreign travelers visit London, and after rushing through its crowded thoroughfares, and taking hurried glances at its principal objects of interest, go off in haste, supposing that they have seen London, when it would have taken all the time that they spent there to get anything like correct notions of the British Museum alone.

All my attempts to get a full view of the city thus far have been in vain. The great drawbacks to enjoyment with persons accustomed to the bright and beautiful skies of our own "sunny South," are fog, rain and smoke: I have climbed to the highest elevation that the city affords without being able to see much. After the fatiguing ascent of the London Monument, the tower of the Crystal Palace, or the Golden Gallery of St. Paul's Cathedral, and paying for it, too (for you can see little here without paying for it), it is really mortifying to have the view obstructed in every direction by thick mists, or by dense clouds of smoke. And, then, the rain! One of Shakespeare's clowns sings of Merrie England, that "The rain it raineth every day."

Which, if it is not literally true, is as near it as anything not true can be.

Just before leaving New York city, I accompanied my wife to the highest point attainable in the steeple of Trinity Church, to get a bird's-eye view of the greatest of all the American cities; and now, after looking from the summit of St. Paul's, we know that the view of New York is far more beautiful than that of London, nor did it appear to us that the streets of London presented as crowded an appearance as those of New York.

It would be folly for me to attempt a description of London, and even if I could succeed in an effort of the kind, it would take up too much of your valuable space; but you may find room, perhaps, for a few sketches of the principal points of interest that would be likely to instruct or entertain your readers. Where there is so much to see and to hear, the mind is at first stunned and bewildered; we sigh for a release from the unceasing roar and din; but after a while, by the beneficent law of our Creator, that "use is second nature," we become accustomed to it, and it is possible to think, or to write one's thoughts, in a place like this. In some respects, indeed, a large metropolis is paradoxical, as it may appear the most favorable for retirement. I have never felt more entirely that I was alone than I have in a crowded city. In smaller communities you are compelled to become acquainted with others, and, to some extent, you must go into society; nor will your neighbors fail to find you out, or sometimes, from the kindest motives, to obtrude themselves upon your privacy. But here, where the people are rushing past in the race after what are called the "good things" of life, and where places of recreation are so abundant, the studious man may live, if he prefer it, almost entirely to himself. This was the opinion of Descartes, and in illustration of its truth I may remark, that three of the greatest efforts of the human mind were produced in London. I refer to the Essays of Lord Bacon, Sir Isaac Newton's "Optics," and Paradise Lost. Dr. Johnson affirmed that his mind was more active in London than elsewhere. The mention of his name calls to my recollection that, the other day, we stood by his grave in Westminster Abbey, and also by his monument in St. Paul's Cathedral. What an illustration of the power of genius do we see in these honors conferred upon one who, while living, often wandered through the streets of his loved London, poor and penniless—who has been known to pace the streets all night for the want of a shilling to pay for a bed, and who tells us, in his life by Boswell, that only on "clean shirt" day could he appear in society. The monument represents him in the costume of the ancient Greek philosophers, leaning against a marble pillar, with a Greek scroll in his hand, and absorbed in deep thought. A Latin inscription on the base commemorates his genius, learning and virtues. As an illustration of the absurdity of representing the English sage in the Grecian costume, and giving the inscription in a language that not one in ten thousand visitors can read, I may mention that his statue and one to the memory of John Howard, the English philanthropist, are often mistaken for the apostles Peter and Paul!

THE WESLEYAN METHODIST CONFERENCE.

This large and respectable body of Christian ministers has been in session at the City Road Chapel some nine or ten days. I have not room in this letter for even a small abstract of their proceedings. If you get the Watchman, their official organ, as I presume you do, you will see a very able and important document in the last number, in the shape of a charge delivered by the ex-President, Rev S. Waddy, to the ministers newly ordained. I have seldom listened to the reading of a paper which, for beauty of style, and impressiveness of delivery, pleased me better. It was listened to with profound attention by a crowded congregation, in the largest Methodist chapel in London. Of the innovations in Methodism therein proposed, I am not prepared to speak at present. One thing is very clear to me, that a change of some sort is necessary, as far as Methodism in this great city is concerned. It is a startling thought that, in the midst of the great revivals of the present time, the Methodists of London have so signally failed in their efforts to evangelize the masses, that during the last fifteen years they have had a numerical decrease of five thousand; and this, too, while the population is rapidly increasing all around them. The preachers are, however, as far as I have seen, in high spirits with regard to the future of British Methodism. My heart's desire and prayer to God for them is, that their fondest hopes may be fully realized.

THE QUESTION OF NEGRO SLAVERY.

I was aware, of course, before I came to England, of the strong anti-slavery feeling that prevailed here, as far as the African race are concerned; but I was not prepared for the ignorance of these enlightened British ministers with regard to America and its institutions. A very respectable Wesleyan minister innocently asked me if my wife, whom he had never seen, was a colored woman; and this after a long talk about the position of the South with regard to the slavery question! "We want to abolish slavery in America," said one, and on my intimating that this was a question that did not belong to them, he seemed not to be able to understand such a position. The following statements, which I copy from the Dial of yesterday, will shew the influence that was brought to bear by the English abolitionists upon the late General Conference of the Northern section of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Petitions and memorials in favor of excluding slaveholders from Church fellowship were presented as follows:

1.	From regular Methodists, 46 memorials, signed by 104 ministers and 1047 others, mostly official members, who thus represent about	30,000
2.	From other Methodists, 3 memorials, representing	46,920
3.	From miscellaneous christian bodies, 3 memorials, signed by 7 ministers and 665 others	672
4.	From twelve anti-slavery societies, estimated about	2,000
	Total	59,592

The Dial remarks that, "although the abolition party has not attained its object, yet it has reached a stage nearer the goal. Men favorable to the slaves are now editing the denominational literature, which is a most important fact. The next Conference takes place in 1864, when a stronger effort will be made to bring the influence of American Methodist Episcopalianism to bear against slavery."

With regard to the Dial itself, I know little, except that it is the result of an effort, by a joint stock company, to get up a daily paper in opposition to the Times. For the present the company is compelled to confine its issues to "once a week."

Some of these English Methodist laymen, who are anxious to abolish slavery in America, have seriously inquired how I, an Englishman, got along with the American language! But there are others, both among ministers and laymen, who acknowledge that they have evils enough at home to employ all their energies, and therefore are not called upon to meddle with the political institutions of other states.

MADISON COLLEGE.

In this paper, below, will be found an account of the Commencement of Madison College, and also its advertisement on third page. Since the death of the lamented Dr. Thornton, Prof. Pugh has been President, pro tem., and will be until a President is elected. The election of Prof. Hunnicutt to the Presidency of the Sharon Female College, has left a vacancy in the Chair of Ancient Languages and Literature. Mr. Adamson has also resigned the Principalship of the Preparatory Department. We are informed, however, that all these vacancies will be filled by the opening of the session. Madison College is doing much for the education of poor young men, especially those who are studying for the ministry. Five young preachers are now receiving tuition free, three of whom have charge of circuits, in whole or in part. Well done for Madison College, and success to it:—

Mr. Editor: Commencement week at College is one of great interest, and to me it is fraught with pleasant remembrances, and full of hopeful anticipations, in view of the fact that young men are then thrown upon the world, to wield an influence over their fellow-men. And thus it was with the late Commencement at Madison College, a brief notice of which I send you. On Monday, the 19th July, the Preparatory classes delivered their speeches; and they did well—some excellent.—Prizes were awarded to Henry O. Pugh and Horace Coleman from the smaller boys, and Frank Aldridge, John Pickett, James O'Leary and John Lamar among the larger.

On Wednesday the Sophomore and Junior classes delivered their speeches. Where all did so well, I mean no disparagement to any when I mention A. Tarply, L. C. Divine, Edward Easley, and Stephen Bryan, as displaying fine powers of declamation. There was one thing observable in all the speeches of the occasion—a coolness and deliberation, showing they were not strangers to the practice of speaking.

Wednesday was the Commencement day proper. A large audience assembled early to witness the exercises of the occasion, and we regret that the church, though large, was scarcely sufficient to give seats to the ladies. The following was the programme for the day: Greek Salutatory, by John A. Hunnicutt, (1st honor,) Coweta, Georgia; Latin Salutatory, by Humphrey C. Buck, (1st honor,) Choctaw county, Miss.; English Salutatory, by Silas K. Coleman, Madison county, Miss. Addresses of Alumni from the classes of 1857—William O. Baldwin, Madison county, Miss.; Henry Stam, Yazoo county, Miss.; John E. Flowers, Choctaw county, Miss. An Address before the Washington L. Society, by Addison Harvey, Esq., Canton, Miss.; Funeral Oration on the Life and Character of the late President, Rev. T. C. Thornton, D.D., by Rev. H. H. Montgomery; Oration by Robert A. Tribble, Sharon, Miss. Subject—Dignity and Creative Power of Mind; Oration, by Silas K. Coleman. Subject—Monuments of Antiquity; Oration by John A. Hunnicutt. Subject—American Diplomacy; Oration, by William H. Herrin (1st honor), Rankin co., Miss. Subject—Man destined for action; Oration, by George B. Hebron, (2d honor,) Warren county, Miss. Subject—Intelligence and Virtue the Safeguards of a Nation; Oration, by Humphrey C. Buck. Subject—Dignity and Importance of the Natural Sciences; Baccalaureate Address, by Prof. J. M. Pugh; Conferring Degrees; Greek Valedictory, by W. H. Herrin; English Valedictory, by George B. Hebron.

The speeches of Messrs. Stam and Flowers were well received. The address of A. Harvey, Esq., formerly a student of the College, was a masterly effort, and won the applause of all. The oration of Rev. H. H. Montgomery, on the life and character of Dr. Thornton, was listened to with deep interest by the many friends of the lamented President, and by the entire audience.

After a sumptuous dinner, prepared by the citizens of Sharon and vicinity, the graduating class delivered their speeches, and won for themselves merited applause. They were good, sound and chaste, showing that the young gentlemen had been taught to think. Their speeches were admired not only for the matter, but for their very graceful delivery.

The degree of Bachelor of Arts was conferred on the young gentlemen of the class—H. C. Buck, S. K. Coleman, Geo. B. Hebron, Wm. C. Herrin, John A. Hunnicutt, and Robert E. Tribble. The degree of Master of Arts in course, was conferred upon William O. Baldwin, James L. Brown, John E. Flowers, Henry Stam, W. B. Whitehead, and N. E. Whitehead. The honorary degree of Master of Arts was conferred on the Rev. Philip H. Napier, and that of Doctor of Laws on the Hon. Chas. Scott, of Memphis, Tenn.

The day was occupied in these exercises, and though much protracted, the audience remained attentive, showing the interest felt on the occasion. The college band, under the care of Prof. Hartwell, favored us with very excellent music.

Much more might be said in reference to the Commencement, and the prospects of Madison College; but I will not further trespass upon your columns.

LITERARY NOTICES.

A Philosophical and Practical Grammar of the English Language, by Prof. L. J. Morris, A. M. This edition, of 1860, is the twenty-first of this work. It is, in the language of the author, "dialogically and progressively arranged," and "every word is parsed according to its use." It is intended to simplify the grammar of the English language, and to enable students easily and certainly, and soon, to acquire a definite understanding of its essential principles and necessary laws. It proceeds upon the assumption that the grammars in common use are defective—complex, inaccurate, unprecise, and thus full of errors, contradictions and absurdities—unphilosophical and unprogressive. Rather hold, but not necessarily untenable positions. The best argument in favor of Morris' system is the success which has attended it wherever introduced. His address is Auburn, Ala.

Lovel the Widower, by W. M. Thackeray. (Published by Harper & Brothers.) This story appeared serially in Harper's Magazine, and is one of the most humane, genial, and charming Thackeray ever wrote.

Educational Repository and Family Monthly, for July, Atlanta, Ga., $2 per annum in advance, Rev. J. Knowles, Editor. A fine table of contents. The standard articles, original and selected, are excellent, and the family department is well "done."

The Three Clerks, and Castle Richmond, (Published by Messrs. Harper) are two works of fiction by that sensible, keen-sighted, cool-headed, and genial writer, Anthony Trollope, who has written the most satisfactory book, from an English stand-point, on the West Indies, that we have seen. The first of the works now under notice has been noticed in these columns before.

The Reason Why: Natural History. (Published by Dick & Fitzgerald.) The author of this work has done much toward popularizing knowledge, in various works, giving simple explanations of the leading facts in science and philosophy. He has done the same thing in regard to the facts and allusions of the Bible, in his "Biblical Reason Why." In this work he confines himself to Natural History. Thousands who have never enjoyed the benefit of the scholastic study of the natural sciences, may, in the study of such works as this, obtain such a general knowledge of them as will be sufficient for all practical purposes. The work is pleasingly illustrated.

The Queens of Society, by Grace and Philip Wharton. (Published by Harper & Brothers.) It is good for the health of the world to get a glimpse occasionally of the inner life of fashionable society; that is, if it have anything that can be called life; we are rather inclined to call it a lying death. Here we have fashionable life on the grandest scale—in the lives of the women who, though uncrowned, were the real "queens" in the most luxurious courts of modern times: Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough; Madame Roland; Lady Mary Wortley Montague; Georgiana, Duchess of Devonshire; Letitia Elizabeth Landon, (L. E. L.); Madame de Sevigne; Sydney Lady Morgan; Jane, Duchess of Gordon; Madame Recamier; Lady Hervey; Madame de Stael; Mrs Thrale-Piozzi; Lady Caroline Lamb; Anne Seymour Damer; La Marquise du Deffand; Mrs. Elizabeth Montagu; Mary, Countess of Pembroke; La Marquise de Maintenon.

Studies in Animal Life, by George Henry Lewes. (Published by Harper & Brothers.) This is another of those valuable books, which have become common in these times, in which the truths and facts of science and philosophy are treated, not in the technical language and text-book manner of the schools, but in the style and manner suited to general literature and common life.—Such works sustain about the same relation to science as the newspaper press does to literature. Both are peculiarly adapted to the condition and genius of the masses of the American people, and through their agency, auxiliary to that of the schools, the time is being hastened when the whole population of this country shall be practically educated. The style of this work is learned, elegant, and yet sufficiently simple; and the study of animal life in all its departments and ramifications, is pursued in a most loving and enthusiastic spirit.

Right at Last, and Other Tales, by Mrs. Gaskill.—(Published by Harper & Brothers.) These little stories first appeared in "Household Words" and "All the Year Round," under the Editorship of Charles Dickens—pretty good guarantee of their merit. Mrs. Gaskill is a somewhat voluminous writer of fiction and has an established reputation.

Natural History, for the use of Schools and Families, by Worthington Hooker, M. D. (Published by Harper & Brothers.) In this paper we notice a popular work on natural history, "The Reason Why, etc;" this is a text-book on the same subject, not too popular for school instruction, and not too scientific for general use. It is illustrated by nearly three hundred engravings. The author is a professor in Yale College, is devoted to his subject, and has already produced several works akin to this.

Nearly all the above works were sent us through Mr Thos. L. White, 105 Canal street.

Autobiography of Dan Young, a New England Preacher of the Olden Time, edited by W. P. Strickland. (Published by Carlton and Porter.) This book is a valuable contribution to the history of the Methodist Church in the United States. Though the author is still living, yet his reminiscences reach back to the days of Bishop Asbury and Jesse Lee, and is full of interesting information about the men and the history of early Methodism in New England. It describes an age and a country in which Methodism was as much persecuted by Puritanism, according to the power possessed, as ever Puritanism was persecuted by the hierarchies of the old world. The Methodists of the present day can hardly conceive the fact that Methodism had more difficulty in planting herself in the midst of the puritan bigotry of New England than she had amid the savage wildernesses of the West. Every inch of ground she gained in New England was won by conquest, both in public opinion and the State Legislatures—for Puritanism was then the established religion. Mr. Young did much in this cause, both as a powerful preacher and defender of Methodist doctrines, and as a member of the Legislature, after he located. The progress and incidents of this strife are here given in a highly entertaining and edifying manner. Having removed to Ohio, where he still lives, he has done much service to Methodism there also. Dr. Strickland has done a good service in presenting this work to the public.

It may be interesting to many to state that Dan Young is the father of our friend and brother, Dr. C. G. Young, of Louisiana, who is a worthy and useful local preacher, as well as a good citizen. He authorizes the Depository here to present each member of the Louisiana Conference with a copy of the work. We assure them that we have not recently read a more interesting book. Old-fashioned Methodism is the life of it. It is impossible to read it without being benefited in knowledge and in piety.

Middlebury College, Vt.—Of 1000 graduates of this College, about one-half of those who have lived to a sufficient age have entered the ministry, and of these thirty have been missionaries.

Rev. H. C. Blackwell, of the Rock River (Methodist, North) Conference, was recently drowned, while bathing in the Kaskaskia river.

A WORD FOR THE QUARTERLY.

Professional journalism is not a "new thing under the sun." Nearly every organization, vocation and interest has had its organs, or periodical literary representatives, at different times and in different places. Law, medicine, the mercantile profession, the different arts, industries and associations, all have had a hearing before the world, and a medium of communion between their disciples, through the agency of the press. The various religious Quarterlies, we believe, are regarded as the only approximation to professional organs for the ministries of the churches sustaining them, though they are adapted to the cultivated and studious laity also. A neglect of their "Quarterly" by the ministers of any Church is an evidence of their lack of true ministerial culture, of the spirit of study appropriate to their high vocation, and of the esprit du corp that is absolutely essential to the mental and moral power of their body. A mentally tribal or nomadic ministry—a ministry with no mental bond of sympathy—with no ties to the common mental home—with no common organ of thought and criticism, by which they may all be brought to dwell under the roof of the same mental temple, however geographically separated,—such a ministry will find a merely ecclesiastical bond of union very inadequate to the ends of sympathy and power. Over and above all the advantages and benefits of a Church Quarterly to the laity, and they are very great, its greatest benefit is indicated in the remarks above. A church may have no "Quarterly," and notwithstanding, its ministry may be amply supplied with organs of exegetical and literary thought and criticism. They may supply themselves from other sources, by means of the periodicals of other churches, and of the literary world. And it is not to be denied that they should have these, in any case, even though they should be liberal enough to discuss "German theology." But this will not suffice. The necessary home culture, and home sympathy, and mental unity, they never can have, without the voice and lessons of their own ecclesiastical mother.

WESLEYAN CONFERENCE.

The 117th annual Conference of the Connexion established by the Rev. John Wesley, M. A., commenced its sittings on the 26th of July last, as we learn from the London Times of the 27th, in the Old Chapel, City-road. Nearly 450 ministers were present. The legal Conference consists of 100 ministers, according to the deed-poll enrolled in Chancery, but since the death of the founder, the ordained ministers permitted to attend by their local authorities, the district committees, take part in the decisions of the Conference. At the close of its session the members of the legal Conference confirm and enact by their own separate vote the decisions which have taken place. The first business of the Conference is to fill up the vacancies which have occurred in the legal hundred in the course of the year. Seven elections took place. The highest honours in the gift of the Conference are the offices of President and Secretary, and their election is looked upon with solicitude by the great body of Methodists throughout the world. All ministers in attendance who have been in orders 14 years and upwards, have a vote for these high officials, which is given by ballot. The Rev. William Wood Stamp, of Liverpool, was chosen President by 186 votes, and the Rev. John Farra, Governor and Chaplain of the School at Wadehouse-grove, near Leeds, was re-elected Secretary by 228 votes. The subsequent business of the day consisted in the appointment of the subordinate officers and the reception of deputations and of addresses from the sister and affiliated Conferences in Ireland, France, Canada, the eastern provinces of British North America, and Australasia.

THE PRINCE OF WALES.

This young gentleman is progressing on his North American tour and receiving loyal attentions everywhere. After visiting Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, and New Brunswick, he was, at last accounts, on the St. Lawrence on his way up to Quebec. It is understood that he intends to visit Bermuda, should time admit, on the voyage back to England. He is expected to visit Boston about the 1st of October and New York, about the 15th. At a meeting a few days ago of the leading merchants, bankers and citizens generally, of New York it was determined to invite the Prince to partake of a banquet at the Academy of Music, and to pay his other courtesies, and a committee was appointed to go to Canada and bear the invitation to the Prince.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

Revs. W. G. McGaughey and J. F. Wynne write us from Floyd, La., of a revival, resulting in 24 conversions and 40 accessions to the Church—most of them heads of families.

Rev. E. B. Norton writes from Oak Bowery, Ala., of a protracted meeting which resulted in 38 conversions and 25 were added to the Church. It was a time of power. Dr. McTyeire, of the Nashville Advocate, Rev. O. R. Blue, and Rev. E. J. Hammill, assisted. A revival spirit prevails in the circuit.

The Gospel and Slavery, is the title of a tract of some twenty pages, by a member of the Mississippi Conference, which first appeared serially in this paper. It is designed to explain and enforce the duty of every slaveholder to provide his servants with the Gospel. It is published by the Nashville House at the request of the Mississippi Conference. Would that it could be generally circulated and read.
